that you, an English jury, if you were sitting in judicature upon the case of confessedly the vilest of offenders, you would not suffer the atrocity of the offence to mitigate that censure and animadversion which is due to a behaviour like this of the governor's. In private justice to the character of Mr. Fabrigas, and not as the least relating to any question here to be tried, gentlemen, I will state to you upon what grounds and pretence this mutiny is alleged against Mr. Fabrigas.—Mr. Fabrigas, as I have told you, claimed, among all the other inhabitants and possessors of lands in the island, a right of selling the produce of his lands, under certain restrictions. The produce of the lands is chiefly wine: Mr. Fabrigas had a considerable quantity. His majesty, by his proclamation, had given free liberty to the inhabitants of that part of the island where Mr. Fabrigas lived, to sell their wines, the price being first settled by the authority of the governor:—that price is called the afforation price. Notwithstanding his majesty's proclamation, by an act and order, not of governor Mostyn, but of his lieutenant-governor, there was a prohibition that no wine should be sold without the immediate authority of the mustapha. An application therefore, by Mr. Fabrigas, was made to this officer, either to permit him to sell his wines under the afforation price, which would be for the general relief and benefit of the islanders, and of the garrison, or that he himself would buy it at a fixed price. This officer refused to comply with either: Mr. Fabrigas therefore was reduced to the necessity of making an humble application to governor Mostyn, to permit him this alternative, either to sell his wine under a certain afforation and regulated price, or that the government would buy his wine of him for their use, or the use of the garrison. This petition was thought reasonable at first, and had a kind answer; it was received, and it appears to have been taken into consideration, but nothing was done in consequence of it. Mr. Fabrigas therefore repeats his application, and he receives encouragement to expect that the reasonableness of his petition would be taken into consideration, and that he should be at liberty to sell the produce of his land. But, gentlemen, at last this answer was given to Mr. Fabrigas: that if it appeared to be the sense of a considerable number of the inhabitants of the island, that it was for their benefit that such permission should be given, his application should be complied with. Mr. Fabrigas then prepares such a petition; he gets it signed, and he presents it to governor Mostyn. Now, gentlemen, here it is impossible to state what passed between the parties. If it can be pretended that there was any thing mutinous, menacing, or improper, in this last petition, I presume that petition will be produced to you, and it will speak for itself; but some indignation was conceived by governor Mostyn against the plaintiff, Mr. Fabrigas, which produced that strange, unaccountable, unwarrantable, and alarming conduct, which we now, by evidence, impute to Mr. Mostyn. For gentlemen, instantly upon this, Mr. Fabrigas is conducted in the manner before-mentioned to that horrible dungeon, where he continues for a considerable time under such orders as I have stated to you, till he was hurried on board a ship, and was conveyed to Carthagena in Spain. Here, for the first time, he receives intelligence of what was the provocation that he gave, what was the ground of such treatment of him, what charge was imputed to him, by what authority he was so detained and so treated: for here appears a letter under the hand of governor Mostyn, avowing this act, and telling him that he thought it necessary and expedient, for the punishment of his offence, to send him into exile, and to direct him to be conveyed to Carthagena in Spain. Here then you find the governor avowing the whole; and if he did not avow the whole, you could have no doubt under what authority these things were done; because you will hear from all, that they cannot be done but under the authority of the governor. Then, gentlemen, the imprisonment; and the sending this man into exile, are the acts of governor Mostyn. The imprisonment under such strange aggravating circumstances of horror and ignominy, and the sending him without notice, without time for preparation, without giving him the opportunity of paying the least attention to the concerns of his estate and family, into exile; these, gentlemen, we now presume to treat as the acts of governor Mostyn; and the governor says, he is justified in so doing, as governor of Minorca. I should be glad to know upon what idea of justice the governor grounds that pretence. I conceive, that in this case, there cannot be the least colour or pretence of any judicial examination, or the least form of judicial proceedings. Governor Mostyn, after having been guilty of this outrage to the plaintiff, would have acted much better, if he had not added this insult to the laws of his country, by assuming an authority incompatible with the least possible idea of justice that can be entertained in this or in any country whatsoever. Gentlemen, if governor Mostyn complains that justice is not done to his defence by his plea, that he is fettered and embarrassed by it, and could now justify his conduct upon better grounds, we will freely give him the opportunity of doing it; he shall do it in what character he thinks proper. If he has acted under the colour of any judicial proceedings in civil judicature, let those proceedings be produced, let him desert and abandon the shameful plea that he has presented; he has even our liberty to do it. If the governor means to be justified in his military character, I need not tell you, gentlemen, that it is necessary in that character, that there proof, it should have been shewn, that the like attention was not paid to the governor at Malta, and in other parts of the island. The truth is, that the inhabitants are so dependant on the military, that I have known the same civility shewn in another part of the island to the officer who happened to command there, but certainly without any intention of surrendering to him their authority as magistrates.

Mr. Wright and Mackellar also said, that the Minorquins claimed to be governed sometimes by the English, and sometimes by the Spanish laws, as suited best for the moment; but insinuated that the Spanish laws prevailed, and that by them the governor had a right by his sole authority to banish.

The fact most undoubtedly is, that Minorca, a conquered country, preserves its ancient (the Spanish) laws, till the conqueror chooses to give them others; and therefore as England has not given them others, it is true the Spanish laws do prevail in Minorca, both in civil and criminal matters, among themselves; but it is equally true that they have the protection of the English laws against their governor, who cannot be amenable to their local laws, and that however despotically a Spanish governor may formerly have acted, it cannot be the law of Spain, or of any country (because it is contrary to natural justice) that a man should be condemned and punished without either trial or hearing.

It would have been easy for governor Mostyn, if Mr. Fabrigas had committed a crime, to have followed the mode of proceeding established there in criminal cases, which is for the advocate fiscal to prosecute in the court of royal government, where the chief justice criminal is the judge.

If I was not afraid of swelling this letter to too great a length, I should make more remarks on what passed at this trial, and point out many more instances of power unjustifiably assumed by the governors. But I hope that what appears from this publication will be sufficient to induce administration to consider the state of this island, and give the inhabitants some better security for the safety of their persons, and enjoyment of their property; for, exclusive of the meanness there is in ill using those who cannot resist, it is undoubtedly the best policy, for the honour and stability of our empire, to make all its dependencies happy.

should be judicial proceedings likewise of a military court of justice. I will be bold to say, that the idea governor Moslyn has adopted, that the lives, fortunes, and being of the inhabitants of the island of Minorca are at his mercy, and that by his sole authority he can inflict bonds and imprisonment on any inhabitant of that island, is the single idea of governor Moslyn; and I say the governor does not, in this case, talk like a military man, for his ideas are as foreign to the notions of a soldier, as of a lawyer. Gentlemen, this is the nature of the case that we shall offer to you, and which we shall produce in proof to you against governor Moslyn: an imprisonment, if it had been attended with all the circumstances of comfort that could have been administered to a person in that situation, unjustifiable, and without colour or pretence of legal authority, sufficient to entitle this gentleman to call for considerable damages from a verdict of a jury: a banishment into a foreign country of a subject of England, intitled to be protected, to whom the laws cannot be denied without breach of public faith, and a dangerous wound to the general system of our constitutional liberties. Thus, by the sole authority of governor Moslyn, without pretence of judicial examination, was Mr. Fabrigas sent into banishment. If all other circumstances were away, the being sent out of his native country by an arbitrary act of the governor of that island, is surely ground enough to call for the most considerable damages. But, gentlemen, you are to add to it every circumstance of discomfort. He was, during the whole time of his imprisonment, kept in a gloomy dungeon; no circumstance of ignominy that could affect the mind of a man of feeling was omitted: he was put into a place set apart and designed only for the reception of the worst of malefactors, secluded from any conversation or communication with his friends or acquaintance, his nearest relations, his wife or his family, deprived of the comfort of a bed, and obliged, for a considerable number of days, to subsist upon bread and water. This is a case of the most unparalleled cruelty; the most ingenious circumstances of torture being added to the most unjustifiable and the most lawless exertion of authority, that I am persuaded has ever appeared before any court. If governor Moslyn can support the powers of this claim, and vindicate himself, as governor, by the plenitude of his powers, and that the sole judicature of the island resides in his person; if it was for a moment possible for you to entertain the idea of the legality of such a power being placed in any man, in consequence of an authority derived from the crown of England: I say, if it was possible for you to conceive that such a power could exist; try him even by that rule, try him by that rule, and he's without excuse; for the most despotic, the most arbitrary and uncontrollable power that is ever exercised, professeth at least to act by calling upon the party accused to make his defence, and I believe in no part of the globe is it looked upon as just to condemn a man unheard. Let general Moslyn travel into Asia, or visit his neighbours on the continent of Barbary, he will not find examples there to justify his conduct, in any of the powers assumed, or in the use he has made of them: for if their powers are not circumscribed or restrained by any laws; if they act, as the general professes he has a right to, by their sole will and pleasure; if that is the rule of their government, yet still there is an idea of a principle of natural justice that should govern their proceedings there; at least an appearance of it they are anxious to produce. I never heard in my life that it was the avowed privilege of any country, that a man should be charged with an offence, that he received the punishment for that offence, without the offence being explained and stated to him, and an opportunity given him of hearing the charge and the evidence by which it was produced; but this is the case of a transaction in the dark, a secret indignation conceived, that indignation immediately followed by the most horrid exertions of power upon the person of Mr. Fabrigas—committed to a dungeon, and unapprized of the charge against him till sent out of his native country, and upon the voyage to the destined place of his banishment. The offer made to general Moslyn not to tie him down merely to the justification specified in his plea, but to give him leave to offer any justification that may be consistent with the idea of civil or military justice, may be called insidious, because I must disbelieve every thing suggested on any trust, if I think the offer can be of no benefit to him if wanted; but it may be added to it, 'Governor, take your ideas of law from Barbary or Turkey, produce your precedent, India or negro law, you are still unable to justify your conduct.' Gentlemen, these are the circumstances we are to lay before you in evidence. The governor may, if he pleases, endeavour to charge this gentleman with mutiny. If he does, I presume he will adduce his proof of it. But if it was possible to decide that Mr. Fabrigas was a mutinous man, though the reverse of that character is but justice to him; nay, if you could decide that he was the worst and most dangerous of offenders, governor Moslyn's conduct is still destitute of any colour of justice or law. His conduct is totally unwarrantable, and the pretence he has here set up, that he is a prince with a power unbounded and unlimited by any rule or law whatsoever, that he is authorized to act by his own will and pleasure, must represent this case in so alarming a light to you, that I am persuaded that you, who have taken your ideas of law and justice from conversation with Englishmen, and observation on the English constitution, will give all attention to the particular sufferings of the man, as well as to what you owe to yourselves, your country and posterity; and we trust, even in the very best construction that is possible to put on governor Moslyn's conduct, that you will think the damages laid in the declaration are not extravagant.

BASIL CUNNINGHAM. Examined by Mr. Lee.

Q. You are in some military capacity?—A. Yes.
 Q. Was you in the year seventy-one in the island of Minorca?
 A. Yes.
 Q. In what character?
 A. Acting serjeant major for the royal artillery.
 Q. Do you remember Mr. Anthony Fabrigas being at Minorca?
 A. Yes.
 Q. Was you serjeant major at the time he was seized and taken into custody?—A. I was, when I saw him brought into prison.

Q. Do you recollect any orders at that time coming in any body's name touching his confinement?

A. There was a general order given us, that three more men should be added to the artillery guard.

Court. Have you that order?—A. No.

Q. Was it not your office as serjeant major to transcribe that order into your book?

A. I gave that order out in the company's order book.

Q. To whom does the custody of that order book belong?

A. When the books are written out, they give them to the captain to whom they belong.

Q. They put three additional men sentry upon that occasion?

A. Yes.

Court. Why?

A. To do duty upon the prisoner Mr. Fabrigas.

Court. How long had Mr. Fabrigas been in custody at that time when this order was given out? Was it immediately upon his coming into custody, or after he had been put there?

A. To the best of my recollection, I believe about twenty-four hours after he had been in custody, or the evening of the same day; I cannot be certain as to that.

Q. You can tell us what prison it was that Mr. Fabrigas was committed to?—A. He was put into prison No. 1.

Q. What is the general use of that prison? to what is it applied?

A. All the prisoners that are guilty of capital offences, or for desertion, we commonly put in there.

Q. Do you recollect any circumstances attending Mr. Fabrigas's imprisonment?—Mention any that occur to you.—Do you recollect the manner in which he was brought or confined?

A. To the best of my recollection he was brought by a party of soldiers, whether of the 25th regiment or the 6th, I can't say; he was brought in handcuff'd, I think, but am not certain.

Q. How long was he confined there?

A. As near as I can recollect, about five or six days.

Q. In that prison?—A. Yes.

Q. During his confinement there, can you tell the court or jury whether he was permitted to be visited by his wife or family?

A. No: the sentries had orders that he should have no conversation with any body but the prevost marshal.

Q. Do you know of any orders that he should not be seen but by the prevost marshal?

A. The sentry informed me that was his orders; besides, it was put into the general orders too.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. If you mean to affect the defendant with that, you should produce the order.

Mr. Lee. Well then, we shall produce it.

Q. In fact, do you know whether any body was permitted to visit him but this prevost marshal?

A. I don't know of any; if they did, it was contrary to orders.

Q. Do you know if any body applied to see him?

A. His wife applied to see him, but was refused, as I was informed.

Q. What is this prevost marshal?

A. One that has the charge of all prisoners that are confined for capital crimes; he has the keys of the prison.

Q. Is this an executioner too, as well as a gaoler?—A. No.

Q. Can you tell us the cause for which this gentleman was committed—the occasion of it?—A. I cannot.

Q. Do you know what Mr. Fabrigas is?

A. He is an inhabitant of the island of Minorca.

Q. A native?—A. Yes: a Minorquin.

Q. Do you know whether Mr. Fabrigas is a man of any property, or was a grower of any vines upon that island? Do you know in what manner he lived?

A. He lived like a gentleman there.

Q. Was you acquainted with any disputes touching his liberty to sell his wine?

A. I know nothing at all of it.

Q. Do you know any thing of what happened to him after his confinement in this prison? what became of him after?

A. He was sent out of the island.

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge?

A. I did not see him taken away.

Q. Do you know of any orders touching his being sent?

A. I did not see any orders.

Q. You being at St. Phillip's at this time, when he was in prison, you can tell us whether he was tried for any offence previous to his commitment there, or after?

A. No: he was not tried.

Cross-examination by Mr. Serjeant Davy.

Q. How long had you known this Fabrigas before the time of his being brought to this prison?

A. I had seen him different times, being in the island for between eight and nine years.

Q. I wish to know in the first place whether he was a quiet subject, or otherwise?

A. I never heard any thing to the contrary.

Q. What? but that he was a quiet, inoffensive subject?

A. I never heard to the contrary.

Q. He was looked upon as a very good friend to the garrison, I believe?

A. I really can't tell what he was; he was an inhabitant of the island.

I don't know that ever I spoke to him in my life.

Q. What part of the island did he live in?

A. At St. Phillip's.

Q. There it was he was imprisoned, I presume?

A. Yes: he was brought a prisoner to St. Phillip's castle.

Q. I think you say you have been in the island five years?

A. Almost

- A. Almost nine years.
 Q. Then you was there before Mr. Mostyn was appointed governor?
 A. Yes.
 Q. You was there in governor Johnston's time?—A. Yes.
 Q. Was you there in governor Blakeney's time?—A. No.

JAMES TWEEDIE. Examined by Mr. Grose.

- Q. What was you in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-one?—A. A corporal in the royal artillery in the island of Minorca.
 Q. Did you see the plaintiff brought to the castle?
 A. No: I did not see him brought; I was a serjeant of the guards when he was delivered up to me, from the 61st regiment.

Court. Can you recollect the time?

- A. No: it was some time about the middle of September, to the best of my knowledge, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-one.

Q. In what way was he delivered?

- A. He was delivered to me in the prison No. 1.

Q. What were the particulars of that delivery to you? in what way was he delivered?

- A. He was in but a very mean habit; for, by what I could learn, his clothes and every thing that he brought in with him had been taken from him.

Counsel for the defendant. That will not do. What condition was he in?

- A. He was in the prison; he had been in the prison almost twenty-four hours, before he was delivered to the artillery.

Q. What orders did you receive concerning him?

- A. That I was to suffer no person to approach the grate.

Q. What grate?—A. The prison door.

Q. From whom did you receive these orders?

- A. From the adjutant lieutenant Frost; he was our acting adjutant; he read the orders.

Q. Not to let any one come to that grate?

- A. Or converse, or have any communication with him, upon any account.

Q. Whose orders does the adjutant lieutenant give out?

- A. I imagined it was a general order.

Q. What do you mean by a general order?

- A. Coming from the commander in chief.

Q. Do you mean from governor Mostyn?

- A. Yes; he was commander in chief then of the island.

Q. What order?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I will give you no trouble about these things. With regard to orders, you have given us notice to produce the orders. The fact is as you contend. We mean to conceal no circumstances.

Court. I think the right way will be, as it is now admitted that this was done by the defendant's order, to proceed with your parole evidence, and read that at the conclusion.

Counsel for the plaintiff. If your lordship pleases, we will read the order of imprisonment, and the sentence of banishment.

The ASSOCIATE.

The title is,

Orders given out to the troops in Minorca by lieutenant general Mostyn, governor of the island, who arrived the 21st of January, 1771. September 15: In order to relieve the main guard at St. Phillip's, which now wants a sentry extraordinary upon Antonio Fabrigas, confined in prison No. 1, general Mostyn orders, that three men be added to the artillery guard in the castle square, as they are most contiguous; and that duty taken by them, the sentry must be posted night and day, and is to suffer no person whatever to approach the grate in the door of the said prison, either to look in, or have any communication with the prisoner, the provost marshal excepted, who is constantly to keep the key in his possession.

To Anthony Fabrigas de Roche.

YOU Anthony Fabrigas, inhabitant of the arraval of St. Phillip's, are by me, chief governor of Minorca, banished this island for twelve months from the date hereof, not to return hither until that time is expired at your peril, for your seditious, mutinous, and insolent behaviour to me the governor, and for having dared most dangerously and seditiously to raise doubts and suspicions amongst the inhabitants of the arraval of St. Phillip's, and to excite them to dispute my authority, and disobey my orders; and for having further presumed most dangerously to insinuate, that his majesty's troops under my command, without any authority from them for such false and scandalous insinuations, were imposed upon.

Mahon, 17th day of Sept. 1771.

J. MOSTYN, governor.

- Q. You say you received this order to permit no person to approach the grate of the prison, or have any communication with the plaintiff: did you obey this order?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you obey it strictly?

- A. Yes, as strict as it was in my power.

Q. Did any person apply to see the plaintiff?

- A. Yes, his wife and two children.

Q. Were they permitted to see him?—A. No.

Q. How near were they permitted to come to the prison?

- A. As high as I can guess, about thirty yards.

Q. They were not permitted to come nearer?

- A. They were not permitted to come nearer.

Q. Do you know in what way the plaintiff laid?

- A. He lay upon the boards.

Q. Were there no beds?—A. No beds.

Q. Was any bedding sent to him?

- A. I saw his wife with bedding, which was not permitted to be brought to him.

Q. In short, tell the jury whether the guard would suffer any thing whatever to pass them?

VOL. XI.

- A. If they did, they were sure to come to trouble, to punishment, by it; and I am certain they never did.

Q. Tell us what his subsistence was?

- A. Bread and water.

Q. What sort of subsistence has a deserter if he is confined in this place?
 A. It is a general rule in Minorca, that deserters and prisoners, even for capital crimes, should have provisions sent them.

Q. What provisions?

- A. Such as the island affords, bread and beef.

Court. Do you know whether any provisions were brought him?

- A. I never saw any; there was such a strict order, that nobody ever attempted it.

Q. I believe there was an air-hole at the top of the prison?—A. Yes.

Q. Was any body placed over the air-hole?

- A. No; but there was a sentry upon a bastion near to it, who had orders given him, that nobody should approach this air-hole.

Q. Upon what account?

- A. For fear any thing should be dropped down to him.

Court. Was that particularly upon this occasion, or generally when deserters were there?

- A. No; I never heard a circumstance of the kind, but during the time Mr. Fabrigas was in prison.

Q. Did you know the plaintiff?

- A. Yes, I have been at his house several times; I was at the island almost nine years.

Q. What family had he?

- A. A wife, when he was in prison, and five children, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. Now, during the time you have known him, have you never heard him say any thing disrespectful of the governor?

- A. No; he only complained of his hardships, of his own bodily sufferings.

WILLIAM JOHNS. Examined by Mr. Peckham.

Q. Was you at Minorca in 71?—A. Yes.

Q. In what situation and capacity?

- A. I was garrison gunner.

Q. How long were you in the island?—A. Almost nine years.

Q. Did you know Mr. Fabrigas?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you know Mr. Fabrigas's situation in the island?

- A. He lived very genteel in St. Phillip's.

Q. Did he live in the same state as the principal inhabitants of St. Phillip's?

- A. Yes, as much so as any man in St. Phillip's.

Q. Do you remember any thing of his being imprisoned?

- A. I saw him brought to the prison.

Q. In what manner was he brought?—A. By a file of men.

Q. Were his hands bound?—A. I cannot say.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I admit that he was with his hands bound, as the first witness said, and that he was kept in prison by order of the governor.

Mr. Peckham. Do you admit that he was hand-cuffed?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. Yes, that he was hand-cuffed, and kept in the way described by the former witness.

Q. Was he kept hand-cuffed in prison?—A. I believe not.

Q. What sort of a place is this prison?

- A. It is set apart for capital punishments, for prisoners that are under sentence of death.

Q. Is it a prison dug out of a rock?

- A. It is a subterraneous place in the body of the castle.

Q. Is it under ground?—A. No, under the top of the castle.

Q. Is it a ground floor?—A. A ground floor, I believe.

Q. This being the prison, and you standing there to guard him, do you remember any of his children coming to see him?

- A. I saw his son the first day he was confined there, a boy about fifteen, come to see him.

Q. What did he come for?

- A. He had some provisions in a basket.

Q. Did he apply to you, that those provisions might be given to his father?

- A. He applied to the regiment then upon duty to give them to his father, but was denied.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I admit he was sent hand-cuffed to the prison, as described by the former witness: I meant to include the matters of belief as well as matters of knowledge.

Court. For my part, I like to hear the evidence in any case, to know the truth, and then we have no squabbles afterwards.

JOHN CRAIG. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Glynn.

Q. What are you?—A. A matross.

Q. Was you in the island of Minorca in 71?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know Mr. Fabrigas?—A. Yes.

Q. How long have you been in Minorca?

- A. Pretty nigh nine years.

Q. What condition was Mr. Fabrigas in?

- A. In very good circumstances there, he is reckoned one of the best in circumstances in the island.

Q. Do you remember the time when he was in the dungeon there?

- A. Very well.

Q. You did not do any duty upon him, I suppose?—A. Yes, I did.

Q. Do you remember whether people were admitted to see him?

- A. I am sure there were none admitted to see him.

Q. Do you know whether any person came to see him that was refused?

- A. I know his wife and children came, and they were refused.

Q. Do you know of his being taken out of the prison?

- A. I saw him put on board a ship in the harbour.

Q. How many days after his first imprisonment?

- A. I am

A. I am not certain of the days.

Q. About what number of days was he in confinement?

A. Five or six days, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. In what manner was he taken out of prison, and put on board a ship?

A. I happened to be down at the quay, and saw him put on board a boat, to be taken to the vessel.

Q. What time was this?

A. Early in the morning. I am not sure to the time, but to the best of my knowledge I think between three and four in the morning.

Q. Had he any time allowed him on shore?

A. No, he was hurried on board; his wife and family were coming down to speak to him, and the soldiers kept them off, and would not let them. I wanted to speak to him myself, and the soldiers would not let me.

Q. You saw his wife and children come to him, do you remember whether they brought any thing for him?

A. I think they had some bedding, to see if they could get it on board the ship he was going to, and it was turned back again, they would not allow any thing to come to him; he was put on board a boat and taken into a ship which was laying in the harbour there, the ship was under sail.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I admit he was banished to Carthage.

Counsel for the plaintiff. You admit he was banished by governor Mofyn for a year?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. Yes, I do.

Colonel JOHN BIDDULPH. Examined by Mr. Lee.

Q. You are an officer in the regiment that was at Minorca?

A. I was not in Minorca at the time this matter passed.

Q. But you have been at Minorca?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you know Mr. Fabrigas?

A. Yes; I knew him from the time I arrived in the island till I left it.

Q. When did you arrive there?

A. I think in the year 63, about May or June, and staid about eight years.

Q. When you knew Mr. Fabrigas, in what condition and circumstances was he?

A. He seemed to me to be of the second sort of people in the island; he had some vineyards and some houses, and some property, and was received not as of the first quality, but as a gentleman; he was esteemed a man of property: I should call him a gentleman farmer.

Q. While you knew him what character did he bear? or how did he behave himself, as far as you had an opportunity of observing?

A. As far as I could observe, he behaved very well, and had a very good character. I used to employ him in getting wine for me, and other things the island produced, because I had a family; and often he was very useful to me in procuring things at a reasonable price. When I was at Citadella, at the other end of the island, he came there, and was with some of the better kind of people; he was always with a don Vigo, or a don Sancho, who were reckoned the principal people of the place; they are nobles in that island.

Q. While you knew him, I ask you what was his behaviour? Did he behave like a peaceable subject, or like an unruly and factious one?

A. He always behaved with very great decency and decorum.

Cross-examined by Mr. Serjeant Burland.

Q. Do you know whether he was a man of property in the island?

A. As far as I understand he was, but it is impossible for me to say positively; he was reported such.

Q. He had a father living?

A. I believe he had, an old man.

Q. You do not know whether it was his own property or not?

A. It seemed to be his.

Q. He conversed with the two noblemen you mentioned?

A. Yes; he was at their houses as a gentleman.

Q. Did you use to visit at his house?

A. I have been there.

Q. Did you ever dine or sup with him?

A. I think I dined with him once.

Court. The gentlemen suggest, but you don't mean to make a distinction between the classes there?

A. I do make a great distinction.

Q. What promotion has general Mofyn in the army at this time?

A. He is a lieutenant general, and commander in chief of the island of Minorca.

Q. Has he any military promotion at home? has he any regiment?

A. Yes.

Q. What regiment is it?

A. I don't recollect the number; it is a regiment of dragoons.

Q. Do you know of any office that the general has about his majesty's person, any place at court?

A. I don't recollect it; I believe he has.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. Mylord, we have done for the plaintiff.

Mr. Serjeant Davy, for the defendant.

MAY it please your lordship, and you, gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel in this cause for the defendant, general Mofyn, who is charged with a misbehaviour towards the plaintiff, in the defendant's capacity, as governor of this island. The plaintiff, Fabrigas, being a subject of the crown of England, a native of that island, a Minorquin by birth, and living in the town of St. Phillip's, there is a reason why his residence in the town of St. Phillip's is, in my apprehension, material for some matters which I shall trouble you with before I sit down. The defendant was appointed governor of the island of Minorca on the second of March, 1768. His predecessor was governor Johnston, whose predecessor was general Blakeney. So far I am able to trace back the governor of this island, whom the questions before you have any sort of relation to; and any further is unnecessary. I don't know whether it may be new to any of you, gentlemen, to inform you, most probably not, the history of your country will tell you, that this island of Minorca, whose situation is in the Mediterranean, and is of extreme use in the protection of the Mediterranean trade, was taken in queen Anne's wars from the crown of Spain, and was ceded by that crown to Great Britain, by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713: that upon the ceding of that island, the condition annexed was a requisition on the part of Spain, which was acceded to on the part of Great Britain, that the inhabitants of this island of Minorca should continue in the free exercise of the Roman catholic religion, which could be no farther than was consonant to the laws of Great Britain. For whereas the laws of Great Britain will not allow the pope's bulls, excommunication from the court of Rome, the inquisition, and some other matters of that sort; therefore a free exercise of the Roman catholic religion was not with the exercise of any powers in the bishop of Rome, but what were acknowledged by the laws of Great Britain. They had only the free exercise of their religion, as Roman catholics. All other rights which they had, and all laws by which they were to be governed, were to be given to them by the king of England. He was to establish what code of laws he thought proper in that country. They were to be subject either to civil jurisdiction in particular sorts, or military, or whatever sort the king of England pleased. They were a conquered people, a conquered island, and no terms were annexed to that treaty of Utrecht, but only the exercise of the Roman catholic religion. The king was to appoint his governor of the island, to govern them by such laws as he thought proper to direct; an arbitrary despotic government, or a qualified government, or whatever government, under whatever sort of magistrates, or whatever order the crown of England should think proper. There is a manifest and very wide distinction, to be sure, between a Minorquin by birth (I don't speak of an Englishman that goes over there, and the case of an Englishman): I just mention these things, which will be very proper for your consideration throughout the progress of the several facts I shall mention in this cause. They are, in my humble apprehension, essentially necessary to your consideration. Some time after these people (I don't know exactly the date of it) had become subject to the crown of England; after 1713 they petitioned for a confirmation of the usages and customs of Spain, and to be governed by the laws of Spain, as they had been used to do before: and that was granted, so far as the wisdom of the crown thought proper to grant; and there were certain regulations, which I will take notice of by-and-by. Many regulations were made from time to time occasionally, by the crown of Great Britain, for the internal police of the island. Gentlemen, I should inform you too, that the island of Minorca consists of five separate divisions or districts. In four of these they have magistrates annually elected. In the fifth, which is called the arraval of St. Phillip's, which is the fort of the island and its security, there the particular district which is just the suburbs which takes the town of St. Phillip's adjoining close to the foot of the citadel, that district is under the immediate government of the governor of the island appointed by the crown. There are no jurats, which are the common name of the magistrates in the other divisions, who are elected by the people; but the proper officer for the police of the arraval is appointed by the governor himself, and I think his title is mustaph: he is the officer appointed by the governor of the island. There is an extreme necessity, that more particular care should be taken in the regulation of the police of that part of the island which is immediately contiguous to the fort of St. Phillip's, and where there is a perpetual garrison, for the sake of preserving military discipline. A law of this island, amongst others which is necessary to mention to you, because the history of the transaction has immediate respect to it; is, that the jurats in the several parts of the island in the four other districts of the island, and the mustaph in the arraval of St. Phillip's, which is the fifth dependent district under the immediate dependence and government of the governor himself, set a price, and value, and measure, upon the several commodities. I don't know whether it includes all commodities, but wine, and corn, and other things, which they call the afforation, that is the affize, or price to be paid, upon commodities to be sold. Gentlemen, in the year 1752, the date here is material, there was a regulation appointed by the crown, made by the king in council. I extract that part of it that regards the present question; that is, that the jurats of all the universities (now universities are the districts, and you see there are no jurats of any universities, but these four: districts and universities are synonymous terms) "that the jurats of all the universities be left at full liberty, without the intervention of the commandant, or any other of the royal officers, to make the afforations, and settle the affize and prices of all manner of corn, and all manner of provisions, the produce of the island; and also the prices of corn imported into the island, and bought by the universities for the good of the public; and that the natives and the inhabitants be at all times permitted to sell the same at or under the afforation, without any intervention of the governor or secretaries, or any other person or persons acting under his authority." You see, gentlemen, that this order of council imports, that these people are under the absolute despotism, if I may so say, of the crown of Great Britain, because this is a language that we in this country are not acquainted with. Whether to sell or buy our goods, or not, does not suit an English genius, the genius of the English law. This is an order made by the king in council, in the year 1752. That order of council, and some other provisions that were made by that order, occasioned some uneasiness and misapprehension; and therefore another order of council was made the following year, the 10th of August, 1753, which you will in the course of the evidence have read to you. There are some matters in it I will trouble you with. It was made upon the consideration of several papers transmitted from Minorca by general Blakeney, who was governor at that time. Several things were advised by the privy council. Among the rest, I shall just extract a few things. With respect of the first article in the civil branch, relating to the making the afforations, about which great complaints have been exhibited, that the governor be instructed to require the jurats of the several terminos in the island, at all proper times and seasons, to make the same afforations: and in case the said jurats should refuse or neglect to comply with with his command therein, that then the said governor be authorised to make the said afforations himself: but due care is to be taken, that the said afforations be made equal and general, as to all the things and persons subject to the said afforations, as well as at all proper seasons. This word seasons will have some meaning by-and-by. Then they go on with a great many regulations. Amongst the rest is, advising the king for the future, by his letters patent under the seal of Great Britain, to authorise the governor, or in his absence the lieutenant-governor, or commander in chief for the time being, to exercise the power of civil government, as well as those of the military, taking care to preserve the one separate and distinct from the other: and that they should receive all this power, but that they should be subject nevertheless to such instructions as should be given by his majesty. He is to govern according to these directions contained in the letters patent, as also to such instructions as shall be given to him by the king. Then, among other things, here is a direction, and this is very material: you see, it mentions some confusions that have arisen in respect to the regulations made before in fifty-two: that it may be proper for the governor to endeavour to make the inhabitants sensible of the great happiness they enjoy under the king's protection and government, and to shew them that they have not only at all times been treated with justice and equity, but with lenity: that the increase of riches amongst them is owing, amongst other things, to the great sums of money constantly circulated from the pay of the king's forces, and from the number of foreigners now settled among them on account of their trade: and also the extension of their trade, they being permitted to carry on commerce in like manner with the rest of his majesty's British subjects: and that it is therefore expected, that they should, in return for so many great and real benefits, most heartily and effectually concur with his majesty's governor in any thing he shall propose for his majesty's service, and the good of the island, and demean themselves as become good subjects, &c. and it may not be improper for the said governor therefore to inform them of all their privileges. Gentlemen, observe these are founded upon the 11th article of the treaty concluded at Utrecht, on the 13th of July, 1713; and that they can't be intitled to any other privileges than those signified therein. And for the better information thereof, that they do lay the said articles before them, a copy whereof was annexed therunto; by which it appears, that they are allowed to enjoy their honours and estates, and have the free use of the Roman catholic religion, and that means shall be used to secure it to them so far as is agreeable to the laws of Great Britain, which they still continue to enjoy without the least interruption, and without any fear or dread of the court of inquisition; and that at the same time may inform them, that, by the ancient laws of this country, the pope's bulls, &c. are not permitted to be executed in his majesty's dominions, nor any penalty levied or punishment inflicted under such decrees, without permission of the crown of Great Britain: and then it goes on and gives farther directions with regard to the governor's authority, and the necessity of these persons demeaning themselves cheerfully to the order of the governor; which is the government and constitution of that country. Now, gentlemen, you see that in 1753 some considerable regulations were made, to explain, and in some respects to alter, the regulations which had been made in the year 1752. And another thing is clearly observed; that the tenor of all the instruments I have read some parts of to you, these regulations neither in 52, much less by the explanation of them in the subsequent year, 53, with regard to the afforation, could not possibly extend to the arraval of St. Phillip's, for the jurats were the persons who were to make the afforation in their several universities, or districts, or terminos, as they are called. Now, in the arraval of St. Phillip's, there were no jurats at all; consequently, that was to be made by the proper officer appointed by the governor himself, namely, the mustastaph. In case of the failure of the jurats making the afforation, the governor was to make it himself: but in this district there are no jurats. There is another thing to be noticed; and that is, that if particular care was not taken as to the afforation and manner of selling wine in the arraval of St. Phillip's, that is, where the garrison is; if great care was not taken of that, it might tend to the intoxication of the soldiers of the garrison, and might be attended with most pernicious consequences. For this reason general Blakeney, when he was governor of the island, soon after an explanation of the former regulation now made in fifty-three, that was continued afterwards by his successor governor Johnston, made a very proper regulation with regard to wine, particularly in this arraval of St. Phillip's. That was soon after the order of council in fifty-three; I believe it was in fifty-three, or most likely was the beginning of the year fifty-four, that general Blakeney made the regulation I am now going to mention to you. The mustastaph was an officer there that did the office of jurat in the other districts: he was appointed immediately by the governor. The jurats in the other districts were chosen annually by the people, in order to avoid any partiality, and to take care that the mustastaph shall do his duty regularly, that the inhabitants that have wine to sell shall sell their wine by turns; that all the people within the arraval of St. Phillip's shall sell their wines by turns; for if they were at liberty all to sell their wine as fast as they could sell it, that would, as I mentioned just now, tend to the intoxication of the soldiers, and to the ruin of the island. And the way that was appointed by general Blakeney in the year fifty-four was, that they should ballot, or cast lots, for turns; and then the several people that had the lots to sell, should sell at an afforation settled by the mustastaph, at such a given time. Then the others shall come to their turn, as ballotted for; so that every one, in the course of his turn, taking the chance of the ballot, will sell his wine at or under, if he pleased, the afforation price, during the time specified. This was a regulation governor Blakeney made upon the order of council. The people of that district were all very well pleased, and things went on in very good order. The people were glad to be so regulated. This being approved of, and consequently being found by experience to be a very good regulation, and to answer all the good ends of government, it was continued during all the remainder of the time that general Blakeney was governor of the island of Minorca. When governor Johnston succeeded to the government of the island, he found this regulation, and the island in very good order and tranquillity. He found the regulation had answered all the good ends proposed by it, and he continued the regulation during all the time that he was governor of the island. In this situation the island was found by general Mostyn, the present defendant, when he succeeded Mr. Johnston to the government, on the second of March, 1768, now five years ago. The present governor found it just as governor Johnston had found it before, and which certainly bore testimony to the wisdom of general Blakeney, as well as of the government from whom he received his orders. It had been approved of in England, and was approved of by the inhabitants there, the Minorquins. It answered all the good ends proposed by it. It produced peace, tranquillity, and harmony in the island, which had been torn by seditions and disputes before, as the order in 53 recites. General Mostyn continued it. And, gentlemen, the continuance and observance of that order is the very cause of the complaint now before you: and this made my friend so particular. There is nothing more nor less, as you will see by-and-by, than his continuation of the order of government, which had been prescribed, you see, in 54, and continued all the time down, till the revolting spirit of the plaintiff thought proper to break through all order. Gentlemen, it will be time now for me to take notice, as I have so far gone into the general history, of another circumstance, which is notorious to all the gentlemen who have been settled in that island, as well governors as the other military gentlemen that have been there, that the native inhabitants of Minorca are but ill affected to the English, and to the English government. It is not much to be wondered at. They are the descendants of Spaniards. They consider Spain as the country to which they ought naturally to belong; and it is not at all to be wondered at that these people are not well disposed to the English, who they consider as their conquerors. A strong instance of that happened at the time of the invasion of Minorca by the French, when the French took it, which I believe was in the year 56, the beginning of last war: and it is very singular that hardly a Minorquin took arms in defence of the island against the French; the strongest proof in the world that they were very well pleased at the country being wrested from the hands of the English. The French did take it, as we all very well know; but, thank God, we have it again. Of all the Minorquins in that island, perhaps the plaintiff stands singularly and most eminently the most seditious, turbulent, and dissatisfied subject to the crown of Great Britain, that is to be found in the island of Minorca. Gentlemen, he is, or chuses to be, called for this purpose the Patriot of Minorca. Now patriotism is a very pretty thing among ourselves, and we owe much to it; we owe our liberties to it: but we should have but little to value, and perhaps we should have but little of the liberty we now enjoy, were it not for our trade. And for the sake of our trade it is not fit we should encourage patriotism in Minorca; for it is there destructive of our trade, and there is an end to our trade in the Mediterranean if it goes there. But here it is very well; for the body of the people of this country they will have it: they have demanded it, and in consequence of their demands they have enjoyed liberty, which they will continue to posterity; and it is not in the power of this government to deprive them of it. But they will take care of all our conquests abroad. If that spirit prevailed in Minorca, the consequence of it would be the loss of that country, and of course our Mediterranean trade. We should be sorry to set all our slaves free in our plantations. Gentlemen, having now troubled you so far in general concerning the law, the situation, and government, of this island, and given you a hint too of the spirit of the plaintiff, which I don't wish to make the least impression upon you, unless the evidence of facts, which we shall produce, makes impression upon you; give me leave to descend to the particular circumstances which gave rise to the matter now complained of. The plaintiff, Fabrigas, was a native of the town of St. Phillip's, and within the arraval of St. Phillip's, and consequently under the immediate eye of the governor himself, as he was within that district which is regulated by the mustastaph. In July 71 he thought proper to present a petition to governor Mostyn, the defendant, in this form: "Sheweth, that your petitioner has now by him 12 casks of wine of the produce of his own vineyards, without having purchased so much as a grape of any other person, of which he has not sold a drop, when several other inhabitants of the town have sold all theirs, as well from the produce of their own vineyards, as what they bought to make a profit by; and this with Mr. Allimundo the mustastaph's permit. That the petitioner, on the 28th instant, (July) applied to Mr. Allimundo for measures to sell wine by, of the rate of two doubters per quarter less than the afforation price, which would have raised a profit to the troops and the poor inhabitants of St. Phillip's: but notwithstanding his demand was very reasonable, and conformable to the express disposition (direction I suppose he meant) of the first article of his majesty's regulations of 52, regulating this island, where it is expressly mentioned that the inhabitants shall always be permitted to sell at the price of the afforation, or under it; Mr. Allimundo refused his petition, telling him that he would not buy his wine: and that this is not only against the reason and justice of the public, and the garrison of St. Phillip's, but also contrary to his majesty's orders in the said regulation:" and he mentions that the mustastaph had made fifty casks of wine, and sold them. Now, gentlemen, two or three observations occur, before we go any further. In the first place, this gentleman, if I may call him so, this Fabrigas, goes upon the idea of the regulation of fifty-two being disannulled. In the second place, he goes upon the idea, that the order that was made of fifty-two, was universal over all the island, without distinction of this district in the arraval of St. Phillip's, in both which you see he was mistaken. Another thing, which don't strike so immediately from what I have read, and yet here give me leave to take notice of it: it is artfully thrown into this petition, as if the good of the garrison was very much concerned in his having his petition granted. And, gentlemen, I do assert, and shall be justified in the assertion, I dare say, by your opinion, before I have done, or at least before the evidence is gone through, that his design, from the beginning to the end of it, was to stir up sedition and mutiny, and amongst the rest, particularly to point to the passions and inclinations of the soldiers of the garrison to take his part against against the governor. This petition being presented to the governor, the governor called upon Mr. Allimundo to give an answer to this man: for you see he complained, that he, Fabrigas, had not the permission to sell his own wine, Allimundo having refused him the measure by which he should sell it; and in the next place, that Allimundo himself had sold his wine. Allimundo did give an answer to this; for the governor, willing to serve every body, and to act with the most impartial justice, and being uneasy himself, that any Minorquin should be uneasy; for the uneasiness of a Minorquin perhaps diffuses itself further than a particular man, and is a fit matter to be attended to by government; he called upon Allimundo to explain this matter. Allimundo gave a full and clear answer to the matter; and stated in that answer, that Fabrigas's complaint was, because his turn for selling wine had not come, according to the lots I mentioned just now, and that was the only reason why he had not yet sold a drop; for no man could sell a drop, till by balloting his time was come: so that Fabrigas had nothing to complain of. But he insists, that no man ought to be bound by the lots, but that every man had a right, by the regulation of fifty-two, not taking notice of the regulation since that, but that any man might sell under the afforation price: therefore he, offering to sell under the afforation price, ought to be permitted to sell his wine without waiting for balloting. He was mistaken here: first, because that order of fifty-two had been rescinded, and was not the binding order: second, that he lived in a district, where it was not to be regulated by jurats, but by order of the governor: thirdly, that the regulation which had been obtained in the former governor's time had been the way I have represented to you: in all which particular heads he was grossly mistaken; and therefore he had no cause of complaint that he had not sold any of his wine, his time for sale being not yet arrived, according to the regulation of the lots. With regard to the other part of the complaint, that Allimundo sold his wine; Allimundo freely insisted, that he had a right to do so. He claimed a right which had been enjoyed by all his predecessors, and which he could not, without an order from the governor, depart from, not only for his own sake, but for the sake of his successors; that he had a right to sell his own wine without resorting to the lots, and that he had not bought any wine, but sold his own wine. This answer being given by Allimundo to the governor, the governor upon that sent word to the plaintiff, that he had enquired (for he had not taken Allimundo's word for it, but had enquired) into the matter, and found what Allimundo had done was right, and afforded no cause of complaint. This was some time in July. Upon the 11th of August, this Fabrigas thought proper to prefer another petition in these words: "I had the honour to present a memorial to your excellency, shewing, the transgressing and not observing in the said town two regulations given upon the 28th of May fifty-two by his Britannic majesty [still adhering to the order of fifty-two, as if there had been no subsequent order] that the inhabitant should be permitted to sell his fruit at the fixed price, the afforation, or under: secondly, that no commander, judge, or officer, be allowed to have any traffic, bargain, or so forth: [It cites a great deal of this order, and then he takes notice] that Allimundo, who does the functions of mustastaph, bought grapes and made wine. And then he offers to sell to the inhabitants in the garrison of St. Phillip's, twelve casks of wine that he has got by him of his own vineyard's produce, at two doubters less than the ordinary afforation and fixed price. The petitioner has applied several times to your secretary's office for your excellency's decree [that is, for his answer]. Your secretary told your petitioner verbally, that your excellency was satisfied with the answer given by Allimundo; at which he is surprised, as he is ready to prove, in a judicial way, the truth thereof. [Then he prays the governor to give his decree at the foot of the memorial, and to have the satisfaction to justify himself, and to prove his charges against Allimundo.]"

Gentlemen, this second petition being presented to the governor upon the 16th of August, which was five days after the date of it, governor Mosyn took the only possible step for a man in his situation to take, consistent with wisdom and justice; and that is, to refer both the petitions, or memorials, as well the former as the second, to the proper officers of justice, for their determination. Accordingly he did refer not only the two petitions, but also the answer or justification of Allimundo. He referred all these papers to the only proper officer there to refer this matter to, namely, the solicitor general of the island, and Dr. Markadal, the first law officer, in order that they might enquire into the matter of complaint, and impart their opinions. They made their report upon the 21st of August to the governor. Now you will see what were the opinions of the lawyers of the island at that very time, that the orders of his majesty in council, of the year 52, relative to the sale of wine, had never been executed in the suburbs of the castle of St. Phillip's. You see it is just what I told you at first; that is, the arraval of St. Phillip's, that order of 52 was never understood to extend to that particular district, which is under the immediate government of the governor himself, that is the place where this man dwelt. Then they say, secondly, that the custom observed in the suburbs, upon the sale of the wines of the inhabitants, has been, that the mustastaph had the direction of distributing the measures among those inhabitants, which was continued till some years past; when lieutenant general James Johnston, lieutenant governor of the island, in order to avoid complaints, formed a regulation, dividing the said suburbs into four quarters, and ordered that the wine should be sold by such of the inhabitants unto whom it should fall [I see I am mistaken; it was introduced, I see, by governor Johnston], which regulation at this time exists. The third is, that Antonio Allimundo was elected mustastaph. Fourthly, that Allimundo, Joseph Nats, Ralph Prater, and Joseph Leslie, who are the persons that have executed the office of mustastaph of the said suburbs for several years past, have been accustomed to purchase grapes for making wine;—this is the defence of Allimundo. Then, fifthly, that the bailiffs, jurats, mustastaphs, and other public officers, make, and have been accustomed to make wine from grapes bought by themselves. And then, lastly, that the making of wine from grapes bought had not been reckoned an illicit traffic, nor incompatible with the office of bailiff, jurat, mustastaph, and so forth. Now see what method these officers took to be informed of this matter, in order to give the answer to the governor. "This, sir, is what, in obedience to your excellency's order, we can inform you of, according to what appears to result from the declarations which we have received upon oath from the properest persons, whose original depositions remain among the archives of the royal government." These two observations naturally occur. In the first place, that the governor took the only method he could, upon the complaint of this man, to refer it to the only proper officer of the island, upon whose report he might depend, with the power of examination by this officer, of all proper persons upon oath, for their information. That, upon the result of the report of this officer, it appears that the complaint of Fabrigas was groundless. It was groundless both with respect to his claim of right to sell out of the order, by casting of lots; it was groundless, likewise, with regard to his complaint against Allimundo, for having sold wine himself. For they say that the regulation made in 52, had never applied to the district of St. Phillip's, that is, the arraval of St. Phillip's. They say, secondly, that within that district they had always sold their wine by lots. And they say, thirdly, that the mustastaph, and the other officers that do fix the afforation, have always sold wine the way that Allimundo has. This was the answer that was given, and this the report that was made to the governor, in consequence of his having referred to them the two petitions of Fabrigas, as well as the answer of Allimundo to the petition. Gentlemen, they afterwards made another report; for this, I told you, was on the 31st of August. They made another report four days after upon the 4th of September: they gave an account, for the governor was very desirous to know in what manner these gentlemen had proceeded. (You see there is a general allusion at the foot of the report, to their having examined proper persons upon oath.) The governor was exceedingly desirous to know in what order these gentlemen had proceeded, to see whether all possible care had been taken to avoid complaint, and from an earnest desire he had, that all causes of complaint might subside, that there might be one universal rule of good government preserved among the Minorquins: and to be sure, he must be answerable to the crown of Great Britain for any improper conduct. "We, upon the same day, the 16th, that is the day of reference, we wrote to the said Allimundo and Fabrigas, citing them by our commission, and ordering them to appear upon the 20th; and in obedience to which they having appeared, we again ordered them to appear on the 23d following with their proofs and documents. At their appearing on the 23d, we demanded of them their proofs and justification; when Fabrigas answered, he did not intend to enter into the same, till he had obtained the decree of the 3d memorial, that is, the answer of the governor in writing. On the 26th, Fabrigas was convoked in your excellency's office, where it was asked, what action it was he intended by these memorials against Allimundo, whether civil or criminal? And having time given him to answer, he replied, a civil one; all which appears by the acts to which we refer. As the said Fabrigas hath not this day represented before us any proof by way of justification of his said two memorials, we therefore, for this reason, have the honour to submit the same to the consideration of your excellency's wisdom, that you may not impute to us the least omission of the lively desire we have to execute the orders of your excellency." This is dated the 4th of September. Upon this order, this report that was then made upon the 4th of September, which gave a clear satisfaction that every thing had been done with proper care and caution to prevent any complaint, this Fabrigas presented a third petition or memorial. I call them petitions, remonstrances—I don't know what name to call them by, but still they have the title of a petition—he called it the humble petition—and in this third, as in the second, he had complained of Allimundo. Now here is a remonstrance against the judges: That "whereas the judges delegated by your excellency"—

Court. What date is this?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I have no precise date to it. "The judges have denied him a communication of the answer given by Allimundo, who does the functions of mustastaph of St. Phillip's: prays you will be pleased to order the judges to receive the witnesses which are produced to justify the articles." And then follows upon this, no less than twelve articles of impeachment, as it were; articles upon which the witnesses were produced to prove some facts committed by Allimundo against his majesty's orders, and to prove some injustice done by Allimundo against the Minorquins inhabiting the town of St. Phillip's, and against his majesty's troops of that garrison.—Then follows a string of twelve articles, which I don't mean to read to you now: you will have them by-and-by in due order. Then he speaks of the prices of meat, fish, and several other things, all which he complained are not well done: and there is a general complaint throughout the government of all the officers, that all the Minorquins are ill-used by the misconduct, misrule and mismanagement, by the under-officers of the garrison. Now, gentlemen, you would have supposed, if governor Mosyn had been, what the world knows he is not, a rash man, he might, perhaps, have very well justified some censure at least, of what sort is another question, upon the conduct of Mr. Fabrigas, whose conduct points very strongly to sedition. For consider where we are speaking of. We are not talking of the city of London; we are not talking of a town in England; but are talking of the town of St. Phillip's, just at the foot of the glacis of the citadel: and this stirring up sedition among the Minorquins, who were already too ill disposed to government. But governor Mosyn did act in this business with that candour and humanity, that deliberation and wisdom, for which his character is so eminent. And therefore, after this third memorial and articles, the next step he took was to take farther advice of all the superior law officers and magistrates of the island, that is, on the 5th of September, 1771. And, gentlemen, he ordered his secretary to write a letter to doctor Markadal, (I shall not pronounce their names well) the solicitor general, and the other persons; and, upon that, they gave this answer. He sent the 5th for their opinion; on the 10th they give their answer.

"We received your excellency's letter of the 5th instant, with twelve articles exhibited by Antonio Fabrigas annexed. In answer to the contents tents of the said letter, it appears to us, that in sundry of the said articles he mentions and represents injuries or impositions upon the troops quartered in St. Phillip's, which, if divulged among them, might occasion tumults and disorders, and also raise murmurings against their proper superiors, of whom they are suspicious, and have not a due regard to their own advantage: from which it appears to us, pernicious consequences may arise in military discipline. This our opinion we submit to your excellency."

Upon the receipt of this letter, still the governor was determined there should be no person unasked; therefore he, upon the receipt of this letter, sent it with Fabrigas's answer to the assessor criminal, who sits as the assistant to the governor in trying of civil or criminal causes, the great judge of the island under the governor: he sent to him for the sanction of his opinion upon it. The answer is wrote to the secretary of the governor, and, 'having examined all the said papers, it appears to me, that the opinion of the said gentlemen is very learned and just.' So that you see he concurs entirely in opinion with those other gentlemen that had made the report that I read to you just now. Gentlemen, when this was done, then, and not till then, the governor, the defendant, general Mostyn, sent an answer in form to Fabrigas; and I flatter myself that you, and every one who hears this, must be of opinion, that the governor acted with all possible caution in this business. He writes, therefore, this answer; for you see the other had pressed for an answer in writing, and would have it in a great hurry; but, however, the governor would not give an answer till he had informed his understanding upon the subject, by all that could give him information and advice. "Understanding that Antonio Alexander Allimundo hath acted in obedience to the directions of his superiors, as in the manner practised by his predecessors in the said suburbs, by those that held the office before him, as it appears to us (mentioning their names) upon a charge set forth in the representations made by Fabrigas, and upon the other part by the said petition of the people there to attend to the regulation made by governor Johnston [I should have told you, that all the Minorquins there prayed it might be continued] for which cause it is not regular to receive witnesses to justify the different articles exhibited by Fabrigas, some of which seem to tend to disturb the public tranquillity, in prejudice of his majesty's service: [now, gentlemen, remark this] notwithstanding which, if Antonio Fabrigas is sufficiently entitled to pretend, that Antonio Allimundo hath committed any crime or misdemeanor, he is to apply to the royal governor's court, and there make his complaint in the usual form; where he will have justice done him according to law, that is, according to the law of the island." Now, any mortal would suppose that Fabrigas, if he was not possessed of a most malignant and turbulent spirit, would have acquiesced in this, and taken such measures as, according to the law and constitution of the island, were open to him, and not have plagued and teased the governor with reiterated remonstrances and complaints in matters which were out of his own principal power to relieve, if there was any cause of complaint; though, by the way, the governor had the strongest reason to suppose he had no cause of complaint. But it was the determination of this man to drive home every thing possible to the governor, and to set up an opposition of the Minorquins subject to his civil government, and the garrison subject to his military government. The unavoidable consequence of this would have been the total loss of this island, and infinite bloodshed, which must have ensued upon the revolt of this island. However, the man still uses a great many threats, which you will have a particular account of by-and-by. The governor thought proper on this, (since you find all which had been done, and which this Fabrigas complained of, was the pursuing the regulations which had been made by governor Johnston—you will be amazed, perhaps, at my telling you—it is the strongest proof of the lenity and moderation of the governor that, perhaps, can ever be imagined) in order to see whether that regulation was a right one, and ought still to be continued, the governor summoned a meeting of the inhabitants, even Minorquins, the inhabitants of this district, in order to take their sense of the governor's regulation, to sell by lots, or whether that regulation should be abolished, and that he, or any person within the district, may be at liberty to sell wine as fast as they can under the afforation price. In order to have their full sense of the matter, he took the utmost cautionary means. This doctor Markadal and doctor Oliver summoned all the inhabitants; and because they might be at full leisure from their vineyards, (for it was about the time of making wine) that they might be at full leisure to attend and meet together, they appointed the meeting to be on a Sunday, as the most leisure day, when they might be spared from their attendance upon their vineyards, and in order to have a full meeting. Mr. Fabrigas, in the mean time, uses all pains, (as if an election was going forwards) he used all imaginary pains to get together as many people as he could muster to think with him, and to have this regulation of the governor abolished, and that the matter he complained of might be put an end to, and the matter he required enforced: but such was the sense of the inhabitants, that there was a majority, I am told, almost twenty to one, of all the Minorquins who attended upon that Sunday; all pleased with what had been done by governor Johnston, and desirous to continue that regulation. They found it most beneficial to themselves; they found it attended with least trouble; they found it most for their profit: they all were against their countryman Fabrigas, and all prayed that the establishment made by governor Johnston, and had continued to that time, might still be used and continued without any alteration. Fabrigas was now very much dissatisfied. Now I will tell you a new objection. All this is unlawful, because it was on a Sunday, and the sense of the people taken upon a Sunday is no sense at all; a further instance of the turbulence of his disposition! All was wrong; and, at the same time, a threat that he would now prefer a petition, and he would take care that there should be two hundred men armed at his heels! Now let me ask any man that hears me, what the governor was to do? The governor (whose spirit was not inferior to his other qualities that make up the character of a gentleman and a soldier) was not to be so frightened. He was a stranger to personal fear; and a Minorquin appearing at the head of two hundred people armed, though it is serious, and deserves consideration—however, the governor's spirit was such, he did not convoke any force in order to repel this: but he took a very wise step; and that was (for the next day was the time of this insurrection he had cause to apprehend), he gave an invitation to the commanding officers of the different regiments, to meet him next morning; and if there had been any force at the heels of Mr. Fabrigas, the commanding officers being then in the house, it would not take up any time, perhaps, to summon their force to repel it: but he would not summons the force of the island any farther than I tell you. At the time this petition was to be presented by Fabrigas with two hundred men at his heels—I mistake; the petition was then presented, and he would come for an answer the next morning with a force of 200 men at his heels—the governor thought proper to ask the advice of the officers who attended there, what ought to be done with this man, and what was fit to be done? Every one of the officers who attended upon the occasion concurred in the opinion—and it was a matter about which I think there could not be two opinions,—that nothing was safe to be done, but immediately laying hold of this man the first opportunity, and sending him out of the island. And he did so. There is the complaint. Now, gentlemen, I have let you into the whole history why this was done that Fabrigas complains of; why Fabrigas was kept close, as he complains of. A man that threatened an insurrection in the island, it surely would be imprudent in the governor to suffer any of his friends in the island to have access to him: general Mostyn therefore sent him off as soon as possible, which I believe was four or five days, into Spain, with a prohibition to return to the island again within the course of a year. But all this, say they, this is tyrannical, this is arbitrary; this is what English government, and English laws, and an English court of justice cannot bear. Say they, it is a very improper behaviour in governor Mostyn, and ought to be the subject, the matter of a civil action: Mr. Fabrigas therefore does very right to take a voyage over to England, to come here to Guildhall, and take the sense of an English jury upon governor Mostyn's behaviour. Let me observe to you, this is not a novel proceeding; for though, very fortunately for governor Mostyn, it is the first time that he has had an occasion to behave in this way, and to proceed in this particular manner; yet former governors of this island, upon much less occasions and emergencies than this, have done the very like thing. Do not be astonished, gentlemen, nor let it fright you, when I tell you, that the governor has an absolute right to do it, and is accountable to nobody but the privy-council. The government of that island is, in many respects, an arbitrary government, and as despotic, in many instances, as any of the governments in Asia, particularly in the part now in question; and yet governor Mostyn would be sorry, for his own character's sake, if it was in his power, to take any legal advantages concerning the impropriety of bringing the action here in England. His character calls upon him, which is to him the first of all considerations, to explain his conduct in the fullest manner possible. A general acquittal of him upon the idea that the law won't punish him, would be but a poor satisfaction to governor Mostyn, who is charged in this action with having exercised a tyrannical power. Gentlemen, the general tenor of the general's behaviour, from the time of his being first appointed to this government five years ago, to the moment he last left the island, has been to preserve and to maintain order and good government, without a wish, or rather an abhorrence, to oppress any one man that is under his government there: least of all could he ever wish to oppress or injure this man, too inconsiderable in his own particular private station of life, too remote from a connexion or acquaintance with the governor, for him to have made him the object of vindictive—I won't call it justice, but of any vengeance or resentment upon any occasion whatsoever. When the man made a complaint, he wished to enquire into the grounds of it; and when he found it was groundless, and the man reiterated the complaint, however he might be teased by this reiterated complaint, (for it is grievous and troublesome to a man to be teased with new remonstrances and petitions, when he sees the impropriety and impossibility of granting what is requested) still takes all possible occasion to enquire into the grounds of the complaint, to answer the complaint. But when, after every means had been tried, the man threatens the dissolution and destruction of government in the island, it became his duty then to treat this with some seriousness: and yet for the general good of the island he did it, never complaining of these two hundred men that were to be armed, only laying hold of the man himself, and, as soon as a ship could be got, to send him out of the island. And now governor Mostyn is called upon in an action. The laws of a foreign country, gentlemen, are matters of fact here; and it is very well worthy consideration—it is very well worthy consideration indeed (I do not mean to trouble you with a discussion of that question; but since his lordship has hinted about it, it is very well worthy of consideration) whether such conduct, upon such occasions, in such a place, can be the subject of litigation in a court of justice in England; it is very well deserving of consideration. I know very well, upon a former occasion, when an action was brought against the governor of the island of Barbadoes, by a man who succeeded in his absence to the government, without any particular appointment so to do, and having been guilty, in the governor's absence, of some male practice, (he was appointed by him, but had not took the oath) there was an action in that case brought against the governor for some proceedings against his deputy, as was the subject of an action, and there was judgment in that case given for the plaintiff; but a writ of error being brought, and that being removed afterwards to the house of lords, that judgment was reversed. As well as I recollect it, one of the chief grounds insisted upon on the part of the defendant was, that being a matter abroad,—(for that it was upon demurrer to a plea)—that being upon a matter abroad, it was not cognizable by the courts of justice in England. In answer to that, it was insisted—

Court. Was it not the main question in that trial, whether the council of state, or the governor of Barbadoes, had a power to commit?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. That was a question. I have Sir Bartholomew Shroton's parliamentary cases upon the table.

THE X x

Court. I think the courts held they had no power to commit: the house of lords held they had a power.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. Your lordship will find the particular reason of the reversal of the judgment is not stated, but only that the judgment was reversed. But one of the particular reasons was, that the island might be governed by particular laws, and that he was not responsible here for what he did there. To this it was answered and insisted upon by the other side, that they were governed by English laws; that they were not a conquered country; that they were inhabited by the subjects of the crown of Great Britain, who came of English or Britannick subjects, going from Great Britain to that country to reside and settle there, and were not like the case of a conquered country. The reason of it does not appear. Upon that report, the house of lords thought proper to reverse the judgment. In the present case, see how strong it is! for every objection made upon that case applies with double force here. Suppose it comes to that question of law, will not that question be of too great magnitude for me to say a single syllable about it? This that I have now mentioned, and your lordship has gone before me in what I was going to say, is a very important question of law indeed; a very great question; a question of the first magnitude, and which will therefore deserve to be discussed and determined by the highest court of justice this kingdom is acquainted with. It is a question of infinite difficulty and great importance, with regard to the responsibility of the governor in a conquered island, with respect to their being amenable to foreign subjects, with regard to being amenable for their conduct.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. They are the descendants of foreigners, all of them.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I mean those that are born in Minorca, descend from the ancient inhabitants of the island. They are subject to be governed by whatever laws the king of Great Britain shall think proper to impose upon them. The king of Great Britain may, if he pleases, alter his government of that island, and give what laws he pleases under a general ratification; and they are all bound by it. I say, a discussion of that question, as a question of law, is of great magnitude. I do not mean to trouble you with it. To be sure, it is too much for my grasp; it is too much perhaps for the grasp of any one man sitting in judgment, much more for me standing here as a counsel, who have no judgment at all, only a duty I owe my client; and perhaps, and most probably, it will be a question to be referred to the determination of the court above. And you, at the same time, will certainly, if you think proper to find a special verdict in this cause, which I suppose you will, you will do well to consider the subject with regard to the damages, which we call contingent damages: it was therefore exceeding fit to mention all those circumstances to you, not only with regard to the matter of fact, but also for your consideration with regard to the damages. For suppose (it is upon that ground I now address you) suppose the governor mistook the law upon this occasion; suppose he was wrong, and ought not to have proceeded in this way; suppose that notwithstanding all the opinions he had took, as well from the civil officers in their different departments, the law officers, and the assessor judges, and so forth, confirmed by all the military officers, whom he assembled together upon the threat of the insurrection; suppose, notwithstanding all these opinions, he ought, instead of doing what he did, rather to have kept this man a prisoner, and brought him before some tribunal to be tried: suppose that ought to be his conduct; that therefore he did wrong, instead of it, to imprison the man immediately, and banish him, upon his own authority; now to be sure the assessment of damages by you must go upon that supposition. I think I speak fairly upon the occasion: I mean in this and all other occasions to act with character: I suppose that to be so: what mighty damages ought, on that occasion, to be given against the governor? He in that instance mistook the line of his duty; he acted as he thought for the best, for the safety of the island; but he acted precipitately. Why, let Mr. Fabrigas or his friends (for I do not know whether he is in England himself or no), let them put one question to themselves to decide it. If general Mostyn had done the thing, the not doing of which they now complain of; if general Mostyn had brought this man to a trial, what might have been his fate? The least surely could have been that which he now complains of, banishment for a single year; for with regard to the imprisonment, it is not an unusual thing in any country. Upon great and emergent occasions, it is not an unusual thing to confine a man for a few days, and debar him the access of his friends: that is not an extraordinary thing. But suppose in that he did wrong: I will suppose the whole to be wrong. Wherein is it wrong? It is wrong from a misapprehension of judgment, from a mistake: it is wrong merely in respect to mistake. It is not wrong from malice, from wilful wickedness towards this man, from a tyrannical disposition, from a desire to oppress or hurt him. If this had been the case; if the governor, respectable as his character is, could for a moment be suspected to be capable of acting in this manner, from tyrannical, cruel, or wicked motives, he would have done ill to call upon me to be his advocate; for though even in that case I would discharge my duty towards him, I could not have spoke with cheerfulness for him. But here I consider him, and the whole tenor of his conduct bids me so to do, as a gentleman willing to discharge his duty to the crown; to preserve this island, as it is his duty, to the commonwealth of England; willing to do all that was good, right, and just, without any vindictive motive to this man, to whom he is a stranger. But upon this occasion the governor will pardon me, if I take notice upon this occasion, of what is too well known ever to be questioned, his general good character. And yet I have less need to ask his particular pardon upon this occasion, because that gentleman from whom I received my instructions, the attorney in the cause, has filled my brief with, I think, not less than thirty of the first names in this kingdom, who, I am told, are all attending here, or within a moment's call from this hall, some of the most respectable characters in this kingdom, some of the highest rank, and gentlemen of the first character in this kingdom, to tell you that they have at different times served under general Mostyn, and that they do not know in all their acquaintance, a man of a more cool, dispassionate temper, a man of greater character, humanity, and justice, than general Mostyn; as celebrated for it as any man of any rank or of any degree of honour in the world: and yet general Mostyn must be supposed, in order to justify vindictive or exemplary damages upon this occasion, must be supposed to be actuated by motives which his heart abhors, and which motives never actuated his heart a moment in his life. I leave it upon this idea, that if he has acted improperly in every step, yet, upon the idea of its being a mistake in general Mostyn, I apprehend the plaintiff has no right to expect exemplary damages.

Mr. Serjeant Burland. I suppose it is a fact admitted between us, that this is a conquered island, ceded by the treaty of Utrecht?

Mr. Lee. Minorca was ceded to this crown by the 11th article of the treaty of Utrecht.

JAMES WRIGHT, esq. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Burland.

Q. You resided some years in Minorca?

A. From about January 71, to the middle of 72.

Q. In what character?—A. As secretary to the governor.

Q. To Mr. Mostyn?—A. Yes.

Q. You know the division of the island, do you?—A. Yes.

Q. What are the districts they are divided into?

A. I believe originally five; but two are blended together, that there now are but four.

Q. Do you mean to include in one of these districts the suburbs of the fort of St. Phillip's?—A. They never do, when speaking of them; that is, extrajudicial of the common officer of the island.

Q. Under whose particular jurisdiction is that?

A. I always understood it to be under the direction of the governor.

Q. What do you call that district?—A. The arraval of St. Phillip's.

Q. Are you sure you understood it to be distinct and separate from all the other districts?

A. Yes; inasmuch that I was always led to believe, and told, that no magistrate of Mahon, which is the district next adjoining to it, ever did go there, or could go there, to exercise any sort of function, without leave had of the governor; and whenever there was occasion to send any of them down there, the fort-major received orders for their admission.

Q. Are these laws varied at any time, and by what authority?

A. The island is governed by Spanish laws, subject to be varied by the governor, with regard to all interior matters. A proclamation of the governor is as binding there to try a man upon a trespass as any laws whatsoever, subject to be varied by the order of the governor; not in respect to property, not with regard to meum and tuum, but with regard to the internal police.

Q. What do you mean by proclamation?

A. That if the governor issues a proclamation, and inflicts a penalty for the breach of it all over the island, and if any person is guilty of the breach of that proclamation, he is subject to the penalty of it, and for want of payment is imprisoned.

Q. I suppose you mean they enforce an obedience to that proclamation by imprisonment?

A. There is there the chief justice criminal, and the chief justice civil: both have their separate courts. If the governor's proclamation is broke with any penalty annexed to it of imprisonment or fine, the man is seized and brought into that court: the proclamation is exhibited against him, and by that he is condemned to either fine or imprisonment, though that proclamation was made perhaps but the day before.

Q. According as that proclamation affects, whether a civil or criminal matter?—A. I do not recollect any of a civil matter.

Court. What are the nature of the proclamations you are speaking of?

A. In all the memorials presented to the governor, he issued an order, that no memorials or petitions, except for mercy, should be presented to him without being signed by an advocate admitted in the courts.

Q. You mean governor Mostyn issued this?—A. Yes.

Q. Whether, tho' the Minorquins by the treaty of Utrecht are governed by the Spanish laws, yet whether our government here do in fact, or not, from time to time make alterations and regulations in those laws?

A. The king in council, upon all occasions of application to them, issue out such orders as the case requires, and they are recorded in the royal court there, and are as binding as any laws whatsoever.

Q. They are registered there, are they not?—A. Yes.

Q. What do you call the royal court?

A. The court of royal government is the criminal and the civil court.

Q. You know Mr. Fabrigas?—A. Perfectly well.

Q. What is he in the island?

A. I was directed by governor Mostyn, who was very much teased by his repeated applications, to enquire what sort of a man he was.

Q. First, as to his quality in the island; what station is he?

A. His father holds some vineyards, very small. He himself I believe actually, for his bread, labours and digs and prunes the vineyards, and talks and chatters about politics perhaps five days out of six. It has been repeatedly said, Mr. Fabrigas is a man of property. I believe he had at that time no property upon the earth. General Mostyn ordered me to make enquiry, and that was the result of it.

Q. We know what the station of general Mostyn is; that he was then and is now lieutenant-governor of Minorca; that he is commander of a regiment, and a man of family: what is his character as a man and as an officer? Is he a man of humanity?

A. I believe as much so as it is possible for a man to have; that is, in my opinion. I have seen much of him. I do not believe there exists in the world a man of tenderer feelings, for any ill effects that may be produced from him.

Q. Is that his general character?

A. I believe him to be much more so than common. I think that is his conduct that will be found upon every enquiry that can be made of him.

Q. And it has been so under your own knowledge?

A. I am sure of it: I have had many opportunities of seeing the working of it in a very surprising manner.

Q. Will you let us know as much as you do know of this transaction between Mr. Fabrigas and the governor?

A. May I refer to some minutes I have here?

Counsel. Yes.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. Did you take them at the time?

A. No; but all within three days. I hope I shall be excused if I should make any mistakes in respect to date. Mr. Fabrigas presented a memorial, I believe to myself, to be delivered to governor Mostyn—that was the 31st of July 71—complaining that Mr. Allimundo, the mustastaph, the only officer in the arraval—I think that was the first petition, complaining of some abuses in buying wine. The governor said, what does the fellow want? He bid me order Allimundo to answer it, for he knew nothing about it. I sent for Allimundo up to the head-quarters. The mustastaph is the only civil officer of St. Phillip's, that is, in the arraval: he is put in by the governor, and turned out by him at pleasure.

Q. Did you order Allimundo to give in an answer to it?

A. I sent for him, and desired him to come up to me. I gave him the memorial, and told him it was the governor's orders that he answered it. Upon Allimundo's answer coming up, it was read to the governor.

Counsel. That answer is dated the 8th of August 71?

A. I read it to the governor. The governor ordered me to tell Mr. Fabrigas and Allimundo, by an interpreter, that he was very well satisfied with the defence Allimundo had made to Fabrigas's charge. I told them both so. Fabrigas came again, and desired to see the defence that Allimundo had made. I told him I was not authorized to shew it him, nor did I think it was a matter for him to demand. He came again the next day, or the day after, giving in another memorial, desiring that that might be shewn to the governor.

Counsel. That was delivered the 13th of August?

A. Yes: in short, desiring to see the justification of Allimundo, and shifting the ground of his complaint, and, I think, adding another article.

Q. You shewed these two memorials to the governor?

A. I did. Governor Mostyn ordered that Dr. Markadal, who then acted as chief justice civil, should receive and hear any complaints that Fabrigas had to make against Allimundo; and he added to him the advocate fiscal, the second officer in the island that acts under the king's commission: the chief justice civil is the first, the chief justice criminal is the second, the advocate fiscal is the third, next after the governor: he gave them authority to fend for papers and persons, and whatsoever might be useful in the inquiry in his name. By my memorandum, I think it was the 20th of August, that these two law gentlemen, as commissioners, met, and ordered Fabrigas and Allimundo, who were then present, to attend them the 23d following. It may be necessary to observe, that though these two gentlemen were then sitting in their own civil courts, they acted as commissioners of inquiry, because the man was one of the arraval of St. Phillip's. I won't charge my memory by oath, but I am very sure they had a separate commission on purpose under the governor's own seal.

Q. Was the inquiry made?

A. On the 23d, Fabrigas declared he would proceed no further till he was allowed to see the defence that Allimundo had made, and given in to the governor.

Q. Where was that declaration made?

A. In the court before the commissioners. Mr. Fabrigas presented a third memorial to governor Mostyn, saying nothing more than what he had said before the commissioners, that he could not proceed till he had seen Allimundo's answer to his petition.

Q. Before the third memorial that was presented, had the commissioners made any report?—A. None.

Q. Do you recollect whether the third memorial was after or before the report?—A. I am pretty sure before.

Mr. Serjeant Burland. That is the third memorial, containing the 12 articles he exhibits against Allimundo: there is no date to it.

Q. Can you fix the date to that?

A. I think it must be between the 23d and 26th of August. General Mostyn referred him to the commissioners.

Q. What was done afterwards?

A. The commissioners reported to the governor, that Mr. Fabrigas, by the manner of his carrying on this accusation against Allimundo—

Q. When was their report?

A. The 24th or 25th of August, I imagine: here is their report.

Court. I dare say this report he is speaking of now, don't contain the commissioners answer about the 12 articles?—A. There are two reports.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. I took a great deal of pains to collect dates, and I did it from the contents: I believe they were right, as I opened it.

A. There were two reports, one the 31st of August, the other the 4th of September, that Fabrigas, by the manner of carrying on this charge, intended to sow dissension.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. Mr. Wright, I find, confounds two reports together: it is the third report where they report that it is to breed sedition.

Q. Then he presented this third memorial containing the 12 articles?

Mr. Justice Gould. My brother Davy stated, that it was the 10th of September that they took notice of the articles.

Q. Was there another report about the 10th of September?

A. Yes, there is. On the 26th of August the governor ordered me to desire the criminal chief justice, and the civil chief justice, the advocate fiscal, and the secretary to the court of the royal government, to come to me next morning, that being the 26th. Fabrigas came there. I asked him in the governor's name, by an interpreter, what he meant: whether a civil prosecution to recover damages against Allimundo, which he had sustained? or whether he meant to make an example of him for any abuse he had committed in his office? These gentlemen were present.

Q. What answer did he make?

A. None; I could get no answer from him.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. That is, upon the articles.

Court. Is that subsequent to the delivery of the articles?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. Yes.

Q. This question arose upon his presenting the 12 articles to the governor?—A. Upon the whole of his conduct.

Q. But that was after he presented the articles?—A. Yes.

Q. What did he say to that?

A. He said nothing. I desired him to make some kind of answer, that I might tell the governor. His answer at last by extortion was, that if I would give him a quarter of an hour, he would go and come back with an answer.

Q. Being confounded at the question at first, and giving no answer for some time, at length he said that?

A. He did not know which he wanted, nor what he wanted. He gave no answer at last, but only asked that he might have a quarter of an hour. I told him that he was not confined to a quarter of an hour; but it being then between 10 and 11 o'clock, I believed that they would be so attentive to him, that he might call again at 12 o'clock if he pleased. He came back again within the time, and gave notice that he meant a civil action.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. I would not interrupt this evidence, as it does not appear to be of great consequence to us; but I submit to your lordship, whether this is properly evidence, the answer being conveyed through an interpreter? and whether the interpreter should not be produced, who knows what answers were given?

Mr. Lee. We are now to take the answer from a man that does not know what the questions were, in a language the witness does not understand, and consequently cannot report if there were any, or what answers given; whereas there is a man living in the world who could report the answers that were given. I should not object to it, if that gentleman could himself understand the answers that were given.

Mr. Justice Gould. I think it is very clearly sufficient evidence.

Mr. Peckham. The interpreter was appointed by the governor, or by his order, therefore we cannot tell whether that interpreter gave the fair and true constructions of the conversation which passed between Mr. Fabrigas and Mr. Wright; but from the person appointing him, we have reason to apprehend the contrary.

Court. First, it is very clear, from what Mr. Wright says, and I suppose nobody will doubt from the subsequent action, but what this interpreter very fairly and rightly interpreted that this man desired to have a quarter of an hour to consider of it: that is clear. He has two hours given him. He comes back again, and then the same interpreter officiates. The act proves that he had explained the first very clearly, because he went away in consequence of it.

A. The assessor criminal talks as good English as any gentleman in court, and he, whenever there was the least mistake or confusion of sound or words, set it right instantly. He returned again, and said he meant a civil action.

Q. How long time do you think he was absent?

A. Within two hours, probably an hour, the assessors both of them walked out and came in again. The commissioners not finding Mr. Fabrigas would attend them, were desired by the general to send him an answer in writing to fix questions.

Q. When was this?

A. Subsequent to his saying he would proceed by civil action.

Q. I suppose then that meeting broke up?

A. Yes. The governor consented that he might have a civil action against him. I reported it to the governor.

Q. Did you tell him of that?

A. I never saw him afterwards, but the judges present heard him say he meant a civil action. They told him they would admit it.

Mr. Peckham. Did you hear that?

A. Yes, I did. I was to signify to him that the governor assented to his having a civil action, if he chose it.

Q. And was it signified to him?—A. Yes, it was.

Q. You say he did not proceed by a civil action, and therefore fix questions were proposed to him?

A. The assessor civil came to the governor, and informed him this man did not proceed in a civil action: then the governor sent six questions to him.

Q. How long after was it that they were sent him?

A. I cannot recollect.

Q. Was it the same day?

A. No; it might be three or four days. The general sent for his own information six questions, relative to the conduct complained of, of the mustastaph, for the opinion of the chief justice civil, whether the mustastaph had or not exceeded his commission. The questions are in court, and the answers.

Q. Is there any date to these six questions?

A. The mustastaph of St. Phillip's hearing this great confusion, in which he was the great person complained of, spontaneously sent up an attestation, or rather a desire, of many of the inhabitants of the arraval of St. Phillip's, to request the continuance of the old regulations, and that the alterations proposed by Mr. Fabrigas might not be made. That was signed by a great number of them, and was as much the object of conversation there, as any thing ever was.

Q. Was any order made upon that, or what was done?

A. On Sunday the 8th of September, the governor having first asked Dr. Oliver's leave, a very considerable merchant in the town, a doctor of laws, and the chief justice civil, he gave them a commission to go the next morning, the Sunday, to the arraval of St. Phillip's, to a country-house the the governor has there, that is called Stanhope's Tower, telling them he would give directions to all the people that dealt in wine, that they should come before them separately to be examined, and give their opinions, and whether they chose the new resolutions, or to adhere to the old rule.

Q. What do you mean by asking Dr. Oliver's permission?

A. He was no officer. For them to say whether they chose the new institution of general Johnston, or whether they chose the general sale of wine, as every body pleased. A great many of them did appear the next morning; I suppose all: I understood at least all that chose to come.

Q. What was done?

A. They reported to the governor, that 93 were for the then practice, (that is, general Johnston's institutions) 41 were for the old regulations, and 6 appeared to be indifferent, and 4 wanted some alterations of their own.

Q. Which were the old ones?

A. They never were in practice in the arraval of St. Phillip's; but, upon all the enquiry, they could find that the king's regulation subsisted about six months, and made great confusion, but that the regulation of 1752 never obtained at all in the arraval of St. Phillip's.

Q. When was this reported, and dated?

A. The 8th of September; that was on a Sunday.

Q. What followed? Was this reported to the governor?

A. Yes; but the governor was well informed of what had passed on the Sunday. Mr. Fabrigas came on the Monday morning with a new memorial, complaining that it was Sunday; and he protested against what was done, and that Dr. Oliver, and the chief justice civil, had used threats and menaces to the people.

Q. Then the next memorial I have in my hand is Dr. Markadal and Dr. Oliver's?

A. The governor was so exceedingly cautious in every thing, whether of consequence or not, upon this nonsensical memorial, that he submitted every transaction to the people of the island. He sent this report to Dr. Markadal and to Dr. Oliver, for them to answer. They answered it on the 10th.

Q. What followed the next day after that?

A. I think it was the same day Fabrigas came for an answer, the 10th, which was Tuesday. He came to me to desire an answer to his memorial about the Sunday affair. I was not at home. He enquired then for the governor's aid-de-camp, and gave him the memorial.

Q. Here is another of the 10th of September, of Dr. Francisco Segui, and Dr. Markadal's.

A. Francisco Segui is the advocate.

Q. That was an opinion of their's, as the lawyers of the island?

A. I fancy that accompanied the answer to the articles; I cannot be positive to dates. Returning home, I met Mr. Antonio Fabrigas immediately after he had been with the governor's aid-de-camp; I think the 10th. I rather avoided having anything to say to him: I had had so much, I was quite satisfied. He came to me. I called Segui, a priest, and got John Vedall, who served for an interpreter, and who happened to be in the street, almost under the governor's wall. I desired Mr. Fabrigas in the most civil manner I could, having done so fifty times before, to say what he wished or wanted. If he would only point out what he wished, it should be done: I would undertake to answer, the governor meant to do any thing that he wanted; but that he had acted in such a manner hitherto, that no body knew how to please him. Mr. Vedall, who knew this matter, as every body in the island did, joined with me in desiring him to go home and mind his family affairs. All his answer to me was, complaining of the enquiry being on a Sunday. I told him that it could not be altered. John Vedall joined with me in desiring him to go home, and not bring mischief upon himself. John Vedall told me, he said he would come again the next day with one hundred and fifty people. I think it was under his interpretation, though I had the priest there some part of the time.

Q. from the Jury. Was it armed men?—A. No, no.

Q. What did he say?

A. He would come with one hundred and fifty men to back the petition, or whatever the word was, with a petition and one hundred and fifty men, or with a petition backed by one hundred and fifty men.

Q. from the Jury. What do you apprehend he meant by that expression?

A. Upon my word I caught at the expression, and desired John Vedall to desire him to desist from such an idea; which John Vedall did, and treated it as laughing: but if I understood any thing by it, it was not to come with guns, for they had no such thing, but to come as a mob.

Q. from the Jury. Did he speak Spanish or English at the time?

A. Minorquin.

Q. What was the other interpreter's name?

A. Segui, a priest, one of the Spanish priests: he was there the first part of the time, and John Vedall the latter part.

Court. And then in consequence of that, you thought he meant a mob?

A. Yes; or I should not have got John Vedall to enter into a long conversation to desire him to desist.

Q. What did he say upon that?

A. He went on, I believe, repeating the same again. I believe the conversation was closed upon that.

Q. from the Jury. Has Allimundo, by virtue of his office of mustastaph, any particular limited quantity of wine to sell?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. When the papers are read, that will be particularly spoke to.

Q. You informed the governor of what was said about 150 men?

A. Yes.

Q. What passed after that?

A. I think on Wednesday, the governor sent his compliments to most of the officers of the corps, desiring they would come to him the next morning, to see the honour that was to be done to him.

Q. Did they meet there?

A. There were most of them there. Every one, I believe, expected a full meeting of the inhabitants of St. Phillip's.

Q. What meeting was That that was expected?

A. Those people Fabrigas had spoke of. They waited some time, and at last four people came, (I think all four were shoe-makers) and they brought a memorial. I believe a gentleman is in court that received it from their hands. He took the memorial of them, read it, and I think colonel Mackellar, after reading it, told them that they were to go about their business, to go home peaceably, and behave themselves as good subjects to his majesty ought to do. I think there was a conversation preceding, to shew they did not know the contents of that memorial they were delivering, which I believe will, by-and-by, come out. The general asked the opinion of the general officers, as well as I recollect, whether they all knew that this was founded by Fabrigas's proceeding? and the next day he asked them what they understood by it? They said they understood that the man was to be banished the island.

Q. You was not there when they gave their opinions, I believe?

A. I cannot tell.

Q. And so, in consequence of it, he was banished the island?

A. The general ordered him, in consequence of that, to be taken up that night. He could not be found. The general sent to the chief justice civil, and the chief justice criminal, and the advocate fiscal, to know what he should do in that case; that he thought him not safe to be left at large in the island. They told him.

Q. from Mr. Serjeant Glynn. Was you present, or do you speak from information?

A. I am speaking of what they told me: I was sent by the governor to ask their opinion. This is their answer.

Q. What was you to ask of them?

A. The governor's power upon this occasion. They said, the governor's power extended over the man, and he might do with him what he pleased; and if he chose to banish him, they would answer for it with their ears.

Q. These gentlemen are themselves Minorquins?

A. Yes; and both talk very good English.

Court. This answer you carried back to the general?

A. Yes; and they told it him viva voce. The chief justice civil, upon my having many doubts about it myself, and saying that it was not quite the idea of Englishmen, and that we had not any such law in England, said it over and over again. He gave me a piece of paper with his own hand, which he called a quotation from the law of that land, a royal order in the year 1500 and something else; a positive order from the then king of Spain, wherein the king says, that the opinion of the assesseur criminal is consultative only; that the governor may be guided or not by it, as he pleased; but not so in civil cases. Although the governor is absolute in regard to the politics and oeconomical government of the island, it is not improper, but very prudent, to take the advice of the assesseur criminal, as has been recommended by the king of Spain to the governor; although it must be observed, that in these cases the assesseur only gives his advice, and consequently it is in the governor whether he will follow it or not, and is not decisive, as in civil cases. This man being a Minorquin, the governor wanted to know how he should apprehend him, no officer of his knowing him. The assesseur criminal said, that the officer that attended him as tipstaff was an old fellow. Says the other, 'You shall have mine, who is a young able man:' and he was apprehended by the tipstaff who walks before the assesseur civil every day of his life when he goes in or out of court.

Q. How long was he kept in prison?

A. I do not know; the books will shew it.

Q. Was he put in the common and usual prison?

A. There is no other prison in the arraval of St. Phillip's, but where he was put, I believe.

Q. Why do they call it No. 1?—A. I do not know.

Court. It has been particularly described to me and to the jury as the prison where capital offenders are confined, and is called No. 1: why is it called No. 1, if there is not some other prison?

A. There are gentlemen better informed of the castle of St. Phillip's than I am. I believe there is no other prison. That may be No. 1. room in the prison.

Cross-examined by Mr. Serjeant Glynn.

Q. I think you told us your residence in Minorca was about a year and a half: who was governor during the time of your residence?

A. Upon our arrival there, the lieutenant-governor commanded; and upon our arrival the command devolved upon general Moslyn.

Q. Then the command immediately devolved upon him?

A. Within two days, or so.

Q. And the other two days Mr. Johnston, as his lieutenant, commanded?

A. I believe the general came there on Monday, and took the command on Thursday. Reports under general Johnston's signature that the governor was arrived made it necessary.

Q. Then your experience of the laws of Minorca have been collected in that residence?

A. That is all I know of them in the world.

Q. Which has been during the government of governor Moslyn or his lieutenant. Now you told us, that the proclamation of the governor, with regard to the criminal court, was the same as a law; and you distinguish the court of Property, which regards meum and tuum, from it?

A. Quite.

Q. Do you mean that, without any limitation whatsoever? Suppose the governor intended to inflict a capital punishment upon any offender, must that law be obeyed by the judges?

A. I should imagine it would. It is only my imagination, observe.

Q. I think you was so kind before as to tell us, that though that proclamation came out but the morning before, it would be equally obligatory upon the courts of justice?—A. I understand so.

Q. Now this mustastaph, Allimundo, sells wine, does he not?

A. He makes wine of his own vineyards, and buys grapes of other people to make wine, and sells it in the arraval. He does not sell it retail.

Q. That

Q. That was a regulation of governor Johnston's?—A. I believe so.
 Q. I would ask you, whether Allimundo had not a lot himself to sell his wine, and exclude every other person?
 A. I think, as the papers are upon the table, they will speak for themselves. I think Allimundo for his own vindication urges—
 Q. But I ask you, of your own knowledge, whether the lot did not fall upon him?
 A. I believe he did not draw any lot at all; it is not the custom for the mustapha to draw lots.
 Q. You think he did not draw lots?—A. No.
 Q. You did not understand the Minorquin language?—A. No.
 Q. It is a mixture of Italian and Spanish?
 A. Yes, I believe so, and a kind of bad Spanish.
 Q. You have told us of the two interpreters: I think you don't recollect exactly the words the last interpreter said? You think father Segui was gone before Fabrigas said, 'I will come with a petition with 150 men, or backed by 150 men?'
 A. I cannot be sure; I think it was Vedall; and the more so, from his joining with me in endeavouring to persuade him from his intention.
 Q. I think you communicated this matter to the governor?—A. Yes.
 Q. Did you carry Vedall with you?—A. No.
 Q. Did you make any enquiry after the 150 people?—A. No.
 Q. You yourself was the person that reported the conversation to the governor?—A. Yes.
 Q. What time did you write this paper?
 A. I fancy the memorandums of that paper were wrote, I should think, I could not swear to it so particularly, I should think, within an hour of every one of these transactions happening.
 Q. Then I take it for granted, that this is a faithful copy of a faithful collection, according to your memory, within an hour and half after such transaction?
 A. It was not put down for the public eye, but to refresh my own mind.
 Q. Then you did not put down any thing which you did not believe to be true?
 A. No; I should not dream of such a thing.
 Q. How long after did you communicate to the governor what Fabrigas had said?
 A. I never was longer between communicating to Fabrigas what the governor said, and to the governor what Fabrigas said, than going from this wall to that; unless the governor was not arrived in the morning, and I waited his return.
 Q. Then you could make no mistake of what Fabrigas had said. You communicated to the governor what you put down: you are sure you are under no mistake on that head?
 A. I know I might mistake.
 Q. But I do not ask you about any misspelling or misdates, but the effect of the conversation?
 A. Upon my soul, I believe so.
 Mr. Serjeant Glynn. Then, sir, I will read it.—The same day Mr. Fabrigas came for an answer to his petition, and told the governor's secretary he should come the next day with a petition of people concerned in grapes and vines, which they will sign and come with themselves, to the number of 150.
 Mr. Serjeant Glynn. I desire it may be read; but I won't ask Mr. Wright any more questions.—(It is read by the associate.)
 Mr. Peckham. Pray read the next paragraph.
 On Wednesday the 11th, the governor, having the field-officers in and near Mahon with him, received a memorial from four men, signed by persons of St. Phillip's, desiring the old practice might be pursued: to which he answered, that the four men should return home, and behave themselves as good and peaceable subjects to his majesty ought to do.
 Mr. Lee. Your lordship will give me leave to ask upon this paragraph a question of Mr. Wright. Q. You say there were four men came with a memorial signed by persons of St. Phillip's, desiring the old practice might be pursued: did you see that memorial?
 A. I did.
 Q. Can you take upon you to affirm by what number it was signed?
 A. I shall speak merely from memory, for they were all scratches: I do not believe there were ten names legible to it.
 Q. What number of signatures were there upon this paper?
 A. I have already said I really and upon my word do not know.
 Q. Were there nearer 150 or 100?
 A. It is merely a matter of memory; there were from 41 to 47, I believe.
 Q. Now can you take upon you to affirm, that there were not more people signed this memorial than had signed the memorial for the new institution?
 Court. I understand it is in the report. There is a report of the assessor civil and Dr. Oliver, that 93 were for governor Johnston's institution, and 41 for the old regulation; 6 appeared to be indifferent, and 4 wanted some alterations of their own.
 Q. There were 90 odd for the new institution?
 A. My memorandum says so.
 Q. Can you tell me whether there were or were not upon this memorial which was brought by the four men, the signatures or requests of more or less than that number for the old institution?
 A. I have already said ten times, that I cannot take upon me to ascertain the number of signatures upon this last memorial; but I do know Allimundo proved many of them to be false.
 Q. You know that is not an answer to my question. I did not ask you what were the number of men that signed this memorial: I don't mean you should answer with that precision, whether 46, 50, or 150: but my question is, whether you can take upon you to affirm at this distance of time, that the memorial which was brought by four men was signed by more or less than 90?

 A. I can say no more: if I knew, I would tell you. I looked at the memorial, it was full of crosses; and what makes me think it was between 40 and 50 was, because I counted it.
 Q. Then you did count it?—A. I did begin to count it.
 Q. Did you proceed to count them through?
 A. What signifies answering that?
 Q. Because I expect an answer. What signifies counting numbers, and not going through it?
 A. I wish your head was capable of retaining every little circumstance of no consequence.
 Court. The gentleman means, whether you have now such a certain recollection of the number of signatures upon that paper as to say, whether there were more or less than 90?
 A. I don't recollect any thing but one—that is, that I began counting—any other circumstances that shall lead me to the number, whether I left off at 40 or what.
 Q. We understand that a considerable majority signed this very memorial—we want to know that fact?
 A. Every attention was employed, every argument used, and every possible means was taken, for finding out the true sense of the inhabitants; and amidst the various methods taken, there did not appear, when enquired into fairly and honestly, to be one in ten of all the names that were presented to the general in support of Fabrigas's complaint. Mr. Allimundo was supposed to be a man that would produce the truth.—The fort-major was sent to examine with him.
 Mr. Lee. The Serjeant will tell you, that is no evidence at all. Let me ask you, when this particular paper was copied that I have in my hand?
 A. As soon as I was at leisure to do it myself.
 Q. When was this particular paper copied?
 A. I have said half a dozen times, as soon as I had time to put all the bits of paper together—instantly.
 Q. Was this paper copied from a memorial in which this number is stated blank as it is here, or have you that original memorial by you?
 ---In whose possession was that memorial?
 A. Not in mine.
 Q. To whom was it given?—A. I think to colonel Mackellar.
 Q. He was an officer of the governor's?
 A. Commander in chief of the corps of engineers.
 Q. So he had the possession of that memorial, the contents of which you have stated by blank persons?
 A. All I can recollect of that particular memorial that you speak to is this, that four people brought it; it is a hard thing to be pinned down to such a thing as that. The mustapha himself was present. I think col. Mackellar was talking of this memorial: I think I had it out of his hand, and was going to read it, and count it. I believe he or Allimundo took it; and I believe Allimundo took it home to confute many of the names, which he did afterwards.
 Q. And that you conceive to be the reason why you did not get through them, why you did not proceed to tell the number?
 A. I should believe so, upon my word and honour.
 Q. You do still take upon you to affirm that there was nothing like the number in this, that there were for the other regulation?
 A. I did not attempt to say such a thing.
 Q. Upon the inspection you then had, you cannot take upon you to affirm that?
 A. I have told you all I know of it: I fancy there was much less.
 Mr. Serjeant Burland. You was asked about the lieut. governor being general Mostyn's lieut. governor; I believe the governor does not appoint his own lieut. governor?—A. No.
 Q. I believe those regulations made by general Johnston were some years before general Mostyn was governor?
 A. The date will shew it.
 Q. I suppose about 52?—A. O no; since that.
 Q. I meant 62?—A. I believe prior to the execution of the office of mustapha by Mr. Allimundo.
 Q. Prior to the time Mr. Mostyn was made governor?—A. Yes.
 Q. You was asked a good deal about that memorial that had these crosses upon it: you said Allimundo took it away with him in order to confute—
 A. I know he had it; I don't know whether he took it away.
 Q. Had the governor any reason to apprehend that those names at the bottom of that memorial were not put there by the persons?
 A. Yes, he had reason to believe it.
 Q. Did he enquire into it?—A. Yes.
 Q. What was the result of his enquiry?
 A. The report made to him was, that a certain number of their names were absolutely forged; that the hands of others were obtained under a supposition that the memorial related to oil.
 Court. You said just now, that upon a strict enquiry there did not appear above one in ten; did you yourself make enquiry of what was the general sense of the inhabitants?
 A. To every body, and with every body that could possibly give me information; and from the general conversation I had, it did not appear to me that there was, I might say one in twenty that ever wished it; and it would be worth your lordship's attention to see what these regulations are.
 Court. Then by the general's direction you made the strictest enquiry you possibly could, to see what the sense of the people might be, and did not find above one in ten that wished for this alteration that Fabrigas desired?
 A. I, according to my own opinion, give a great allowance when I say that.
 Q. Did you inform the governor of this?
 A. When

A. When I use the word report, I don't mean an idle story picked up from one or other, but a military term, an answer to the enquiries made by the governor.

Q. Then the intelligence you conveyed to the general was, that the opinion of by far the greater majority was against this Fabrigas's desire?

A. All almost: I save my oath by saying almost, but there was almost all.

JOHN PLEYDEL. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Walker.

Q. You was aid-de-camp to general Moslyn, I believe?—A. Yes.

Q. Upon the 9th of September 71, give an account of what you know of this affair when Fabrigas came to the governor's?

A. He asked me to see the governor in the morning. I told him he could not then see the governor, but I was aid-de-camp to the governor, and any favour or any thing he had for the governor I was ready to receive. After a little hesitation he gave me a paper, a memorial: he desired at the same time I would inform the governor that he should come the next day for an answer; he said he should come accompanied by 200 or 250 of the inhabitants of St. Phillip's.

Q. Two hundred or 250?

A. I don't exactly remember the words.

Q. Was that all the conversation you had with him?

A. Yes. I immediately acquainted the governor with this message: I read the memorial to the governor immediately, and informed the governor of what he had said to me. I think it was that day the governor sent to the field-officers of the garrison and to the commanding officers of the corps, to meet at his house the next day, in order that they might be witnesses of the manner in which he should receive this Fabrigas and the people he mentioned to come along with him. Only four men came the next day, and brought a memorial.

Q. Were any of the commanding officers there?

A. Yes; I think all the commanding officers were there when these men came.

Q. What were the sense of the commanding officers?

A. I think the sense of the commanding officers was, that, in short, this man should be taken up.

Q. Why would they take him up?

A. As a troublesome, seditious, and dangerous person in the island. The governor mentioned to me, that he had consulted the chief Minorquin judges of the island. I know he had consulted them, which corroborated the opinion of the field-officers that were there attending.

Q. Who is this Mr. Fabrigas?

A. An inhabitant of the arraval of St. Phillip's.

Q. Of that district that does not belong to the four where there are jurors?—A. Yes, and is close by the glacis of the fort.

Q. What has he there any property?

A. His father is alive; he takes care of his father's vineyards, I believe. That is all the property he has.

Q. That is, the liberty of working in his father's vineyard?

A. I believe so.

Q. What sort of a character does he bear there?

A. He is generally supposed to be a seditious, turbulent man; that is the general character of the man. General Moslyn is very far from being a tyrannical, overbearing man. I had more opportunity of knowing him; I served immediately under him the greatest part of the last war.

Q. A man of temper and humanity?—A. Yes, very much so.

Cross-examination, by Mr. Lee.

Q. You was aid-de-camp to general Moslyn?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you remember Fabrigas declaring that next day he would come accompanied with 250 men?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you know whether there had not been a dispute amongst the inhabitants, and upon which side there was a majority, whether for the new or old regulations?—A. I cannot tell.

Q. What were these 250 men to come for?

A. I imagined it was to give weight to the petition.

Q. Do you conceive that the object of Mr. Fabrigas was to bring 200 or 250 men that were of his opinion to give weight to his request?

A. Yes.

Q. My learned friend thought he meant to attack the garrison of St. Phillip's. You did not apprehend he meant to take the garrison of St. Phillip's, that stood out against the whole force of France for a considerable time, and, by the bye, might have stood out a great while longer? You did not understand that he was to come at the head of these armed peasants?—A. Not of armed peasants.

Court. You apprehend he was to bring these people to shew there were so many people to back his petition?

A. No; I apprehend he meant a mob that would breed confusion in the garrison.

Q. Whether you understood that he meant to bring these 200 people to occasion and raise a tumult, or whether he meant to bring so many people to shew they favoured his petition?

A. So many people together in a garrison would breed confusion.

Court. What did you understand?

A. I really thought he meant to give weight to his petition.

Q. Had you heard at the time that Fabrigas spoke of bringing 200 or 250 of his friends—had you heard of any dispute, whether there were more of one opinion, or more of the other; or had it been asserted that the people in general of the arraval of St. Phillip's were consenting to the new regulations?

A. I think the people in general wished to have the old regulation continued—I took it in that light.

Q. What do you mean by the old custom? the custom Fabrigas contended for, under the order of council in 52?—A. Yes.

Q. I dare say the Serjeant will not acknowledge that you mean that?

Mr. Serjeant Davy. No more he does.

Court. Do you mean by the old custom, that which was settled by governor Johnston?

A. I do; it was some years before general Moslyn came to the island.

Court. Or do you mean a custom that was before the order of 52?

A. I do not.

Mr. Lee. Then am I to understand you, that you think the majority of people were against the opinion of Mr. Fabrigas?

A. That is my opinion.

Q. Do you recollect that having been alledged to governor Moslyn as the general opinion?—A. Yes.

Q. Do you recollect that having been alledged to Fabrigas, that the popular opinion was against him?—A. I don't exactly recollect.

Q. Don't you recollect that the very end he had in view, and professed to have in view, in bringing a number of his friends and a number of people concerned in vineyards to present this memorial, was for the purpose of convincing the general that a majority of people were with him, and not against him?

A. I suppose he must mean so.

Q. Did not you understand him so at that time, when he talked of bringing a memorial, and coming accompanied by 200 or 250 men? Did not you understand him to mean that such a number of people that were concerned in the wine trade and in the produce of vineyards would come and signify that to be their intention?—A. Certainly he meant so.

Q. Was you present when the four men, not the 200 or 250, came with the memorial signed by others?—A. I was.

Q. Was that memorial ever in your hands?

A. I don't remember ever having it in my hands. I saw it in colonel Mackellar's hand, the chief engineer, when he questioned them about it; and these very people seemed shocked when he explained to them the tenor of the memorial. It was wrote in English, and they seemed not to understand the import of it.

Q. They were Minorquins?—A. Yes.

Q. Can you tell me what number of signatures were in that memorial?

A. I cannot guess at it: I should think much about 50 or 60, but cannot guess.

Q. You did not count them at all?—A. No.

ROBERT HUDSON. Examined by Mr. Buller.

Q. You was, I believe, fort-adjutant at this time?—A. Yes.

Q. Was any application made to you by the civil magistrates?

A. Yes; the mustaph of St. Phillip's came to me on the 10th or 11th of September, and told me, upon reading some orders of general Moslyn, that Fabrigas said he would come with a mob, and said they were null and void, and they would see better days to-morrow.

Mr. Peckham. You need not mention what the mustaph told you; that is not regular.

Counsel for Defendant. That is the regular method there.

Mr. Peckham. It may be regular there, but it is very irregular here, and cannot be admitted as evidence.

Mr. Justice Gould. I should be glad to know how the governor can be apprized of any danger, unless it is by one or other of his officers informing him there is likely to be such and such a thing happen? I suppose he gives the governor an account of what he has heard, then the governor makes an enquiry into the matter.

Mr. Peckham. Hearsay is no evidence. Besides, the mustaph is an interested and a prejudiced person; at least he appears so throughout the different parts of this cause. Now can what he has said in Minerva to this witness be admitted as evidence here? The mustaph is living; why don't they produce him? If they had brought him here, we should have his evidence on oath, and could cross-examine him to the facts.

Court. We do not take it for granted that it is really so; only that this gentleman, hearing of this, tells the governor.

Mr. Lee. It is no evidence of the fact: if you mean it only as a report, we do not object to it.

A. The mustaph told me, that upon giving out some orders to the inhabitants of St. Phillip's, some orders relative to the selling wine in St. Phillip's, he came with a mob, and said, 'It is null and void, and we will see better things to-morrow.' He further said, that if there were not some immediate measures taken with this Fabrigas, he was afraid of the consequence, the rising of the people.

Q. This was enough, I should think, to give an alarm. Did you acquaint the governor of it?—A. Yes, I did.

Q. What was done after that? Did the governor call you together?

A. I was not privy to what the governor did in consequence of this; my post was two miles off.

Court. Gentlemen of the jury, then all this comes to nothing; he proves no fact—

Mr. Serjeant Davy. No: this is to introduce the next evidence, of the governor summoning the officers together.

Q. You knew this Fabrigas; what was his behaviour in the island?

A. Extremely troublesome, as was represented to me: there never was any objection to governor Johnston's regulation till by this man. Governor Johnston did this, because the wine used to turn sour, by every body being allowed to sell wine at a time: they distressed one another by opening too many casks at a time. The general made this regulation, in order that no more might be opened at a time than could be sold before it was four.

Court. I chose to hear the reason and foundation of the regulation.

Q. What is the consequence of that among the soldiers?

A. Disorders of different kinds, fluxes and the like.

Court. There being no cellars, I suppose they could only buy from hand to mouth.

A. In general they are open sheds; they are hardly better than sheds.

Q. Did that produce any disagreements among the sellers themselves, that they undersold each other?

A. Some poor people, that had but little wine, were almost starved: the several years after governor Johnston made this regulation, there never was known to be a cask four.

Court. I was rather apprehensive that this might enhance the price.

A. The price was never raised upon that account.

Mr. Buller. There was an afforation price.

Mr. Lee. Yes; but this was a liberty of selling below it.

A. The town of St. Phillip's was divided into four divisions, and four people used to sell at a time.

Colonel PATRICK MACKELLAR. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Davy.

Q. Was you at the garrison in Minorca in 71?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you know Mr. Fabrigas before the time of his being apprehended?

A. I have known him by character a great while; they called him Red Toney.

Q. You happened to say you knew him by character; what was the character he bore?

A. A very bad one ever since I have been in the island, and for some time before.

Q. Of what sort?

A. He was seditious, troublesome; a drinking, gambling fellow; sat up of nights with low-life people; and he kept women.

Q. In short, he is a man of an ordinary character?—A. Yes.

Q. But the character that I wanted chiefly to be informed about was, concerning his obedience to government, whether he is a turbulent man?

A. I have had many complaints of him from two mustastaphs, when I have been commanding officer of the garrison.

Q. How long have you been there?

A. I was one of the first that went there when the island was restored after the last war, and had been there a good many years before. I went first in 36, and left it in 50. I went in May 63, and remained there till May last.

Q. Then you must be pretty well acquainted with the laws, and government, and constitution of this country?

A. I have a good deal of knowledge of it, as much as a military man can have: we cannot study these things as lawyers do.

Q. Pray is there not a district they call by the name of the arraval of St. Phillip's?—A. Yes.

Q. How far is that?—A. It is inclosed by a line wall on one side, and surrounded by water on the other.

Q. Pretty near to the fort?—A. Within a musket-shot.

Q. This district within this line is called the arraval of St. Phillip's?

A. Yes.

Q. What do you mean by the word royalty?

A. It is where the governor has a greater power than any where else; where the judges of the island cannot interpose their authority or power, but by his permission; and people of the arraval have particular privileges upon that account. The judges cannot convene any person to appear before them, but by the governor's approbation, within the arraval.

Q. It is not so in the other parts of the island?—A. No.

Q. You have, I believe, in the other parts of the island, officers called jurats?—A. Yes.

Q. Is there any such in the arraval?

A. No; the mustastaph is the only magistrate there.

Q. Then there is an officer within this royalty, within this arraval, called a mustastaph, who is the only magistrate there?—A. Yes.

Q. In other parts of the island there are other magistrates of different names, jurats and so forth?—A. Yes.

Q. Who is the mustastaph of the arraval of St. Phillip's appointed by?

A. The governor, or commander in chief, when there is no governor.

Q. Does he displace him at his pleasure?—A. Yes.

Q. What is the office of mustastaph?

A. He takes care of the weights and measures of markets; takes an account of all the wine that is made, and of the expenditure of the wine; and settles any little disputes among the inhabitants, in what they call the first instance.

Q. What, is that with regard to the afforation, or settling of the price of the wine?

A. That is done by the magistrates at Mahon. The magistrates of Mahon, as they do every where else, set a price upon the wine, which they call an afforation or market price, and the arraval of St. Phillip's is always ruled by the afforation at Mahon; the magistrates at Mahon do not put the price upon it, but it is always adopted.

Q. Who is the officer that in point of form settles the afforation price?

A. There are different prices in different terminos, but that is governed by the price that is fixed at Mahon. Mahon is the nearest district to St. Phillip's?

Q. Who is the person that in point of form does so adopt it?

A. The mustastaph is the officer that does, and he only signifies what the price is.

Q. He is the trumpet, the mouth by which they understand what is the afforation price, he being regulated and governed by the afforation at Mahon?

A. Yes; the price that is paid at Mahon is always paid at St. Phillip's.

Q. What is the general law? Are the Minorquins governed by the English or Spanish law, or what sort?

A. They always plead the Spanish laws, as it was settled by the treaty of Utrecht; but when the English laws are convenient for them, they plead them.

Q. So that which is convenient they will plead, those that are most suitable?—A. Yes.

Q. But which is the law that most prevails?

A. The Spanish law. When the island was given up, I believe nothing at all was settled with relation to them, and therefore we were supposed to receive them upon the same footing that the French had them; but since that time they made interest at home to restore to them the same laws and privileges that took place before the island was taken, that is, the Spanish laws.

Q. Was you there when the place was taken by the French?

A. No; I was in America.

Q. Pray what is the temper of the Minorquins in general? Are they well affected to the English government?

A. Some are very well, I believe; others are not so.

Q. Pray do you remember the occasion?—was you one of those that were invited to meet governor Mostyn, with the other gentlemen, upon the occasion of being consulted about Mr. Fabrigas?

A. I was, once or twice.

Q. Had you been acquainted that it was a matter of public notoriety of what had happened with regard to Fabrigas?

A. I have been at the presenting several memorials to the governor.

Q. Did you hear of the report of what had prevailed, the general talk of the place?—A. Yes.

Q. What was the universal opinion, if there was but one? or if there were various opinions, what was the opinion of you and the rest of the gentlemen that were called in?

A. The opinion of the other gentlemen as well as my own was, that he was a very dangerous and troublesome man. By his former history, and from some anecdotes of those times, it was thought a very unsafe thing to let him be at liberty; that it would be a right thing to take him up, and bring him to punishment, lest he, who was a man very likely to be practised upon, would take other measures productive of mischief.

Q. What was agreed upon?

A. It was in loose conversation thought best that he should be banished.

Q. According to the practice of former times, do you remember a practice of that kind having been done?

A. I have heard of several; when the English were in possession of the island, as well as when the Spaniards were.

Mr. Lee. This is proving a prescription.

A. I tell you what I have heard.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. It is impossible that it can be admitted: if he had known an instance, he might have mentioned it.

Court. It is one question, whether, according to the exigence of the case, the general might inflict this banishment? and another thing, whether it is the ordained law established in such a case to be applied to such behaviour? Now, if you go into a usage of that kind, you must prove particular facts, not produce this gentleman to say he has heard such things: it does not follow from hence that this might be the proper punishment.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. You have known general Mostyn, I believe, a great while?

A. Only since he became governor of the island.

Q. I wish to know of you, what is his character and behaviour?

A. I always heard a character of him as a good officer, a polite, well-bred man, that carried his command in the genteel manner.

Q. Is he a man of humanity, or rather ferocity?

A. I always understood him to be a man of great humanity.

Cross-examined by Mr. Lee.

Q. You say the general opinion of the field-officers was asked, of which you are one?

A. I do not believe the general opinion was asked; I believe it was private conversation.

Q. Did general Mostyn then call for your opinion, or the opinion of any other general officer, touching what he should do to Fabrigas?

A. Afterwards we thought upon the subject.

Q. After the man was gone to Carthagena?

A. The same day, perhaps an hour.

Q. The same day you was assembled there?—A. Yes.

Q. The day that Fabrigas had spoken of assembling a number of his friends together, the general sent to convene a body of you?—A. Yes.

Court. You was a field-officer?—A. Yes.

Court. Did you and the other field-officers meet together at the governor's?—A. We came there by his order, by his desire.

Q. He proposed to you then for your opinion, what should be done with this man; and you, partly from the former history, and partly from modern anecdotes, thought he should be banished?

A. Yes, I did so.

Q. That was the ground of the accusation; former history, and late anecdotes?—A. Yes.

Court. I shall certainly hear his evidence, if you ask him the motives and grounds.

Mr. Lee. I only ask whether I had taken it right.

Court. Did not you object to enquiring into former instances of banishment?

Mr. Lee. No; he has spoke of former instances of bad conduct in Fabrigas.

Q. Did any of you propose to the general, or did he propose himself, to have any trial of this gentleman before his banishment?

A. I believe he never did propose that; for the judges there gave it as their opinion, that that was lodged entirely in the governor's own breast; two of them particularly, that it was entirely in his own breast.

Q. And needs no trial at all?

A. I do not know that there was any form of trial there.

Q. You heard of no trial?

A. I heard no trial mentioned.

Q. You tell me the opinion of the field-officers was this?

A. Yes.

Q. A

Q. As I don't know exactly who all the field-officers were, and as I wish to deliver as many of them as I could from the imputation of that opinion, pray did major Norton concur in that opinion?

A. I do not remember particularly whether he did or not.

Mr. Serjeant Davy. That is, whether he was there or not?

A. He was there, but I do not remember what his opinion was upon the occasion.

Q. Then you cannot take upon you to say whether it was a majority of opinion, or unanimity of opinion?

A. A majority of opinion. I believe there might be a difference of opinion.

Q. Do you know a colonel or a major Rigby—I do not know what rank?

A. Major.

Q. Was he there?

A. Yes.

Q. Did he concur in that advice to the governor?

A. Both the gentlemen are here, and can tell. We were talking among one another; our opinion was in general.

Q. Those that chose to give an opinion in favour of banishment gave it, and those of another opinion either might give it or were silent?

A. It was not talking of giving an opinion, but talking of the man's case, and what ought to be done.

Q. Then you cannot tell what number dissented?

A. No.

Court. Were there any of the field-officers present that did dissent to it?

A. I do not remember that any did indeed.

EDWARD BLAKENEY. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Burland.

Q. I believe you officiated as secretary to general Blakeney?

A. Yes; I was there about seven years.

Q. What sort of power does the governor exercise in the arraval of St. Phillip's?

A. There is no writ; nothing can be executed there without his commission.

Q. What authority does he execute there?

A. An absolute authority; it is a royalty.

Q. Have you known any instance of people being sent out of the arraval?

A. A few months after general Blakeney's arrival, he banished two Franciscan friars immediately by his own authority.

Q. Where did he send them to?

A. To the continent.

Court. Into Spain?

A. I cannot tell whether to Spain or Italy?

Q. from Fury. Was it in peace or war this happened?

A. In peace time. They found the way to Rome, and complained to the general of the Franciscan order, who corresponded with the general upon the subject. Several letters passed; and general Blakeney wrote in one of his letters, if they did not behave better for the future, he said he would banish all the Franciscans out of the island, and make barracks of their convent. Intercession was made for them; they asked pardon for the offence they had committed, and upon a promise of behaving well they were allowed to come back.

Q. Did you ever hear that the power of the governor upon that or a like occasion was ever called in question in the island?

A. No; I took it for granted it was handed down by the Spanish governor, and they were governed by Spanish laws.

Q. Are they governed by Spanish laws?

A. Yes.

Q. We are told the arraval is a distinct jurisdiction from the rest of the island, and there is more authority exercised by the governor?

A. Yes; it is within gun-shot of the fort. The judges have applied to me to obtain leave for them to execute writs in the arraval.

Q. I don't know whether you remember any other instances of banishment but the two you have mentioned?

A. I remember an instance of a priest. I will tell you shortly: the case was this. Four regiments were sent out by the late king, to relieve four regiments that had been a long time then in the garrison. The governor received orders to send home every creature belonging to the four regiments then there: they had been many years in the island. A report had been made to him, that a daughter of one of the military people was missing. An enquiry was made: she was proved to be last in the possession of a priest. The priest was called upon; he denied knowing any thing about her, or of her. He was brought before the governor; he gave bail of two people; (this was a military affair entirely) and next day he was desired to produce her. He did not. The governor embarked him directly, and sent him on board, I believe, in the very transport that was to carry this young woman away. The fleet sailed to Gibraltar; and application was made immediately to the governor by the magistrates of Mahon, and by the religious order, begging the governor to forgive him, and stay the ship, and, if the governor would give leave, to put the girl on board, and bring back the prisoner. They begged, and petitioned, and prayed the governor. Upon that the girl was delivered up, brought from the vicar-general, who lived at a remote end of the island. She was brought to me. The story she told me was, that the vicar-general had, out of charity and compassion, taken care of her. She was a very pretty girl. She was put on board the transport, and sent after the fleet, and the priest was brought back, and there were great rejoicings upon his arrival.

Mr. Lee. You know how little material that is.

Q. In what office was you in this place?

A. Secretary to the governor and commander in chief by the king's commission.

Q. When did you go first?

A. In the year 48.

Q. You was in Minorca, I fancy, when a positive order came from England, that if any friar of the Franciscan order, not a native of the island, should come into that island, he should not be suffered to remain upon it?

Do you know of any such order in the first place?

A. Be so good as to repeat the order.

Q. That in case any friar of the Franciscan order, not being a native of Minorca, but an itinerant friar, shall come into the island, he shall not be permitted to take his residence there, &c. You don't recollect any thing of this, or that it was in obedience to the order of council that this Franciscan was sent away? So you forget this, though it happens unfortunately when the governor obeys the order of his superior, that is now to be quoted, as a precedent of his own regal authority?

Q. What was the priest?

A. A native of Minorca.

Q. And the friar?

A. I understood them to be Minorquins.

Q. Can you be positive about that?

A. I do believe that as a certainty and a fact: I am morally certain of it; I was not present at their birth or registry.

Q. It seems that you have forgot even that such an order existed, till I reminded you?

A. I am not clear that I remembered such an order existed; I have been over a great deal of ground since.

Q. Was it the nature of your office to acquaint you with all the orders of the council of England?

A. It came through my hands, yet very likely and probably I forgot it.

Q. But you might not have forgot it at the time the friars were ordered away?

Mr. Lee. This was in 53.

A. That is long subsequent: the affair of the friar was in 48 or 49.

Mr. Serjeant Burland. Then you admit that the king has a right to make such orders?

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. No; the council may make such orders, but we do not admit them to be legal.

Court. The case of the priest was some years after the case of the two friars?

A. Not a great while; about a year I believe, some such time: it is a great many years ago. I cannot be positive to a few months.

Captain JAMES SOLAIRE. Examined by Mr. Serjeant Walker.

Q. I think you are a native of Minorca?

A. I am.

Q. You know Mr. Fabrigas?

A. Not very particularly.

Q. I thought you had known him at fort St. Phillip's?

A. I know he is an inhabitant of that place.

Q. You have seen him there?

A. Several times.

Q. What sort of a temper and disposition has he?

A. I cannot answer very particularly.

Q. Do you know any thing of his general character?

A. No; I do not.

Mr. Serjeant Burland. I have a very long and respectable list of persons here to speak to the character of general Mofyn, and his general behaviour: I suppose the gentlemen on the other side don't dispute the general character which has been given of him.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. I shall not make the least attempt to asperse general Mofyn's character; I shall found myself upon the facts.

RAPHAEL PRATO. Examined by Mr. Buller.

(He not speaking English, an interpreter was sworn.)

Q. Do you know Mr. Fabrigas the plaintiff?

A. Yes.

Q. What character has he borne for some years past in the island of Minorca? Is he a peaceable man, or what?

A. A troublesome man, that meddles too much with affairs.

Q. What affairs do you mean?

A. With the government.

Court. The question is, whether upon the facts and circumstances of the transaction itself, the general was justified in what he did; otherwise they may empty the island?

Mr. Lee. Yes, this island of all the people.

Q. to Mr. Wright. You delivered in these different memorials and papers: all that you delivered in, are they genuine papers or copies of papers that were presented in Minorca?

A. All, except the last, which was delivered to the general's aid-de-camp, were delivered to me; that is endorsed on the back—Reads—

"To his excellency general Mofyn, governor and commander in chief of the island of Minorca, &c. &c. the humble petition of Antonio Fabrigas, a native and inhabitant of St. Phillip's in the said island, sheweth, that your petitioner has now by him 12 casks of wine, the produce of his own vineyard, without having purchased so much as a grape of any other person, of which he has not sold a drop, when several other inhabitants of the said town have sold all theirs, as well of the produce of their own vineyards, as that proceeding from what they bought to make a profit by; and this with the permit of Mr. Allimundo, who does the function of mustapha. That the petitioner, on the 25th of July, applied to the said Allimundo for measures to sell wine by the rate of two doubters less than the current price, which would have raised a benefit to the troops and poor inhabitants of St. Phillip's; but notwithstanding this demand was very reasonable, and conformable to the express condition of the first of his majesty's regulation of the 17th of May 52, regarding this island, where it is expressly mentioned that the inhabitants of this island shall always be permitted to sell at the price of the afforation or under it, Mr. Allimundo refused your petitioner, telling him he should not sell his said wine, and as this is not only against the reason and justice of the public, and the garrison of St. Phillip, but also contrary to his majesty's order in the said regulation, where it is mentioned that the inhabitants may sell their wines whenever they please without any permit, under the afforation-price in the island; therefore he prays your excellency will be pleased to order Mr. Allimundo to be more regular in this (for he has made above fifty casks of wine himself, of grapes he bought to make a profit profit by, of which he sold more than the half, in prejudice of those persons who have old and new wine by them), and to give your petitioner the correct and just measures at the aforesaid rate of two doubblers.'

Court. There is no date to this petition, I observe.—A. No.

Mr. Lloyd. It is marked on the back, 'delivered the 31st July, 71.'

The next is inclosed in the answer of the mustastaph's reply to Fabrigas the 7th of August, 71. 'To his excellency lieutenant-general Mostyn, governor and commander in chief of the island of Minorca, the humble petition of the under-written inhabitants of the suburbs of St. Phillip's, shews, that during the government of his excellency lieutenant-governor Johnson, on account of some complaints that were made concerning the direction, and selling wine, a regulation was made in the following manner: that the suburbs of St. Phillip's shall be divided into four wards; that the people shall draw lots; that they who shall come out shall have the liberty to sell their own wine, the accidents of the casks, and the preference of the poor helpless people being intirely under the direction of the mustastaph. That regulation was accepted by the inhabitants of the suburbs, and they are glad of its continuance as it is observed to this day. They have heard that some of the inhabitants are intending to destroy the aforesaid regulation, in order that every one might sell their wine at the place they please, without dividing the wards. This will be not only the total ruin of the inhabitants, but it will also make them careless in the culture of their lands, and less careful in making their wines, and consequently there will be very little wine of a good quality; therefore your petitioners humbly crave your excellency to be so good as to cast an eye of pity upon them, in not permitting that such a good regulation should be ever altered: and as in duty bound shall ever pray.' Signed by 58.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. Are they marks or names?

A. Most of them marks.

Directed to lieutenant-general Mostyn.

'The humble petition of Antonio Allimundo, mustastaph of St. Phillip's, sheweth, that your excellency desiring to be informed about a petition made by Anthony Fabrigas of St. Phillip's, relating to the selling of wine, says, that formerly the selling of the wine of the inhabitants of St. Phillip's was under the direction of the mustastaph of that suburb; but as several disputes and difficulties arose from this, his excellency lieutenant-governor Johnson found it proper to make a regulation for the selling of the wine, which was accepted with an entire satisfaction by all the inhabitants of St. Phillip's, and by them practised to this day. At the time I had the honour to be made mustastaph of that suburb, the aforesaid regulation was in its full force and execution, and the said lieutenant-governor charged me particularly to have it carefully observed. In consequence of this, the said Anthony Fabrigas having applied to me a few days ago for the measures to sell his own wine two doubblers cheaper than the common price, I thought it was impossible to grant it to him without forfeiting the duty of my employ, because his demand was contrary to the said regulation, by which the inhabitants of that suburb are permitted to sell their wine only by turns, after they have drawn lots; for which reason your petitioner told the said Fabrigas, that he could not sell his wine; intending to say, by this, that he could not sell it in the manner he had proposed, that is to say, without drawing lots, it being inconsistent with the said regulation; thinking it was his duty to have it observed till such time as your excellency ordered him to the contrary. In the former petition he had the honour to present your excellency, he thinks to have the same privileges with other inhabitants of St. Phillip's, that is, to buy grapes, to make wine, and sell it; and besides, seeing that his predecessors sold this wine when they pleased, notwithstanding the said regulation, he thought that the mustastaph of St. Phillip's was not included in it; in which case your petitioner did not think it was proper to prejudice his rights, or those of his successors, unless your excellency ordered him to the contrary; but to comply with the inhabitants of that suburb, that they might be satisfied, your petitioner always imposed a rule upon himself to sell his wine at different times, and sometimes by the gross, inasmuch that most of the inhabitants of that suburb have sold the half of their wine, whilst your petitioner has not yet sold a third part of his. If Anthony Fabrigas, or his father, says, that he will not sell his wine under the common price, and that he has sold none of it as yet, the former having none to sell, the reason is only because his turn did not come at the time when the lots were drawn, to which all the rest of the inhabitants of St. Phillip's are agreed; but his wine will be sold when his time shall come.'

The petition of Anthony Fabrigas, 13 Aug. 71, directed as before.

'The humble petition of Anthony Fabrigas. On the 31st of July 71, the petitioner had the honour to present a memorial to your excellency, shewing the transgression and non-observance in the said town of two regulations given on the 8th of May 52, by his Britannic majesty, &c. viz. that any native or inhabitant of this island shall be permitted to sell his fruits at the fixed price of the afforation, without any person's authority: secondly, that no commander, judge, nor officer, directly or indirectly, for himself nor through any other persons, shall be allowed to have any concern in any traffic, bargain, or commerce whatsoever: your petitioner having likewise represented to your excellency that Antonio Allimundo, who does the function of mustastaph in St. Phillip's, has bought grapes to make, as he really made afterwards, 50 casks of wine; of which he sold more than one half, in prejudice of the inhabitants of St. Phillip's, who have the old wine by them; and that your petitioner wanted to enjoy the liberties granted to him in the said regulations, offering to sell to the inhabitants and garrison of St. Phillip's, 12 casks of wine he has by him of his own produce, at two doubblers less than the ordinary afforation or fixed price, &c.: yesterday, the 12th of August, your excellency's secretary told your petitioner verbally, &c. at which your petitioner was greatly surprized; as he is ready to prove judicially, before any one of his majesty's judges of this island that your excellency may think proper to appoint, all that he has said in his last and this present proposal; in which case, &c. being sure from the justice he has in his favour, and from your excellency's good administration to administer it, prays your excellency will be pleased to give his decree at the foot of this memorial to your petitioner. He hopes thereby to be at liberty to sell his wines at two doubblers less than the afforation set by the mustastaph of St. Phillip's, &c. and that the mustastaph has acted unbecoming the office he exercises of mustastaph of St. Phillip's; which being evidently proved, will undoubtedly oblige your excellency to give the necessary orders for the relief and better advantage of the inhabitants and garrison of St. Phillip's.'

Mr. Serjeant Glynn. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, to favour me in this cause by way of reply. Considering the length of time that has been spent already in this cause, I should ask your pardon and indulgence for adding more than I could wish to the time that you have already spent, in answer to those arguments that have been used in behalf of the defendant, and in submitting to you such observations as occur to me. For, gentlemen, the cause, as I conceive, having already wandered very far from its true merits, and being perplexed with matters very foreign to the question, it is incumbent upon me to make such an attempt as my powers will enable me to do, to recal your attention to the real and true question in this cause.

The question, gentlemen, is shortly stated; the discussion of it, however, requires some time.---The question is merely what satisfaction and reparation Mr. Fabrigas, a subject of Great Britain, as much as any man even born in the city of London, has a right to demand for the treatment he has received. He is a native of the island of Minorca, born in the Britannic dominions; and his lordship will tell you that every person that is so born is a free-born citizen of Great Britain, intitled to all its liberties and privileges.

The question therefore is, how a man thus circumstanced is intitled to have his case considered by an English jury, and what satisfaction you shall think due to him for such kind of treatment as he has undergone; such tortures of the most studied, and the most perplexing and excruciating kind, (if you take into consideration the feelings of a man's mind, as well as his corporal sufferings) as have by the wantonness of power been inflicted upon him.

Gentlemen, in the discussion of this question, I shall now barely mention to you one topic upon which a great deal of your time has been taken, and which I mention merely for the purpose of clearing the cause of it, and dismissing it totally from your consideration; and that is, what respects the character of Mr. Mostyn the defendant. You are told of the high and respectable names of great men that have given their attendance here to countenance that character which you are told Mr. Mostyn indisputably possesses. My answer to it is, that if he had brought the privy-council, if he had come with testimonials in his hands from the two houses of parliament, it would not have varied the consideration of this cause. The question here is wide of all consideration of character: you must decide it upon the facts which appear before you in evidence, and from them you must judge of the merits of this cause. The motives of Mr. Mostyn's conduct, and every circumstance that is material or relative to that question, you are to decide upon; and beyond that, gentlemen, it is neither my desire nor my duty, it is far from my province, and far from my inclination, to attempt throwing any kind of calumny or aspersion. Let Mr. Mostyn, with all my heart, if he can, reconcile that conduct that has appeared before you to such a character, to that verdict which I am confident you must pronounce upon this cause. Let Mr. Mostyn enjoy the esteem of his great and noble friends; I have no desire to deprive him of it: I have however a zeal for the justice of this country, that goes something beyond the mere line and duty of an advocate,---I owe it to humanity,---I think it is a question of humanity, not depending upon the particular laws of any country: but it is a question highly affecting the honour of the British nation, and a question that will throw disgrace upon our laws, our constitution, and the humanity of our judicature, if this man should be sent back into the island of Minorca with his wrongs unredressed, and an accumulation of expences upon him.

I own therefore, gentlemen, upon these grounds and these considerations I feel a warmth and a zeal in this cause, which I hope will justify me for the pains that I mean to take, if my strength will support me in it, in laying before you what I conceive necessary for your consideration. I have said, that I mean to deprive general Mostyn of nothing that is not necessary to the reparation of the wrongs of this much-injured plaintiff; that he shall enjoy his good name and his character as far as my duty will permit him to enjoy them; I shall make no observations upon him but what arise from the cause now before you. I have some reason to wish, and to complain that the like conduct has not been observed on the other side. General Mostyn is to be graced with the countenance of great men; and a plain English jury is to hear the titular testimonies of the character of a man invested with an high office, in high power, and possessed of great riches; yet the character of a poor, unhappy, helpless individual, an inhabitant of an island part of the territories belonging to the crown of Great Britain (confident too that he lived under the protection of the constitution of Great Britain), is to be treated as a subject of ridicule, because he is not a man of high rank, though you are told he is a man of character and of fortune, such as has intitled and recommended him to the company of men of rank in that island. Have we not some reason to complain, that such matters are now introduced to rebut his just and well-founded expectations to receive satisfaction from an English jury for the wrongs he has already sustained?---Is it not enough that this this man has endured an imprisonment of six days, under the most unparalleled hardships of rigour and cruelty that can be inflicted upon a human being? is it not enough that he has endured a banishment from his native country? but, to heap calumny and obloquy upon the head of a man that he has injured, shall he with impunity be permitted to digress wide from the facts in this cause, to tell you that he is a profligate idle man; that with a family he neglects all the duties of a husband and the master of a family; that he is devoid of moral character? Is a poor helpless stranger in this kingdom thus to be represented, after having been driven out of his own by cruelty unparalleled in the British history? Nor can any history be produced, even of any other country, that did not receive a most signal discountenance from the power of that country. A man thus driven out, seeking refuge from the English laws, friendless in this country, ignorant of its language, is treated in this manner! A gentleman comes forth, and entertains you with the connexions, character, and acquaintance of the powerful defendant: he then enters into the private concerns and private character of the plaintiff, and dwells upon the ignominy of it, and endeavours to impress you with a prepossession that it will not be in his power to remove it. I trust this conduct has not escaped you. Not a word has fallen from us of the character of general Moslyn; I mean on that head to be silent for ever; and if I had it in my power to asperse his character, unless it was something relative to the cause, that made it my duty to produce it before you, I should be very silent about it.

Having dismissed, I hope, from the cause these considerations, let us now recur to the defence that is set up by general Moslyn. And, gentlemen, the defence set up by the general is, that Mr. Fabrigas is a man dangerous, seditious, and turbulent; that he was in the act of perpetrating sedition in the garrison of Minorca; that there was danger even of the loss of Minorca itself; that it affected the commercial interests of this country; and, as well-wishers to this country and the commerce of it, you are called upon to give a verdict for the defendant, or to reduce the consideration of damages so as to pronounce something worse for the plaintiff, if possible, than even a verdict for the defendant.---Gentlemen, their state of it is, that this man, Mr. Fabrigas, being a factious, turbulent, and unquiet man, was pursuing general Moslyn with an improper importunity; that he was endeavouring to spread sedition, to raise discontents in the garrison itself that affected the very safety of the government, and the island was in danger; that he uttered a threat that would have made general Moslyn responsible with his head, if he had not prevented such a scheme from being carried into execution; that he said, if his petition was again rejected, that he would come at the head of 150 men, a menace represented as if it imported a threat that he would come at the head of an armed force: such was the construction his counsel put upon it, that he would appear in such a way, as to make it necessary for the general to comply with his demands; that there was an end of all government and all order in the island of Minorca, and a valuable part of the British dominions lay then at the mercy of our enemies. Gentlemen, this is a well-drawn picture, and was very powerfully urged to you. It was something over-painted, as I conceive you will judge. And the necessity of doing it is an observation that will not escape you; for less than this, I do conceive (I rest myself satisfied in the general humanity that prevails in the breasts of Englishmen, and inhabitants of the city of London) less than this could never have served as any colourable justification for such conduct as has been proved upon general Moslyn: this therefore was necessary to be stated to you, that it was extorted, (contrary to the feelings of humanity which are said to sway and influence that gentleman in all his conduct) that this was extorted from necessity; that there was no time for consideration; that it was an emergency he was required to decide on; it superseded therefore all forms; it was absolutely necessary, for his government would not have existed if he had been at all induced to postpone it; and that possession of which he was the guardian, and for which he is said to be responsible with his head, was in danger of being for ever lost to Great Britain. I can conceive a case like that, adding more circumstances than even the ingenuity of the counsel furnished, which would not justify, though it might extenuate indeed, the conduct of the commander. But was there any thing like it in this case? This, I submit to you, gentlemen, is a case that the counsel thought necessary to open; and less than this furnishes no pretence or colour of justification for general Moslyn. Gentlemen, when this cause was opened to you, and when the general's defence was stated to you, that the general was obliged to act in an emergency; bound by the most religious of all duties, to look with circumspection to the care of the garrison in instant danger, it was necessary to act as he did; it was an act therefore not of inclination nor of deliberation, it was an act of absolute cogent irresistible necessity, and which he had been unjustifiable if he had either omitted or deferred for a day. That is the nature, and that is the colour of the general's justification: but did the general know how different the case that would appear upon evidence would be from that which he had instructed his counsel to represent to you? It was necessary that the defence should be guarded; and then there is a prefatory defence made, which, in my opinion, very much deserves your consideration. General Moslyn, with the prudence that from this hour I shall think makes part of his character, chose to decline the jurisdiction of an English jury. I don't wonder that he did; and I am not amazed that you are told that this is a matter extraneous to the jurisdiction of the courts of judicature in this country; that you, as a jury, are incompetent for its decision: it is of all cases in the world that case which, as a defendant, general Moslyn must be inclined to wish might never appear before an English jury. It is a tribunal that he must dread; it is a tribunal that he must shrink from; and he acts upon the soundest motives of policy and prudence when he endeavours to evade it.---If that should prove insufficient to him, the next resort is in the general law and doctrine respecting the power of the governor in the island of Minorca; and you are repeatedly cautioned not to consider yourselves as administering justice by the laws of England. You are told, that you are deciding a question of the laws of another country, far different indeed and materially opposite to those of the laws of England: you are called upon therefore to judge this cause by another rule, and by another standard, than that which you are in the habit of. Considering and trying causes by something more than this must be desired of you, before the ends of the defendant can be completely answered. You are desired to divest yourselves too of the feelings of humanity; and they are endeavoured to be suppressed by representing to you circumstances of horror and danger to the general trade of this country, in case you should suffer even principles of law, of justice and humanity, to prevail in this cause. Gentlemen, it was stated to you, that in this island of Minorca there is no law whatsoever; that the form of government is despotism; that what may be called the law, is the will and pleasure of the person that governs; that the king is absolutely despotic; that he may change and alter the laws of this island as he pleases; and not only he himself can do it, but that he has delegated that power to his substitute; that he is sent over to govern, not by any fixed invariable plan of laws, but such as he thinks proper to make, such as he thinks proper to prescribe to the inhabitants, at any time that in his wisdom it shall appear just and expedient that it should be so. This is the state of an English government, and this is the construction put upon an English patent that passes the great seal of Great Britain. I will be bold to say, that if that construction is ever attempted to be put, it must be put repugnant to the words of that patent. I will be bold to say, that if a patent passes the great seal containing such words, there is not so feeble a judicature in this kingdom that would not dare to pronounce it void, and every act done under it illegal. And I will venture to say too, it is impossible that the great man that should dare to put the great seal, and prostitute public authority to a patent of that kind, but he must answer to public justice with his head.---And yet this has been contended to be the true genuine construction of an English patent, the authority under which this same general Moslyn, this governor of the island of Minorca, has presumed to act. Gentlemen, having stated how repugnant it is to every idea and principle of law and justice, it gives me concern to hear in what habits, possessed with what ideas, men return from the island of Minorca. It has been contended to be right, because it has been done before. If it has been done before, I say it is alarming, and it is time to put an end to it. You have had gentlemen with military commissions appearing here in red coats, to give you legislative constructions; to tell you, as lawyers, what is the law of the island of Minorca. You have had a gentleman who served as a secretary to governor Moslyn, who comes home and tells you, that the governor, with respect to the administration of laws that regard only questions of civil property, is limited by the laws of the country; but with regard to criminal jurisdiction, his power is uncircumscribed, and totally unlimited; that by his proclamation he can change laws whenever he pleases, and the law of to-night is not the law of to-morrow, if that man thinks proper to issue his proclamation to repeal it; that the courts of justice are under a tie to respect these proclamations as laws; that the individuals of the island are all to be bound by it, and if these laws are issued but an hour before, they are as binding as if of long standing in the island.

These are the ideas of law that these gentlemen bring from the island of Minorca, under the government either of this general Moslyn, or his lieutenant-general; and upon the authority of these gentlemen that have furnished themselves with such ideas of law and justice, you are at once to be prevailed upon to determine that the laws, liberties, and privileges of this kingdom in no respect extend there. It is something shocking to English ears; a despotic, an arbitrary, an unlimited power! (for even the words have not been spared); and you are here, as an English jury, to pronounce that the king of Great Britain, and persons acting under him, are to exercise this unlimited power within a part under the jurisdiction of the judges of England. If this is offered in extenuation of the conduct of general Moslyn, added to the strong irresistible calls of justice and humanity that must press your minds more than words can, there must be added to it the most powerful political considerations; for you have been told in the course of this argument, that the island of Minorca is an insecure possession to the crown of Great Britain; that its inhabitants are in a great measure disaffected. If they are, has not the cause of the disaffection been very explicitly set forth to you? Is not the cure as evident? Correct these gentlemen, who think that their hands are not bound by law and justice that go over to exercise power over these helpless men. Teach the poor Minorquins that the English law will protect them; that their governors are bound by law and justice to teach them the blessings of an English government; you'll remove disaffection; you'll get a stronger guard than all the caution and wisdom of governor Moslyn, his secretary and friends, powerful and titled as they are, and this fatal system of military despotism; you will have the island to serve you, you will have the affections of the inhabitants to assist you, you may command them whenever you will. Yet, gentlemen, it has been dwelt upon as a topic, that this island is disaffected; that their inclinations are against the English government. And who can wonder at it, if what Mr. Blakeney says he is clear in his recollection of? I hope he is not; I don't mean to derogate from his veracity; that a power like this has been used of arbitrarily sending a man, a native, an inhabitant, from the island, his friends living there, his possession there, for no offence committed, but at the absolute will and pleasure of the governor. You have heard a great deal of Turkey; you have heard something of the laws of Japan, you have heard of other despotic powers, whose names I trust are sufficiently odious in the ears of all English hearers; and yet you are told that the governor of this island is equally despotic with any of these powers; that he has no limits but his will, no bounds but his pleasure, no law but his inclinations; that the lives and persons, if not the properties, of all the inhabitants of this island lie prostrate before him, and they must depend upon his natural good inclination and humanity in what degree they are permitted to enjoy them.

This is the state of this island; and I will be bold to say, it would be speaking injuriously of the government of Japan,---it would be speaking injuriously injuriously of the government of Turkey,---it would be speaking injuriously of the emperor of Morocco's government, to describe that as the general state of these subjects; it never was in the idea of even despotism itself till this very hour: it is violence and outrage, it is the law of robbery; it never obtained in any place where the idea and form of a civil government ever was allowed; because, if the legislative power and the executive meet in one person, that distinguishes a despotic government from the happy state that we enjoy in this kingdom. Our king can't prescribe us laws, but he must administer us justice by those laws that our representatives make for us. That is the state of this country, happily distinguished from the state of despotic countries. But in no despotic country whatever did this idea ever obtain, that the prince, the despotic sovereign, call him by what name you will, was to administer justice by his incident pleasure, will, and power. If he made laws, he made them, proclaimed and divulged them, and the subjects were governed by them, and their kings were ruled by those laws. But here this gentleman, Mr. Blakeney, goes wide beyond his counsel, (his counsel would not state any thing like this) but according to this gentleman, the inhabitants of this island, without the least imputation of delinquency, without any mode or form of trial, were sentenced, instantly transported, and removed from their friends and relations forever, unless it is the good will and pleasure of the governor ever to permit them to return. I say, it is the most shameful anecdote that ever was found of any government whatever; and a bashaw of Egypt would merit the bow-string for behaving in so illegal and so indecent a manner. The form, the appearance, the semblance of justice, are all of importance to be observed, and which the policy even of the lawless prescribe; yet have our ears been tortured, and our patience and time been spent with doctrines of this sort, by gentlemen who have enjoyed trusts in that island, and which have constantly been exercised by them. This is what general Mostyn has set up in his defence.

His majesty, it is said, makes laws whenever he pleases; it is in his sole will and power to impose what laws he pleases upon a conquered country. It is more than ever I heard. The prerogative goes further than any book, that ever I read, can justify me in allowing; because, as I have understood it, if true, the strongest authorities support these prerogatives. One Christian prince conquers a Christian kingdom, that is governed by its own laws, unless it is the will of the conqueror to abrogate those laws. The conquest of the island of Minorca was not made by queen Ann personally, but it was made by the subjects of Great Britain, and belongs to the supreme state of Great Britain. But if you give the power to the sovereign to make those laws, allow them to be rightly exercised. Can you suppose that it belongs to the governor appointed, and that they are sent out of this island not to be governed by any laws, any instructions that they shall receive, but to govern and administer justice arbitrarily and uncontrollably, according to their own will and pleasure? For in order to furnish the defendant with any colourable defence whatever, he is to be justified by precedents, which you must condemn as precedents of robbery and burglary, equal in point of violence to either of those terms; or you must allow of such a power which has hitherto been held not only incompatible with the law, the spirit, the genius, and the constitution of Great Britain, but with the idea of any law whatever that ever obtained in any state or climate: both these you must subscribe to before you can comply with the request that is made you, and pronounce a verdict for general Mostyn.---The gentlemen then having taken this broad and extensive line of defence, which they thought would contain and embrace any defence that they thought proper to offer to you, they next proceed with their defence. And, gentlemen, you are told, that as it was the authority, so it was the duty of the general to proceed as he did; that he could have no personal malevolence to a man so remote from his situation, so unlikely to fall in with his connections; that the man was mutinous in the whole of his conduct; and that at last he committed that dangerous act of mutiny that made it an indispensable act of justice in the governor to commit him, and to send him out of the island; that if he had not done it, and a consequence had happened fatal to the island, the governor would have been responsible for it. Why, gentlemen, the state of it so much exceeded the facts, it certainly was expected by the learned counsel who offered it to you that he should prove something less, and therefore something that required bold and strong positions to support it; because, if he could have proved this, though I should conceive it would by no means have intitled the general to a verdict, yet such considerations,---an act of absolute necessity, the alternative of seeing such a trust as the island of Minorca lost through his remissness, or the removing of this man out of the island--I should have conceived might very well have furnished an excuse for him in his conduct: I am sure it would have taken off from any edge, any warmth, or keenness in which an action would have been supported that would have been brought against him. But, large as the ground was laid, it was to take in certainly another case than this. Nothing, as I conceive, and as I submit to you, of this kind has been proved. Petitions, letters, messages, have been given in evidence before you, and comments are made upon the very petitions themselves, as carrying with them strong proofs of a mutinous inclination; and at last there is a broad fact asserted, that there was a downright threat of appearing in arms at the head of 150 men.

Now, gentlemen, give your attention to these letters, to these petitions that have been read. They are expressed, as I conceive, in decent and in respectful terms; and if it is an act of mutiny, I do conceive that it is impossible for any one man to complain that he has received wrong from another, either by word or letter, but he must be condemned as a mutineer in the island of Minorca; and the public faith, the national faith that is pledged for the protection and enjoyment of their property, is reduced to that state---"You shall enjoy it, but if another presumes to wrong you, you must not dare, upon the pain of transportation and long imprisonment, to utter a word of complaint; for it is judged dangerous, it is not consistent with the wisdom of government to permit it, and we are called upon to punish you most severely."---Gentlemen, the transaction appears to be this: that an officer in the island of Minorca, called a mustapha, was the man from whom the islanders were to receive what they call the afforation or the affize-price: this was the conception of Mr. Fabrigas the petitioner. Another notion prevailed, that the order of council received from the crown, which is consistent with their capitulation and the rights stipulated to them, ought to be observed; by which order they were at liberty to sell their wines after a certain price had by a public officer been once affized, which is called the afforation. But the mustapha of the island thought proper to say that the order of council was superseded by another order, which coming from the active person in the government, though not the principal at the time, must necessarily supersede that order of council; and it was insisted upon that governor Johnston's order, judging of the inexpedience and impropriety of the former, must take place; and that Mr. Fabrigas was wrong in his conception of what should be understood to be the law of Minorca. Upon his presenting his complaint to Mr. Mostyn, he received for answer, that Mr. Mostyn would immediately call upon the mustapha for his answer. The answer is given; and in consequence of it Mr. Fabrigas is told that his petition was groundless, for that the mustapha had most perfectly satisfied the governor. Mr. Fabrigas then desires to see, for confident as he was that he was well grounded in his complaint, yet he desires to see the reasons that the mustapha had assigned. The sight of these reasons is denied him. In consequence of that, he presents another petition; which is, I think, referred to some of the law officers of the island for their consideration. They run it over, and they report themselves satisfied; and they insert the answer of the mustapha, which answer the plaintiff Mr. Fabrigas is very desirous of seeing and answering. The business then proceeds, as it is said, in repeated petitions; Mr. Fabrigas conceiving that the governor is misled, not that he wilfully denies him justice, but is misled through the influence and misrepresentation of this mustapha; and that produces at last a convention of some of the island, in order to take their sense of the matter. Here it is not clear what was the sense of the majority; but here the mustapha had weight and interest enough to get that represented as by the majority, which he wished to have received. This being on a Sunday, when many of the inhabitants were in the country following their diversions, and Mr. Fabrigas thinking that the sense of the people had not been properly taken, comes again to the governor with another petition, not censuring the governor, not upbraiding the governor, not intimating the least disapprobation of the governor's conduct, or jealousy of his inclination, couched in terms of the utmost decency. The consequence of it was an answer, which produced from Mr. Fabrigas that very answer upon which the defence of Mr. Mostyn has been in so great a measure built; to which the gentlemen have applied that evidence which was produced by Mr. Wright, Mr. Mostyn's secretary. Mr. Wright says, that first of all the conversation was interpreted by a priest, and then by another interpreter; but he does not know who interpreted those expressions which fell from Mr. Fabrigas, which he apprehended to be of a dangerous kind, and therefore discouraged, and advised him never to repeat again. He does not know, he says, whether the expression was to this purpose, that he would come again if permitted, and that there should be another petition backed with 150 men, or that he would come with 150 men to back his petition. I am sorry for it. But here I can't forbear a comment; it would be betraying my cause and my own judgment if I did. This gentleman is very sure that one or the other of these were the expressions. He professed to refresh his memory by a paper he had written down within an hour and a half of the transaction; and he thought proper to add, that it gave him an alarm, as if something dangerous might follow.

Now, gentlemen, what are the words which he has written, from which he said he made his communication to the governor, and which certainly contains the truth, as he recently wrote it down? Why, that Mr. Fabrigas said he would come next day with a petition of the people concerned in grapes and wines, which they would sign and come with to the number of 150! These are the words wrote down by Mr. Wright himself. Why, gentlemen, I submit it to you, whether in common sense and plain honest interpretation there can be any mistake about these words.

You hear, gentlemen, this was a contest between the mustapha and Mr. Fabrigas. The governor is appealed to as a judge expected to be, and who ought to be, impartial between them: he was appealed to with decency on one side, but leaned rather with friendship on the other; for the interest of the governor is not unconnected with the emoluments of the mustapha. On one side it is insisted that this was not the sense of the majority of the inhabitants; on the other side, notwithstanding what had appeared from the advantage taken upon a Sunday, when many could not appear, yet still that the real sense of the majority of the inhabitants was on the side of Fabrigas. Gentlemen, is not that the most natural key? does not that furnish the most obvious interpretation to this? He would come with 150, in answer to what he had been told; for his petition had been rejected upon the ground that it was not consonant to the wishes of the inhabitants, for they had been summoned, had declared and signed against it. He answers, that I will come the next day with a petition signed by 150 men. And who are these men to be? Why, he says, persons concerned in grapes and wine. Can you conceive then that he threatened to bring an armed force, that he threatened danger to the garrison? Was it not a natural answer in that dispute that then subsisted between him and the mustapha? Is it not clearly explained by the words, 'the persons concerned in grapes and wines,' that he meant the mistake should be rectified the next day, and that it might appear from the number attending that petition, upon which side the majority of the islanders were? There was no man, that did not desire to mistake it, that could have mistaken it; that is impossible. This I will be bold to say, that no man that wrote this paper would have given the evidence that Mr. Wright has given, and say he was in doubt only in the recollection of the particular words that were used, whether he would come with a petition backed with 150 men, or that he would come with 150 men to back his petition. I am persuaded that no man who had wrote this, and which he tells you is the truth, could ever entertain that kind of doubt that Mr. Wright suggested to you. I am as confident that no man could have mistaken this, that had not some purposes to answer by affecting to mistake it. But what was Mr. Wright's, what was the governor's conduct upon this this occasion? Did either of them enquire after these 150 men? If this was a matter that would give such an alarm to a governor of a garrison, was it proper to acquiesce in the removal of one only? Was there any enquiry made after the others? If it struck Mr. Wright as dangerous, would it not have occurred to him, to stop Mr. Fabrigas upon the instant? Would he not have demanded the names of these 150 men? But Mr. Mostyn at once abandons all his character, for the purpose of the cause; he is now no longer that faithful officer, that good and trusty soldier, that diligent and circumspect governor, that you were before told he was. Is it not impossible but it should have occurred to both, that the proper conduct was, if this was a just interpretation of the words that were uttered, to take that man up? not to stop there, but to have interrogated him, to discover his abettors and accomplices, to pursue the enquiry, and preserve the safety of the garrison, which they conceive to be so much in danger? It is most clear from all the circumstances, that neither of them apprehended any danger whatsoever to the garrison; they slept in quiet as before. There must be some other reason for their proceeding in the manner they have done against Mr. Fabrigas, besides that which arises from the necessity and emergency which was represented to you, of the interposition that the governor was called upon by indispensable duty to make, for the sake of preserving the garrison from being thrown into confusion, from falling into the enemy's hands. There must be, I say, some other reason for acting in this manner against Mr. Fabrigas. Mr. Fabrigas is suspected, as they would have it, of a dangerous design; that a dangerous design was on foot; yet he is the only man that for six days remains in the island in close imprisonment, and there is not any inquiry made after the persons presumed to be concerned with him in the business. If the governor had conceived that impression, and wished to be set right in his opinion, the appearance of the petition the next day would have answered it. When four poor Minorquins, (which for some purpose or other are described to be of the lowest class of men, and which you will therefore presume to be the most inoffensive) when these four men alone came with the petition, did governor Mostyn then continue in the opinion that this man was the framer and contriver of dangerous designs, to be backed and supported by multitudes? Must not he change his opinion then? Did the imprisonment end then? Were the sufferings of this man then put an end to?—No, gentlemen; the man continues in prison for six days, and is afterwards by an order extra-judicial, by an order of this governor Mostyn, sent into exile; which if it is law, any thing he thinks proper to do will be law; and I must then agree with Mr. Wright's juridical opinion, that the power of the governor can have no bounds in criminal matters. If he can justify this, he might as well justify capital punishments; and if he had thought proper to have ordered him to immediate execution, he would have done an act full as justifiable, in my opinion something more agreeable to humanity; for he sends this man to rot in a dungeon, the place ordained for the vilest and most desperate malefactors, for capital offenders only, whether under ground or not is immaterial, but it was gloomy, damp, and uncomfortable; it has all the horrors of a dungeon belonging to it; and there this man is kept under a special extraordinary order, which our witnesses, who were soldiers of the garrison, who were attendants at the place, tell you, were unprecedented; no food suffered to be administered to him, his friends debarred from seeing him, his wife and children denied access as often as they approached, and this in consequence of orders which their humanity shuddered at, but which they dared not presume to contradict. Singular and unexampled as was this cruelty even in the government of Minorca, which has the peculiar character of having a despotism belonging to it unknown in any other place upon the face of this globe; yet even there, though they may quote instances to justify some part of their behaviour, they never can pretend that a man ever was treated with the studied circumstances of rigour and cruelty contained in these orders: I mean, that no such orders were ever issued out before. This, gentlemen, is the treatment Mr. Fabrigas has undergone, and this Mr. Mostyn must justify. He must not only justify the removing this gentleman out of the way of doing mischief, but he must say, that without hearing, without any proceeding, without the form of sentence, without even so much as an intimation of the offence with which he is charged, that he has a right to inflict the greatest of all punishments upon him. This Mr. Mostyn must say; and you are to conclude, from the exceeding good character of Mr. Mostyn, that all this proceeded from the pure benevolence of his heart, from the most upright and commendable of all motives. You are in your judgment to pass an approbation of denying a man, untried and unconvicted, all food for six days but bread and water, of stripping him of all comfort, and of denying him even the accommodation of a bed. You must pronounce that there was nothing improper, nothing unlawful, nothing inhuman in separating a man from his wife during this imprisonment, stripping him of the comfort of his infant children, and then transporting him into a foreign country, without giving him the opportunity of providing for his voyage, or receiving that small assistance which you have been told his wife and son were ready on the spot to deliver to him. This you must pronounce to be legal and justifiable, and to be agreeable to humanity, to be necessarily incident to the office and duty of a governor of a garrison. You are desired, admitting for a moment that you can't justify the general in this conduct; admitting that some form of trial, that calling a man to answer, and signifying what he was charged with, were necessary forms to precede the infliction of any punishment whatever; (which admission will be an affront to the judgment of the worthy gentleman his secretary, who insists upon the general's will being the law) but laying that aside for a moment, it is said the governor's conduct stands so circumstanced, that it is so mitigated, that you can never find it consistent with your duty to give any considerable damages against him, at the complaint of this man. And to brand him with the most dangerous of all names, you are told that he is a patriot; that patriotism, however it may be introduced here, and may be serviceable in a commercial country, is of no use and benefit, but of the highest danger, in the island of Minorca; and the love of a man's country, which is called the first of virtues in other countries, becomes a mark, a dangerous offence in that country. At the instance therefore of such a man as that, and against such a man as Mr. Mostyn, you are told, you can give no damages, for the great and the long imprisonment, for the cruel and afflicting injury done him, in sending him into a foreign country from his wife and family. You cannot do it, because it is said Mr. Mostyn has been in an error, and that the utmost extent of Mr. Mostyn's crimes amounts only to that of error. To support this, the opinion of the military was asked, and the opinion of those wretched men called lawyers, who have studied law in a country where law is not permitted to reside, and where the will of the governor is the only law. Upon such authorities it is said Mr. Mostyn could not hesitate. Clear as his judgment is, he is mistaken; he is misled by the first of authorities: he certainly meant well. Gentlemen, if Mr. Mostyn had offended against any particular positive law of this country, or even Minorca, though clear to common understandings, yet that defence might be open to him; but it is not open to him in this case: for he has offended against the law of humanity, impressed upon every good mind; (no man that feels it can ever be mistaken) and he has offended against the first principles of justice. But it is said, he only erred in sending a man to a dungeon, that probably might kill him; out of error too, he issues out orders to restrict him to bread and water for his sustenance; out of error too, he prohibited the access of his wife and children; out of error, he banished him into a foreign country, stripped of his property, and all the comfort he could be supposed to have in his banishment, not suffered to take that small provision which his family had made for him: all these errors are incident. To whom? To the governor of Minorca. I trust by your verdict that you will never suffer a man who has acted this part, to call it humanity, and go back to Minorca justified by your verdict, in saying, 'I committed these mistakes, but they were all mistakes of the heart.' I am sure you will not give him the sanction and authority of your verdict. But if these arguments prevail, you must do it; you must give the plaintiff small damages, merely because the defendant is mistaken. Governor Mostyn, bred too in England, lately gone over to that country, does not recollect that it is necessary that a man, before he is punished, must be tried: you are to call that an error too. I do conceive, the lowest wretch that walks the streets of London is incapable of falling into that error: it must be an error produced by the place; it must be that very intoxication and drunkenness of power which you ought, by your verdict, to correct. It is impossible that any Englishman, or any man bred in a civilized country, could fall into such an error. And give me leave here to remark one part of the case. Gentlemen are brought to tell you of reports conveyed to the governor. If Mr. Wright reported faithfully, what he was authorized to report, the governor had little to build upon. Another gentleman adds, that there was a report of somebody; and it is said it may justify the governor as a report. Now did they consider how the governor is to be justified by a report? Does a report justify a man in proceeding to the very extremity of punishment instantly, without trial or examination? Does not every observation that can possibly be made turn against general Mostyn? If you pronounce a verdict for him, must not you give a sanction to that horrible and dangerous doctrine here advanced in his support? Are not you called upon then by every consideration that is dear to you, to give great and exemplary damages in this cause? If ever example required it, it does in this. If ever the suffering of a man required it, it does in this; for never was any man more clearly and unjustifiably wronged and injured. If you send Mr. Fabrigas, if he has courage to return to the island, with a verdict of a few hundred pounds, to give triumph to a man whose revenue is seven or eight thousand pounds a-year, who does not regard what such a man as this recovers; then the despicable doctrine of arbitrary power that the governor was so fond of, and thought so well established in this island, will never again be disturbed. Is it not essential to the very safety of the island, that the inhabitants may be assured that they are protected from such a power, that they shall never be told that in a court of justice such a power was ever insisted upon, and that the jury gave only a few hundred pounds damages, as a mark that they did not bear in their minds any great disapprobation of it?

On the other hand, it is of no great consequence whether Mr. Mostyn ever returns to that country again. It is my, and I am sure it is your wish, that he may never be permitted to return. I wish he may never see the face of Mr. Fabrigas again. I wish he may never see the face of Mr. Fabrigas again in that island. But it is of the greatest concern to the peace and happiness of that island, that they are safely protected from such outrages, from such rampant violence and capricious exercise of tyranny and despotism; that they shall never be disturbed again by such exertion of authority, much less that it shall ever be acknowledged as the claim of the governor of the island; but that they may quietly enjoy those rights that as natural-born subjects of Great Britain they are entitled to, and which the national faith is pledged to make good to them. This will be the advantage that will follow the giving ample, considerable, and exemplary damages to the plaintiff; damages that I must say in this cause are called for from the very nature of the cause itself: for if there was not any weightier consideration in it than for the sufferings of the man, the damages must swell high indeed; but, added to that, you will produce this happy effect, that Minorca, which is said to be a precarious possession, will for ever be a permanent and secure possession to the crown of Great Britain. I much fear, if this language receives countenance, it will be insecure indeed; and much as I love the trade and commerce of this kingdom, I protest as a man of feeling, great and valuable as they are, I would not consent that they should be purchased, I cannot consent that they should be preserved, at the expence of the most solemn rights of society.

Mr. Justice Gould.

Gentlemen of the jury, Anthony Fabrigas is plaintiff, and John Mostyn esq. is the defendant. This, gentlemen, is an action of trespass and false imprisonment, which the plaintiff declares in two counts.

The first is, that the defendant upon such a day made an assault upon and imprisoned the plaintiff, without any reasonable or probable cause, against the laws of this kingdom, and compelled him to depart from Minorca, where he was there dwelling and resident; and carried or caused him to be carried from thence to Carthage, the dominions of the king of Spain, against the plaintiff's will, whereby he was put to great expence and trouble, his goods were waisted and lost, his family brought to great want and distress, and he was deprived of their comfort. That is the first count. The second is, the general charge of false imprisonment, without alleging these circumstances. To this the defendant has pleaded two pleas.

In the first place, the general issue, that he is not guilty.
In the second place, he says, he is governor of the island of Minorca; and that he was intrusted with all the powers, privileges, and authorities, civil and military, belonging and relating to the government of the said island in parts beyond the seas. Then he states, that the plaintiff was guilty of a riot and disturbance of the peace, order, and government of the island, and was endeavouring to create and raise a mutiny and sedition amongst the inhabitants of the said island, in breach of the peace; in violation of the laws, and in subversion of all order and government; whereupon the defendant, in order to preserve the peace and government of the island, was obliged, and did then and there order the plaintiff to be banished the said island, and to leave and quit the island. And in order to carry this into execution, and to send him from and out of the island, he did (then come the words of form) gently lay hands upon him for that purpose; and accordingly did cause him to be kept in prison for a reasonable space of time, until he could send him out of the island; and then at length he did send him on board a vessel from the said island to Carthage in Spain, as it was lawful for him to do. The plaintiff has said in answer to this, that he did it of his own wrong, and without any such cause as he has alleged in his justification. Now whether this justification is good in point of law or not, is a matter, gentlemen, that I shall not enter into upon this occasion. For it seems to me, that if what has been laid down by the gentlemen upon the part of the defendant is well founded in law, they ought to have pleaded that matter to the jurisdiction of the court. But they have not so done, but have pleaded a justification, which is denied by the plaintiff; and that issue coming here by the king's commission of nisi prius to be tried by you and before me, we must therefore see whether he has made out that justification or not. And you will please to recollect he says in it, that the plaintiff was guilty of a riot and disorder, and did endeavour to excite and stir up mutiny and so forth in the island. Thus much I think one may say, that where a conquest is made of a Christian country (there is some strange doctrine relative to infidel countries, as if infidels had no laws to be governed by, that I meddle not with; but as far as relates to the conquest of a Christian country,) certainly it is said, that until the crown does promulge laws among them, they are to be governed by their ancient laws. Indeed, common sense speaks it, because otherwise they would have no laws nor government among them. However, thus far may be said, to be sure, under such a constitution in which we live, that at least natural equity must be the rule, if there is a power that is not circumscribed by clear, positive, and precise rules. Yet both natural justice and equity are the principles that ought to govern such a trust. If any one was to write or speak upon it, it is impossible but they must lay down that proposition. Then that will be a consideration for you to try upon this occasion; considering this distinction, that we are not trying a cause now that does happen within the compass of this island, but we are trying a fact and a proceeding that happened in a garrison beyond the seas, a place possessed by the crown of Great-Britain for the general benefit of this country and of its commerce.

In order to make out the plaintiff's case, in the first place they have called Basil Cunningham, who was serjeant-major in the royal artillery at Minorca in 1771. He says, that the plaintiff was there at that time (it is agreed upon all hands that he is a native of the island of Minorca). When the plaintiff was brought into prison, an order was given out to put three additional men upon the guard to do duty over the prisoner Fabrigas: this was 24 hours after he had been in custody. The prison was called Number 1, and is a prison where those charged or guilty of capital crimes or for desertion are generally put. He was brought there by a party of soldiers, and the witness thinks hand-cuffed. It was afterwards admitted that he was. He was confined there four or five days. The centinels informed the witness, that they had orders that he should have no conversation with any but the prevoist-marshal, and that was put into the general orders: in fact, that no one did visit him, as he knew of. The prevoist-marshal has the custody of persons accused of capital crimes, and keeps the key of the prison. He says, that the plaintiff lived like a gentleman in the island. He says that he the witness was at St. Phillip's, and that the plaintiff was not tried for any crime. This witness is cross-examined, and says he has seen the plaintiff at different times for eight or nine years: he never heard but that he was a quiet inoffensive subject: the plaintiff lived in St. Phillip's, and was imprisoned in St. Phillip's castle. This witness was there before Mr. Mostyn became the governor: Mr. Johnston was the governor when the witness came first to that island.

James Tweedy.---He was a corporal in the royal artillery in 1771, and was serjeant of the guard; and in the middle of September the plaintiff was delivered a prisoner by the soldiers of the 61st regiment. He says he was in prison in Number 1; that there were orders from the adjutant-lieutenant not to let any one converse with him; he heard the adjutant read it: the adjutant's duty is to deliver the orders of the commander in chief. To relieve us from any farther examination relative to that, it was admitted by my brother Davy that it was done by the defendant's order. Then a book is produced to you, and the title of it is, 'orders delivered to the troops in Minorca for the year 1771.' 15th Sept. 1771. In order to relieve the main guard at St. Phillip's, which now mounts a centinel extraordinary upon Anthony Fabrigas, confined in prison Number 1, general orders, that three men be added to the artillery-guard in the Casle-Square, as they are most contiguous, and that duty taken by them.

The centinel must be posted night and day, and is to suffer no person whatever to approach the grate in the door of the said prison, either to look in or have any communication with the prisoner, the prevoist-marshal excepted, who is constantly to keep the key in his possession.' Then the witness goes on, and says the plaintiff's wife and two children applied to see the plaintiff; that they were not permitted to come nearer than 30 yards of the prison; that the plaintiff lay upon boards; he had no bed: his wife brought bedding, but was not permitted to carry it to him. He says the guard was sure to be troubled if they had suffered any one to come to him, if they had been guilty of a breach of the order. He subsisted upon bread and water: that when persons are confined for capital offences, they have the provisions of the island, bread and beef, brought them. He says that no one attempted to bring any to the plaintiff, because the order was so strict. There was an air-hole at the top of the prison; a centinel was placed to keep any person from approaching it; and says that was not done in any instance before, even of deserters. He says the plaintiff had a wife and five children. He never heard him speak disrespectful of the governor, only he complained whilst in prison of his sufferings.

William Johns was garrison-gunner at Minorca in 71. He had been there nine years. He knew the plaintiff, who lived genteelly, as much so as any one in St. Phillip's. He says the plaintiff was brought to prison by a file of men. Then he was going on about hand-cuffing, and so on, which the defendant's counsel admitted, as described by the last witness; but he was not kept hand-cuffed in prison. He says the prison is a ground-floor, and is set apart for capital offenders. The first day he was in prison, his son, a lad of fifteen, came to see him, and had provisions in a basket. He desired the men upon duty to let him carry them to his father, and they refused him. You see, gentlemen, it is owing to those strict orders, that no man was to have access to him.

John Craig is a matross. He says he was at Minorca in 1771. He had been there nine years. He knew the plaintiff to be in very good circumstances; that is, he was so reckoned by people in the island. This witness says, that he did duty upon him when he was in prison, and none were admitted to see him: that his wife and child were refused. He says, that after five or six days confinement, the witness was at the quay, and saw him put on board a vessel that was under sail. He says, this was done between three and four in the morning. He says his wife and child came down then to speak to him, but the centinel would not let them come near him, nor let the witness speak to him, though he wanted so to do. Then it is admitted that he was banished, by Mr. Mostyn's order, to Spain for one year: he ordered him to be landed at Carthage, and it was so done.

Colonel James Bidulph says, he has been at Minorca; that he knew the plaintiff in June 63. He staid there, I think, till the year 71. He says the plaintiff appeared to him as one of the what he calls the second sort of people: he was reputed to have some houses and vineyards: he had a father living. He says, that he was not received as one of the noblesse, but as a gentleman. He says, 'I should call him a kind of a gentleman farmer.' It was said by the counsel, that the noblesse comprehends all the gentry; but upon my asking the witness, he tells you, 'No: they make a very considerable distinction of the higher and inferior noblesse; so that he is what you may call in England in the light of the middling class of men. He says, that as far as he observed, he behaved very well: and you see this gentleman speaks from 63 to 71, that he behaved very well, and had a very good character. He says, that he often employed him to get wine and other things, and he dispatched his commission very well. He says he principally kept company at Citadella with a don Vigo and don Sancho, who were two of the first rank there (that is I think, the capital of the island); that he always behaved with very great decency. And, gentlemen, you are told, that the defendant is a lieutenant-general, governor of the island of Minorca, and has a regiment of dragoons. This is the evidence in support of this action by the plaintiff.

Why then, on behalf of the defendant, they tell you that they shall make out this justification; that they shall shew to you that this man behaved in a very turbulent and disorderly sort of way; that he behaved with such earnestness, and in such a manner, under such circumstances, as tended to incite and to raise a sedition. And certainly, gentlemen, if that is the case, it is a matter of very serious and momentous concern indeed. For the governor of a garrison, without a possibility of calling in another armed force to suppress it, to quiet them if an insurrection should be stirred up and begin amongst them, it is to be sure of very great moment and importance. For a person intrusted in so high and important a station, and of such a delicate and ticklish sort, as the government of the island, the governor should be extremely vigilant to suppress the first seeds of mutiny and sedition. This they say they shall be able to shew you. But, say they, if we shall not be able to make out this justification strictly and duly, according to the way in which it is pleaded; yet, say they, we shall lay such circumstances before you, shewing that the general behaviour of the plaintiff was of that kind, and of that complexion, that it will weigh with you by no means to give large damages. This is what I think was pretty much the substance of what the gentlemen have insisted upon by way of opening the defendant's case.

Why then, in the first place, though it was read at the conclusion of the parole evidence, I may remind you of the several matters in writing that have been read; and I think it would be but mispending your time for me to read them at large over again to you. For when I have so done, I am sure I shall not be able to do it with more distinctness than the ingenious officer under me has done: and when I have finished, they would just as much be out of your memory as they are now. But you will remember perfectly the nature of the proceedings. I purpose to collect them as well as I can into a focus; to bring the pith of them as well as I can to you. The true ground of the dispute was this: This Fabrigas the plaintiff wanted, as you understand, the advantage of an order of his late majesty in council, in the year 1752, by which, keeping under the afforiation, not exceeding it, but keeping under it, every one was to have a right of selling wines, so as he did not exceed the afforiation. Really, gentlemen, an exceeding good plan this is; and that is, a regulation of prices prices to keep people from imposing in the most immoderate manner on the inhabitants. Very likely, a system of something of the like sort would not be improper, but be of very considerable use even in this metropolis, for what I know. But then it seems that this order lasted only from the year 52, during the government of general Blakeney. When general Johnston succeeded general Blakeney as governor of this island, he thought proper to make an alteration in that order; and the substance of the alteration which he made was, that for the future it should not be in the suburbs of St. Phillip's (you understand, gentlemen, this island is divided into, I think, four or five departments—four besides this arraval, as it is called, of St. Phillip's); and that for the future it shall not be sold promiscuously by every one when the afforation was made, but that for the future the four wards of the arraval of St. Phillip's should draw lots, and so take it in succession: I suppose, sell one after another till the wine is disposed of. And it does seem to me by the evidence which has been given by one of the witnesses, which you will hear more fully stated by and by, it seems better than when sold helter skelter and promiscuously. And this regulation was pursued with some advantage. Then you see the plaintiff wanted to go back to the first order of 52, which is the order of the king in council. From thence you see all this business sprung, and from Allimundo's selling wine. That is one grievance that was complained of, and which seemed to be pretty material, I confess, as it strikes me; because I recollect, that by one of the orders it is expressly forbid that the officers or judges, or any of them, should have any intermeddling with trade or traffic. Now the complaint of the plaintiff against this Allimundo is, that he who had the check upon all the rest, this mustaph, buys great quantities of grapes, and makes a vast quantity of wine himself. So while he kept the others under check, he sells his own wine. Therefore that is another thing to be considered of. Therefore you see there are repeated petitions upon this occasion. And I will only say this: that to be sure it turns out at length to have been a mistake in Mr. Wright's evidence, that that number of 150 persons that were mentioned by the defendant's counsel as people by him to be produced to back his petition, or people with which his petition should be backed, that he considered as a mob, because he takes it down in writing himself: and when it comes to be read, it does appear that the expression of the plaintiff was, that he would bring 150 people with him, dealers in wine and grapes, in order to shew that his petition was exceedingly reasonable, and would be agreeable to them. Now that you see is the substance of this writing, together with the several particulars, orders, and proceedings, which I dare say you have in your memory. I must observe this, to be sure, these gentlemen are not bred in the train of the law, and in a course of legal proceedings; but general Mostyn seems to me to be as inquisitive as he possibly can to find out the bottom of this thing. It does not appear from the witnesses that the general had the least self-interest to serve in this business of his own, no profit or advantage to himself; there is no evidence whatever, not a spark of that sort that appears. He sends to Dr. Oliver and Dr. Markadal to make enquiry into this matter. He sends to them, and desires to know their opinion. He convokes together a council of the field-officers: and then they are of opinion upon the whole of this business, whether right or wrong is not to the present question: but it strikes me upon this evidence, that this general Mostyn does seem to me to be extremely solicitous and desirous to inform himself as well as he can, what is to be done upon the occasion: and at length it ends in a general answer, such as it was, that it would be very right to banish this man. Now they proceed to call several witnesses.

James Wright says, he resided in Minorca from January 71 to the middle of the year 72, as secretary to the defendant Mr. Mostyn the governor. He tells you that this island is divided into four districts, exclusive of the arraval of St. Phillip's, which the witness always understood to be separate and distinct from the others, and under the immediate order of the governor (you will observe, that it is in that district that the fortification stands): so, says he, that no magistrate of Mabon could go there to exercise any function, without leave first obtained from the governor. The whole island, he says, is governed by the Spanish laws, subject to be varied by the governor; but not subject to that variation in respect to meum and tuum of property, but as to the internal police of the island. And he tells you, that his proclamation, with a penalty annexed, is of such force, that where the penalty is annexed, if it is broken, the party is subject to it, and is liable to be imprisoned for non-payment. He says that the party is seized and brought into the court of the chief justice criminal.—I would ask a question of Mr. Wright. Has this justice criminal a commission to try offences?

Mr. Wright. He has the king's commission to try and to hear all causes when they come before him. He brings them to the governor, who signs them; and till the governor has signed them, they are not valid.

Q. But when the governor has once signed them, has this gentleman the jurisdiction to try offenders?

A. The assesseur criminal, and the officer fiscal, who sits as judge with him, bring their opinion to the governor, who hears and approves of their opinion, and signs it.

Q. Do you make any distinction between one part of the island and another?

A. The arraval of St. Phillip's is so exempt from all kind of jurisdiction, (at least was, when I was there) that it is a rule in the island, that if any body dies, comes by their death by any accident, drowned and fished up, that the criminal assesseur, with I believe the fiscal and his officers, goes to the dead body. They take the thumb, and say, Who killed you? This is a form they go through by way of bringing about a kind of inquisition taken by a coroner. Whenever they have occasion to go there, they ask the governor leave, if within the arraval; and there is a particular instance of a soldier's wife being killed by her husband.

Q. Suppose a person is guilty of a murder within the arraval, who is he tried by?

A. The assesseur criminal goes and takes inquisition. That he does not do till he has the governor's leave.

Q. Suppose a person is murdered, and the murderer is found out, to be sure you don't let the murderer escape with impunity?—A. No.

Q. Now let me ask you, within the arraval by whom is he tried?

A. The governor appoints, but he generally appoints the assesseur.

Q. Then the governor does not try him himself?

A. He never tries any thing of the sort.

Q. Then he deposes somebody to try him?—A. Yes.

Q. Suppose in lesser offences, of theft or riot, does he not appoint other people?

A. In small offences, the mustaph.

Mr. Justice Gould. Gentlemen, there was, in consequence of this affair, a proclamation, that no memorial, unless for mercy, could be presented, unless it was first signed by an advocate, admitted in their courts. He says that the king in council issues, upon application, alterations, which are registered in the court of royal government; which includes, as I understand him, both the civil and the criminal jurisdiction. He says that the defendant being much teased by the plaintiff, by repeated applications, directed Mr. Wright to inquire what sort of a man he was. He tells you, that the plaintiff's father has some small vineyards; that the plaintiff is a lover of politics; that he spends five days in seven in talking of politics; that at that time he believes the plaintiff had no property at all. Then he speaks as to the character of Mr. Mostyn. It seems not to be disputed at least but he is an officer, and a man of as great humanity as possible: no one existing has tenderer feelings, and his conduct in general is in that manner. Then this gentleman goes through the whole detail of these several writings which have been read to you, which, as I said before, I shall not take up your time, for the reasons I have already given you, in repeating over again, for you have heard them all read. He tells you, amongst other things, that the inhabitants of the arraval sent a petition to Mr. Mostyn that the regulation might continue, and not be altered, as the plaintiff desired. He tells you that the plaintiff having been with the general's aid-de-camp, this witness met him, and civilly desired him to point out what he wished: that it should be done. He says there was one Mr. Vedall that acted as an interpreter, and a priest, one Seguy, that joined with Mr. Wright to press the plaintiff to go home and mind his affairs, and not to bring himself into trouble. Then this gentleman swears, that Mr. Vedall said from the plaintiff as interpreter, that he would come with 150 men to back his petition, or with a petition backed with 150 men. This gentleman says, he understood by that a mob. I shall presently state to you, as I have already hinted to you, the mistake in that respect. He says there was a long conversation by Vedall with the plaintiff, as his interpreter, to desire him to desist: he still repeated the same. Then he says that he informed the governor, that there were people that he understood that were to accompany this man as a mob the next day. That the general sent for the officers to meet him the next morning. They accordingly came. A large number of people were expected, but only four people of the inferior order brought a petition. They were dismissed to go home peaceably. That the result of the whole was, that the plaintiff was banished from the island. He says, that the defendant sent him the witness to the chief justice civil and criminal, who are both Minorquins, to ask what was the governor's power in this case? They sent word back, that his power extended over the man in any shape he pleased; and if he chose to banish him, he might; they would answer it with their ears. He carried the answer to the defendant; but however, doubting himself of the law, the assesseur civil delivered him an order in writing, which was dated in 1590; and that imported, that though it was very fit for the governor to ask the advice of the assesseurs civil, yet that the governor was not by any means bound to follow it; that it was not decisive, as in matters of property. He says, that the assesseur civil, upon this occasion, lent his officer, which he called his tipstaff, to the governor, to apprehend the plaintiff, who accordingly was taken, was kept in prison about five days, and then banished.

Then he tells you, upon his cross-examination, that Allimundo makes wine and sells it in gross, but not, as he believes, in retail. He says that the Minorquin language is very bad Spanish. Then he is desired to look at the paper; for he had a paper, with which, in giving his evidence, he refreshed his memory; but upon looking to the words in that paper relative to the 150 men, the words that he has set down are,

'The same day Mr. Fabrigas came for an answer to his petition, he told the governor's secretary, that he should come the next day with a petition of people concerned in grapes and wine, which they would sign and come with themselves, to the number of 150.'

So that you see this gentleman says, as I apprehend him, (I don't know whether this paper that he has now produced is the original paper that he set down the minutes on for recollection and for remembrance at the time: I don't know whether that is so or not—however, it may be a copy of it) he said he set it down upon loose pieces of paper at first. If that be the case, the strong probability is, that this entry that I have read to you must have been set down recently after the conversation. You see the words are, that it was to be 150 people concerned in grapes and wines. Then he tells you, that upon the 11th the governor and the field-officers met, and, as you heard upon his original examination, received a memorial by four men signed by blank persons—you see the number is left blank. This gentleman says he cannot recollect the number. He says he was counting them, but he believes there were more than 40, between 41 and 47, he can't be exact; but the number of persons by whom it is signed is in this copy blank. The purport of this memorial is to desire that the old practice may be pursued. To which he answered by the officers, that they should return home, and behave as good and peaceable subjects to his majesty ought to do. I have anticipated it. I see he says, according to his memory, there were from 41 to 47 signatures. There were a great many marks, you understand, to this petition delivered by the four men. He can't say he counted it through, and can't affirm what the number was. He was further examined: and he says, that upon strict enquiry it did not appear that above one in ten supported the plaintiff's desire;

he is sure he allows a greater proportion than the truth was: and he says he informed the defendant Mr. Mostyn of that. He made the enquiry at the defendant's request, in order to discover the sense of the inhabitants.

John Pleydell, aid-de-camp to the governor, says, that on the 9th of September 71, the plaintiff asked him to see the governor. He told him if he had any thing for the governor, he would deliver it. After a little hesitation the plaintiff delivered a memorial, and desired him to tell the governor he should come the next day accompanied by 200 or 250 inhabitants of St. Phillip's. He says he carried the memorial to the governor, and told him what the plaintiff had said; upon which he says, that the governor that day sent to the commanding officers of the corps to meet at the governor's the next morning, to see how he should receive the plaintiff, and the people that were to come with him. Now here you see in the evidence given by this Mr. Pleydell, there is not that explanation of the nature of the end and design of these 200 or 250 people being to come with him, as there is in that memorandum that Mr. Wright produced: for this is in general said 200 or 250 people. And I can't help remarking to you, that it seemed to make an impression on the governor, and to alarm him: for it was upon his delivering this message to him that Pleydell says he did desire the field and commanding officers of the corps to assemble the next morning, to see how he should receive the plaintiff and the people that were to accompany him. But he says, instead of the plaintiff and such a number of people, four men came the next day and brought a memorial. He believes all the commanding officers were there. He was told by the governor that the sense of all the officers was, that the plaintiff should be taken up as a dangerous and seditious person: he says he had consulted the Minorquin judges, and their opinion was the same with the military officers. He says this gentleman is an inhabitant of the arraval, just by the glacis of the fort; and says that he kept his father's vineyard; and that the defendant, far from being a tyrannical over-bearing man, is one of much temper and humanity, and the witness served under him the last war.

Upon his cross-examination, he understood that by the plaintiff's saying he should bring 200 or 250 men, that it was to enforce or give weight to his petition, to certify that that was their opinion; that is, that they concurred in the plaintiff's opinion: but, says he, so many people coming together is an act in itself of a tumultuous kind. He says the people in general wished to have Mr. Johnston's regulation continued. As to the memorial that was brought by the four men, he did not read it, and had it not in his hand; but by just the superficial glance he had of it, he thinks there might be 50 or 60 names to it.

Robert Hudson, fort-adjutant, says, that upon the 10th or 11th of September, the mustaph of St. Phillip's told him, that upon delivering out a proclamation (though I ought not to sum that up, for what this Allimunda said is no sort of evidence)—but he says that having received this intelligence (so far it is material) he did give the governor an information of it: the governor was then in Mabon. He says, that before the plaintiff made this objection, he never heard any objections to Mr. Johnston's regulation; that it was to prevent the wine from turning sour, by being sold in that hurrying sort of way; that great quantities of it produce fluxes and other diseases among the garrison, for there are few cellars it seems in the garrison. He says after this regulation, in several years experience, none of the wine did turn sour. Then there was a question that occurred to me to ask, whether the serving it out in this sparing manner did not influence the price. They said, no, because the afforation fixed the price that it could not exceed it.

Colonel Patrick Mackellar says he knows the plaintiff; he was called Red Toney: I suppose he has red hair. He says he bore a very bad character; that he was a seditious, troublesome, drunken, shuffling fellow; that he had many complaints against him from two mustaphs. He was in the island from 36 to 50, and again from May 60 to last May. He tells you the arraval of St. Phillip's is surrounded by a lime-wall on one side, and the other side a ditch; that the arraval is a royalty, where the governor has a greater power than any where else; that the judges can't interfere but by the governor's consent.—That corresponds exactly with the explanation that Mr. Wright gives.—He says, in other parts of the island there are jurats, but in the royalty there is only this mustaph, who is appointed by the governor or commander in chief, and is at pleasure displaced by him. He takes care of weights, measures, and markets, and of all wine and the expenditure of it, and settles little disputes between the inhabitants in the first instance. That the magistrates at Mabon put the afforation within their jurisdictions. This mustaph does not make any afforation himself, but acquiesces under that of Mabon: he only signifies the afforation that has been made at Mabon. The Minorquins are in general governed by the Spanish laws. When it serves their purpose, they plead the English laws. Some are well affected to our country; some are not. He attended the governor once or twice on account of the plaintiff; and he says that the general opinion of all the officers was, that the plaintiff was a dangerous person; and that it was proper to take him up and bring him to punishment; and were of opinion to banish him. He says the defendant is a good officer, a polite well-bred man, that he carried his command in the gentlest manner, and is a person of great humanity.

On his cross-examination he says, that he and the other field-officers met by the defendant's desire, to know what was their opinion upon this business. Two of the judges of the island thought it intirely in the governor's breast to do as he pleased; but there was no trial. He does not recollect whether major Norton was of that opinion: it was the opinion of the majority. He was asked whether major Rigby was of that opinion or not? He says he can't say how that was, but does not remember that any one officer dissented from that opinion.

Then Edward Blakeney, secretary to the governor of that name, is examined. He says that nothing can be executed in the arraval of St. Phillip's but by the governor's permission: it is a royalty; he has the absolute government there. He says that gen. Blakeney a few months after his arrival in the year 48, banished two Franciscan friars into Spain or Italy; that was in time of peace. He says there was afterwards by a great deal of interposition leave given to those people to return. He says that the power itself was never disputed, and he took it to be handed down from the Spaniards, by whose laws, as you observe, the Minorquins are governed, and at their own request. He says the judges have applied to the witness for the governor's leave to execute processes in the arraval. He says the late king sent four regiments to relieve the troops stationed there, (an order of humanity, like his majesty) and to have all the wives and children brought home: however, a priest took a liking to one of the young women, and would not deliver her up. The priest was banished; the consequence of which was, the girl was delivered up, and the priest was brought back again. He gives these as three instances where people were banished from the island. He says that these friars, two Franciscans, were as he believes natives, Minorquins. This is the parole evidence that is given on the part of the defendant. I have already stated to you the substance of all that written evidence: you have heard it, and you are fully masters of all the circumstances attending this cause.

Now, gentlemen, it is for your consideration, whether the defendant, general Mostyn, has made out his justification; whether he has proved that the defendant was guilty of a riot, and of a disturbance, and that he endeavoured to excite and to stir up a mutiny and a sedition in the garrison. If that is the case, I should imagine, gentlemen, the plaintiff will appear to you as a person of a very dangerous disposition; and that some very strict methods must be necessary to be taken in such a situation, in order to preserve the garrison, and to prevent an insurrection. If it is insinuated to the soldiers that they are abused by the officers under the governor, by the governor's connivance, or by his remissness; we will say, though he has no kind of interest in it, but by his gross encouragement, they are oppressed and imposed upon;—suppose such a persuasion should be infused into the people composing the garrison, I think it is very clear, and I need not argue to you, to shew what dangerous consequences may result from that. Then you will consider how this case stands in that respect. You see that this person, after several years (a new regulation having been made by governor Johnston) is for setting up again and reviving an old regulation made in 52; and that he could not prevail so to do.—Then the sense of the island was to be taken. It is in the governor's power to rescind this, as I apprehend, because it is not disputed but that by his commission, according to his plea, he is intrusted with the whole civil and military government of the island: and I presume, however, if he was to have made such an alteration, he had authority to do it: the governor himself, in short, is intrusted with it. Then this person wants to set that old business on foot again; and he does produce, (for so I must take it from the writing that that gentleman has produced) he does mean to shew to the governor, that there are a vast number of people of his sense in the affair. The misfortune of it is, however, that this is not expressly conveyed to the governor; because, according to the whole belief of the agent, though he understood that it was meant to give weight to the petition, not to proceed to direct violence; for what I can find, that was not directly explained to general Mostyn. Now you will consider upon this evidence, whether you are satisfied that this was such a behaviour in the plaintiff, as to afford a just conclusion, that he was a man that was about to stir up a sedition and a mutiny in the garrison; or whether he meant no more than earnestly to press his suit, and to endeavour to obtain redress from what seemed to him to be a grievance. If you shall see it in that latter light, to be sure there is no question at all that he will be intitled to recover in this action. As for the damages, I shall not say a word upon that matter, because it is your province to consider on it upon all the circumstances. Then there is another consideration, which will be a legal consideration: that supposing you should be of opinion that this was really a seditious behaviour in this plaintiff, which you will consider of, and also whether he acted in such a manner as to stir up sedition, you will be pleased to say That when you bring in your verdict. The next thing is, that supposing you see the plaintiff's conduct in that light as a mutinous purpose, whether the defendant could be warranted to proceed in that manner. That is, to be sure, a matter of very great consequence. It is not like persons in this country, in England, where no freeman shall be banished his country; which is carried to such an extent, that lord Coke tells us, that it is not in the power of the king to send a man against his will even to be the lord-lieutenant of Ireland (I don't believe there are many gentlemen that would recoil at that): but it could not be done, because it would be an exile: you drive a man against his will out of his native country. But however, this is a case you see in a conquered island, in a ceded island. And certainly I should conceive myself, that if in a garrison where it is absolutely necessary to keep down all these mutinous spirits, from the apparent reason of danger, that it must certainly be lawful for the governor at least to lay a man up in prison that is turbulent. But I should doubt a great deal myself; it will be a matter that you, gentlemen, will have an opportunity to consider, if you please, if you shall be of opinion that the plaintiff's behaviour was seditious; and that is the reason that I desire you to attend to that, and tell me when you give in your verdict. It would be carrying matters to a very great length indeed, in my apprehension, to say, that you should exile and banish a man from his native country. I cannot, sitting here and as at present advised, think that even in such a situation that could be warranted. I cannot think but that a person might be secured and confined, in order to be brought to trial, and properly punished for it. I leave it to you under these observations, and you will consider upon the whole of it, what damages you should please to give to the plaintiff. As to the defendant, you hear the character he bears from all the witnesses: a man of great humanity, who has been guilty of an inordinate use of his power, but not with a malevolent, bad, and wicked design. To be sure, you will not deal out the damages with the same view as you would against a man that acted clearly and demonstrably with malice. It is your province, gentlemen, to consider all the circumstances, and to give in your verdict accordingly.

The jury withdrew, and in about an hour returned, and gave in their verdict for the plaintiff, with three thousand pounds damages, and all costs of suit.—And at the same time said, that, in their opinion, the plaintiff was not guilty of mutiny or sedition, or acted in any way tending thereto.

Further proceedings in this cause.

THE counsel for the defendant, while the jury withdrew to consider their verdict, tendered to the judge minutes of a bill of exceptions; and on the fourth day of Michaelmas-Term, the court of Common-Pleas was moved for a new trial.

The defendant's counsel made his motion on two grounds.

First, for excess of damages; alleging that the jury had proceeded on a mistake, for they had found that the plaintiff was not guilty of mutiny or sedition; whereas he insisted it was most plain from the written evidence, that the plaintiff had endeavoured to make the garrison believe that he was their friend.

Secondly; that a new trial ought to be granted, because this action could not be maintained, as the court had no jurisdiction.

The rule to shew cause was, of course, granted.

On the 25th of November, Mr. justice Gould reported the evidence, which agreed with the printed trial. On the 26th, it was solemnly argued on the first objection of excess of damages, the court not permitting the defendant's counsel to argue the second objection, as they said it would be introducing a new mode of practice, which might eventually be prejudicial to suitors; and as the bill of exceptions went with the record to the court of King's Bench, that was the proper court to determine on it.

Lord chief justice DE GREY delivered his opinion to the following purport.

I HAVE always considered this mode of application for a new trial, as very salutary to the suitors, who may be injured by mistakes; and likewise to the jury, as it reforms their errors, if they commit any, and is a happy substitute for the much more grievous proceeding that the common law had directed. With regard to the interposition of the courts of justice on the quantum of damages, where the subject of the suit is contract, the court has an easy rule to go by in rectifying the mistakes of the jury, because there is a certain test and standard. As for instance, if a man should bring an action on a note for a hundred pounds, and the jury should give for damages a thousand pounds under the idea of interest, they would go upon a mistaken principle, as it is certain the party could not have sustained an injury adequate to that compensation: the damages would be excessive, and the court would correct it. But in personal wrongs, it is much more difficult to draw a line. I do not go so far as to say, that in personal wrongs the court will never interpose, even upon the article of excessive damages, if they are outrageous, and appear so to the court; that is, as my brother Gould expressed it, if it appears, in giving the damages, that the jury did not act with deliberation, but with passion, partiality, or corruption. As for instance, if two ordinary men should quarrel at an alehouse, and one should give the other a fillip upon the nose, and a thousand pounds should be given for damages, which is ten times more than both the parties are worth, such damages would be evidence that the jury had not acted with the deliberation that the administration of justice requires. It is a personal tort, but the damages are excessive. There are other circumstances, where the court, even upon excessive damages, might interpose: and I think the counsel for governor Moslyn have very wisely endeavoured to ground themselves upon such a principle in this cause; which is, that the jury, in assessing the compensation for the injury, have proceeded on a mistake. It is possible that in many instances that mistake may arise from the direction of the court; for the court may perhaps direct the jury to attend to a circumstance, that in point of law is not proved, or is not the subject-matter for their consideration: or it is possible that the jury may so mistake the evidence, as to believe the fact to be true, when it is not so: then it comes to be a proper motion for a new trial, because the verdict is contrary to evidence. Or the jury may give credit to such circumstances, which either have not been proved, or are not true, and they may aggravate the damages upon that account: they then act under a mistake, which most certainly ought to be rectified. That is the ground upon which the present application is made. But if you consider it in your own mind, it will necessarily result to this proposition, that the jury have found a fact contrary to evidence. As my brother Davy was aware that there might be some difficulty in maintaining that proposition, he put it into another shape, and said it was a circumstance that was proper for the jury to consider as a ground for mitigating the damages; instead of which, they had from that circumstance aggravated the damages. So that, upon the whole, it will still recur to the same proposition, that they have acted upon a mistake, in giving aggravated damages upon a fact, which they have found contrary to evidence. For they were unanimously of opinion, that what the plaintiff did, was not done with any seditious view, or tending thereto, but was an earnest pressing of a suit to be relieved from a grievance supposed. That was the inquiry they were particularly ordered by my brother Gould to make; and that was the answer that they gave. Now, if in point of fact they were so mistaken, as that they ought not to have been of opinion that the plaintiff did not act with a seditious view, but was only pressing importunately a suit for relief from a supposed grievance, then they have given damages upon a false supposition; they have given such as are not proportionate to the injury received. The argument then seems to me to come to this, that they have believed a fact which they ought not to have believed, because the proof was against it. We are therefore to consider, whether the damages ought to have been raised so high or not. And there are two cases insisted upon. One is the behaviour of Mr. Fabrigas, as tending to raise disorder and sedition in the government. The other is the conduct of governor Moslyn, in extenuation of damages, as acting under a mistake, and having taken the best advice the nature of his situation would admit. In order to understand this, we must see for a moment the situation the government stood in.

This island was conquered in 1708: The conquerors (no matter in what mode) had a right to impose what laws they pleased. Upon the cession of the island, by the eleventh article of the treaty of Utrecht, part of the right of the conqueror was given up; for it is stipulated, that the inhabitants shall enjoy their honours, estates, and religion. So far therefore the right of the conqueror is restrained; but with regard to their laws, there was no stipulation, nor was it ever understood so by sober people. It is well known that the earl of Stanhope and the duke of Argyle, as plenipotentiaries upon this subject, and afterwards my lord Bolingbroke, did assure the inhabitants, that they should enjoy their own rights and privileges, still subject to the supreme dominion of the conqueror. Those rights and privileges which they were to enjoy, were the established municipal laws of the island, under such regulations as the legislature of this country should impose upon them. This assurance, made at that time, has been attended to by government ever since; for they have had the enjoyment of their privileges so assured to them, and have had such regulations, as the government and the nature of affairs have from time to time required.

The king in council, in the year 1752, (upon several complaints having been made against general Anstruther, who had been the governor) made the regulation, as it is called, of 1752; by which the king in council intended to provide against that oppressive power of the governor, which the inhabitants had complained of, and that the people of the island should be at liberty to sell their wines at the price fixed by the jurats of the different terminos.—These powers were soon found, or thought, to be abused; which occasioned a representation to be made by the then governor to the king in council, which produced the new regulation of 1753, which leaned on the other side, as the natives said: for as the former was supposed to give too much power to the magistrates of the island, making them independent of the governor; so this threw too much power into the hands of the governor, and laid them too much at his mercy.

There is one thing mentioned in my brother Gould's report, which I think proper to take notice of, because it should not be so mistaken. (a) one of the witnesses in the cause represented to the jury, that in some particular cases, especially in criminal matters, the governor resident upon the island does exercise a legislative power. It was gross ignorance in that person to imagine such a thing. I may say, it was impossible, that a man who lived upon the island, in the station he had done, should not know better, than to think that the governor had a civil and criminal power vested in him. In the island, the governor is the king's servant: his commission is from the king, and he is to execute the power he is invested with under that commission, which is to execute the laws of Minorca under such regulations as the king shall make in council. How does it stand after the conquest of this island in 1757, by the French, and the relinquishment of it upon the peace? When general Johnston was sent as deputy-governor, he thought fit to make a new regulation. Now, I conceive, it was a vain imagination in the witnesses at the trial, (for we don't want to go to Minorca to understand the constitution of that island) it therefore was a vain imagination in the witnesses to say, that there were five terminos in the island of Minorca. I have at various times seen a multitude of authentic documents and papers relative to that island, and I do not believe, in any one of them, that the idea of the arraval of St. Phillip's being a distinct jurisdiction was ever started. Mahon is one of the four terminos: St. Phillip's, and all the district about it, is comprehended within the termino of Mahon. But, however, as it happens to lie near the glacis of the fortification, and the governor's power (I don't mean his legal authority) being there greater than it may be in more distant parts of the island, there has been a respect shewn him, a decency perhaps to the governor, which has prevented the magistrates interfering without his knowledge. But to suppose that there is a distinct jurisdiction, separate from the government of the island, is ridiculous and absurd: it is what I never did hear of, till it was mentioned in my brother Gould's report. General Johnston made an alteration in the arraval of St. Phillip's, which is a district of a mile or two in circumference, with some few hundred inhabitants. He divided this into a subdivision of four other districts, and annulled by his own authority the regulation of 1752, respecting the mode by which the wines were to be sold. As far as appears in this cause, he did that without authority. If he had the sanction of government, his instructions should have appeared, if the defendant intended to avail himself of them. I only mean to be understood, that general Johnston had no authority to supersede the order of council by his own power; but at the same time it seems to be a very salutary provision; and if he had represented it to the king in council, no doubt but it would have been approved of. I may say that the inhabitants approved of it, because from that time there never has been any complaint of it. A few years ago there were a multitude of complaints brought against the arbitrary acts, as they were called, and the oppressive conduct of this very general Johnston. They were heard in a full council with a great deal of solemnity for a great number of days, and the council came into a resolution upon them. This alteration of the order in 1752 was not one of their charges against him; therefore it is clear, that the inhabitants of the arraval did not at that time think it an oppression.

We come now to the point of time, when Mr. Fabrigas complained of it. I will not condemn him for referring to the order of council. He had a right to know whether this alteration of governor Johnston was made by authority, and whether it had the effect of the power of the king in council; therefore I do not condemn the thing itself. Mr. Fabrigas not having met with that success which he expected, (though governor Mostyn, I think, till the time of the arrest and commitment, acted with a great deal of caution, judgment, and prudence, I can almost say impartiality) and not being satisfied with the opinion of the governor upon the representation and defence of Allimundo, which he had never seen, desires to see it. His petition is rejected. This produces a peevish application again and again to the governor, and from one complaint another arises. New grievances are supposed to be received, not only by Mr. Fabrigas, but by the inhabitants of the arrayal at large: and I cannot say that I approve of the manner in which he did prosecute his claim: the effect of it is another thing. He certainly did not observe that decency and respect to the governor which he ought to have done. If the governor did not attend to his complaints, the king in council was open to him. We all know, that the way to the king in council has been pursued very often, where the governor has not attended to the complaints of the Minorquins. His expressions indeed have the appearance of humility and respect; but yet there is a petulance in the continuing his petitions, which might disturb the governor. Thus the matter goes on; this man still complaining, and earnestly pressing of his suit upon a grievance supposed, till the secretary informed the governor, that the plaintiff would come next day with his petition backed with 150 of the dealers in grapes and wine. This it is that is supposed to alarm the governor. Now I will not reflect so much upon the honour of any governor of the garrison of fort St. Phillip's, as to suppose, that he really thought his garrison was in any more danger than this court is at the present moment; nor will I suppose, that if he did think his garrison was in danger, that he would have taken such feeble means to defend it. The governor was disconcerted by the petulance of the man, and was off his guard; and though he took the advice of those who were the proper persons to advise him there, yet he must have too much self to imagine, that the advice they gave him was such as he could either in law or reason follow. I am not speaking now of the law of this island; but it is totally contrary to all principles, and to every idea of justice in any country. But the next day, this petition is presented by four men only. Then there is an end of all danger to the garrison and the government; and you plainly see no disturbance was meant; nor is there any evidence of his soliciting the people, of his breeding cabals among them, or exciting any tumult or disorder. The plaintiff had, to say the worst, only behaved himself ill in the mode of his importunity; and when he was open to the laws of that country (for such laws I presume there must be) if he had offended, he might have been prosecuted in the courts of criminal jurisdiction. Whether he acted improperly, from not having succeeded in prevailing upon the majority of the people to think he was right in desiring to enforce the order of 1752, is not the question: the people seemed to be content with the variation, or deviation, made by general Johnston. Now when all these matters are over, this man is committed to prison; and there is the first complaint: and I must take it upon this motion, that it was a false imprisonment. If the governor had secured him, nay, if he had barely committed him, that he might have been amenable to justice; and if he had immediately ordered a prosecution upon any part of his conduct; it would have been another question, and might have received a different consideration. But he commits him to the worst prison in the island; and in a way which I cannot conceive came from general Mostyn. What could induce him to use a man with such hardship and inhumanity? Was not putting him into prison sufficient? Why was he to be deprived of the society of his wife and children, without being allowed any thing for his sustenance but bread and water, and to lie upon the floor? In this condition he remains for six days: then comes a second imprisonment; for I take the whole year to be a continuation of the false imprisonment. He is then confined on board a ship, under the idea of a banishment to Carthage. I do believe Mr. Mostyn was led into this, under the old practice of the island of Minorca, by which it was usual to banish: I suppose the old Minorquins thought fit to advise him to this measure. But the governor knew that he could no more imprison him for a twelvemonth, than that he could inflict the torture; yet the torture, as well as banishment, was the old law of Minorca, which fell of course when it came into our possession. Every English governor knew he could not inflict the torture; the constitution of this country put an end to that idea. This man is then dragged on board a ship, with such circumstances of inhumanity and hardship, as I cannot believe of general Mostyn; and he is carried into a foreign country, and of all countries the worst; for I believe there are directions given, that no persons should go to Spain, or be permitted to quit the port of Carthage. All his continuance in Spain, I look upon as a continuance of the false imprisonment; because every constraint upon personal liberty, without legal authority, is a false imprisonment: and if a captain leaves a sailor upon a desert island, though he is left at liberty there, yet the keeping him from that place to which he had a right by law to come, is an imprisonment.

If upon proper cause the courts of justice there had in a judicial way exercised any power which their laws would have supported, and which the laws of this country might not; what the effect of that would have been has nothing to do with this cause; for now we take it upon the general issue, not guilty. In this case, the man has been imprisoned under circumstances of great hardship for twelve months, and kept from the communication of his family and his own concerns. In this situation he brings his action; and the jury have thought fit to give three thousand pounds damages. To be sure, three thousand pounds is an immense sum for a Minorquin to recover: my brother Davy thought proper to use the expression of its being an outrageous sum. To say what is the value of the liberty of a man's person, secluded from his family, under circumstances of hardship, for twelve months, is a difficult matter. Men's minds will vary much about it: I should think one thing, another would think another. In this case of personal wrongs, what has the law said? The law has said, that a jury of twelve men shall be the judges to determine and assess the compensation for that personal wrong. We cannot but recollect what passed in those unfortunate affairs that happened about the secretary of state and a printer's boy. A servant is taken up under a mistake, and carried to a better house than his own, is fed with better provisions than he had of his own, and is treated better than he would have been treated when at home; yet he brings an action of false imprisonment, and has 300*l.* damages. It was more than he could earn for years. The court was applied to for a new trial, upon excessive damages. What did the court say? (and I never heard their judgment in that matter arraigned) 'We are not the judicature to determine upon the deliberative judgment of a jury, upon such a subject as this. Have the jury exercised their judgment? or, is there any imputation upon their conduct except the idea of the compensation not being proportioned? Not at all.' How can a court of justice, that is to determine upon law, set a value upon this, and say, it is wrong? What would be the consequence of it? If we say this is wrong, we must say what is right. Then we are to tell the jury, 'You are not to find 300*l.*' 'May we find 200*l.* 100*l.* 50*l.* or 100*l.*? Tell us where you think we should be right?' 'We must not tell you; we have no authority to do that; but you must not give outrageous damages.' For tho' I may know in my own mind whereabouts I should compensate the injury, without saying whether it would be more or less than this, yet I cannot prescribe to the jury what I think the value of personal liberty. But it is said, that the governor did what he could in his situation; but was mistaken. If he was mistaken, it is a matter of mitigation before the jury, and it comes exactly to the same point. I presume it was pressed before the jury, and they paid such attention to it as they thought proper; and therefore it would be totally evoking the cause from its proper determination to say, that the jury ought to give some other damages than they have. As to the ground on which the defendant's counsel have made this motion, it arises from an accident, and I think an accident which was very properly provided for: for had it not been, that the learned judge who tried the cause had particularly in terms recommended the consideration of this point to the jury, and taken their answer, the defendant could not have had any ground to apply for a new trial. In my opinion, the learned judge did very right, and acted with great prudence and justice to the parties, and to the future questions that may arise in this cause; for it looks as if the parties from the beginning intended to apply either here or elsewhere. Now it is a very different question, whether the governor of Minorca, finding a subject mutinous and seditious, and disturbing his government, can arrest and imprison him? or, whether he can justify what he has done, the jury having found that he was neither mutinous nor seditious? Had they found the contrary, that fact might have been taken into consideration in a court of justice; but as they have exercised that jurisdiction the constitution has given them, I think there ought not to be a new trial.

Mr. Justice Gould said, that the court was not warranted in determining that the damages were excessive, without breaking in upon the fundamental principles of the constitution.

Mr. Justice Blackstone observed, that these damages could not be called angry or vindictive damages, as the injury was as outrageous as the damages could be excessive.

Mr. Justice Nares declared, that Mr. Fabrigas had been imprisoned and treated in such a manner that he did not care to repeat.

The whole bench were unanimous in refusing a new trial, and the rule was consequently discharged.

Further Proceedings in the Cause of Fabrigas and Mostyn.

THE court of Common-Pleas having refused governor Mostyn a new trial, he resorted to a writ of error, which was allowed on the 14th of December 1773.

On the 16th of December he was obliged to put in bail.

A rule was given to transcribe the record in Hilary-Term, 1774.

The first scire facias issued in Easter-Term.

The second scire facias issued in the same term, on the 16th of May, returnable in Trinity-Term.

Mr. Fabrigas, the defendant in error, was served with a summons on the 7th of June, that the plaintiff might have time to assign errors till judge Gould had put his seal to the bill of exceptions.

On the 8th of June, judge Gould came into the court of King's Bench, and acknowledged his seal.

The errors were assigned on the 16th of June.

The defendant pleaded in nullo est erratum on the 20th.

A concilium was moved for on the 21st of June.

It was set down for argument for the first Friday in Michaelmas-Term.

It was argued on Tuesday the 15th of November 1774; and the record is as follows.

The record of the proceedings in Fabrigas and Mostyn.

The writ of error.

As yet of Trinity-Term, in the fourteenth year of the reign of king George the third.

Our lord the king sent to his trusty and well-beloved sir William de Grey, knight, his chief justice of the Bench, his close writ, in these words; that is to say: George the third, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. To our trusty and well-beloved sir William de Grey, knight, our chief justice of the Bench, greeting. Forasmuch as in the record and process, as also in giving of judgment in a plaint which was in our court before you and your associates, our justices of the Bench, by our writ between Anthony Fabrigas and John Mostyn, esq. of a plea of trespass, assault, and false imprisonment, as it is said, manifest error hath intervened, to the great damage of the said John, as by his complaint we are informed: we, willing that the said error (if any be) be duly amended, and full and speedy justice done to the said parties in this behalf, do command you, that if judgment be given thereupon, then you send to us distinctly and plainly, under your seal, the record and process of the said plaint, and all things touching the same and this writ; so that we may have them in fifteen days of St. Hilary, wheresoever we shall then be in England; that inspecting the record and process aforesaid, we may cause further to be done thereupon for amending the said error, as of right, and according to the law and custom of England, shall be meet to be done. Witness ourself at Westminster, the sixth day of December, in the fourteenth year of our reign, Hil. A. L.

The return to the writ.

The answer of sir William de Grey, knight, chief justice within-named.—The record and process of the plaint within mentioned, with all things touching the same, I send before our lord the king, wheresoever, &c. at a day within contained, in a certain record to the writ annexed, as I am within commanded, &c. William de Grey.

Pleas. Inrolled at Westminster before sir William de Grey, knight, and his brethren, justices of his majesty's court of Common Bench, of Easter-Term, in the thirteenth year of the reign of our sovereign lord George the third, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, and so forth. Rolls 616 and 617.

The declaration.

In the Common-Pleas.

LONDON to wit. } JOHN MOSTYN, late of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, esquire, was attached to answer Anthony Fabrigas of a plea, wherefore he with force and arms made an assault upon the said Anthony, at Minorca, (to wit) at London aforesaid, in the parish of Saint Mary le Bow, in the ward of Cheap, and beat, wounded, and ill-treated him, and there imprisoned him, and kept and detained him in prison there for a long time without any reasonable or probable cause, contrary to the laws and customs of this realm, against the will of the said Anthony, and compelled the said Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforesaid, where the said Anthony was dwelling and resident, and carried and caused to be carried the said Anthony from Minorca aforesaid, to Carthagena in the dominions of the king of Spain, against the will of the said Anthony; whereby the said Anthony was put to great expence and trouble, and the goods and effects of the said Anthony there were diminished, lost, spoiled, and consumed, and the family of the said Anthony were brought to great want and distress, and the said Anthony, during all the said time, was thereby deprived of the comfort of his said family: and also wherefore the said John with force and arms made another assault upon the said Anthony at Minorca, (to wit) at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, and beat, wounded, and ill-treated him, and there imprisoned him, and kept and detained him there in prison for a long time, without any reasonable or probable cause, contrary to the laws and customs of this realm, against the will of the said Anthony; and did other wrongs to him, to the great damage of the said Anthony, and against the peace of our lord the now king: and thereupon the said Anthony, by Richard Gregory, his attorney, complains, that the said John, on the first day of September, in the year of our Lord 1771, with force and arms, (to wit) with swords, staves, sticks, and fitts, made an assault upon the said Anthony, at Minorca, (to wit) at London aforesaid, in the parish of St. Mary le Bow, in the ward of Cheap, and beat, wounded, and ill-treated him, and then and there imprisoned him, and kept and detained him in prison there for a long time, (to wit) for the space of ten months, without any reasonable or probable cause, contrary to the laws and customs of this realm, against the will of the said Anthony, and compelled the said Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforesaid, where the said Anthony was then dwelling and resident, and carried and caused to be carried the said Anthony from Minorca aforesaid to Carthagena, in the dominions of the king of Spain, against the will of the said Anthony; whereby the said Anthony was then and there put to great expence and trouble, and the goods and effects of the said Anthony there were diminished, lost, spoiled and consumed, and the family of the said Anthony were thereby brought to great want and distress, and the said Anthony during all the said time was deprived of the comfort of his said family: and also, for that the said John on the said first day of September, in the year of our Lord 1771 aforesaid, with force and arms, (to wit) with swords, staves, sticks, and fitts, made another assault upon the said Anthony, at Minorca, (to wit) at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, and then and there beat, wounded, and ill-treated him, and then and there imprisoned him, and kept and detained him there in prison for a long time, (to wit) for the space of other ten months, without any reasonable or probable cause, contrary to the laws and customs of this realm, against the will of the said Anthony; and then and there did other wrongs to him the said Anthony, to the great damage of the said Anthony, and against the peace of our said lord the king: and thereupon the said Anthony saith, that he is injured and hath sustained damage to the value of 10,000*l.* And thereof he bringeth suit, &c.

The plea.

And the said John, by James Dagge his attorney, comes and defends the force and injury, and says he is not guilty of the premises above laid to his charge in manner and form as the said Anthony hath above complained thereof against him; and of this he puts himself upon the country, &c. and the said Anthony doth so likewise. And for further plea in this behalf as to the making the said assault upon the said Anthony in the first count in the said declaration mentioned, and beating and ill-treating him, and imprisoning him, and keeping and detaining him in prison for the said space of time in the said declaration mentioned, and compelling the said Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforesaid, and carrying and causing to be carried the said Anthony from Minorca aforesaid to Carthagena, in the dominions of the king of Spain, by the said John above supposed to have been done; he the said John, by leave of the court here for this purpose first had and obtained, according to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, says, that the said Anthony ought not to have or maintain his said action thereof against him the said John, because he says that he the said John, at the said time, &c. and long before, was governor of the said island of Minorca, and during all that time was invested with and did hold and exercise all the powers, privileges, and authorities, civil and military, belonging and relating to the government of the said island of Minorca, in parts beyond the seas; and the said Anthony before the said time when, &c. (to wit) on the said first day of September, in the year aforesaid, at the said island of Minorca aforesaid, was guilty of a riot and disturbance of the peace, order, and government of the said island, and was endeavouring to create and raise a mutiny and sedition among the inhabitants of the said island, in breach of the peace, violation of the laws, and in subversion of all order and government; whereupon the said John, so being governor of the said island of Minorca as aforesaid, at the said time when, &c. in order to preserve the peace and government of the said island, was obliged, and did then and there order the said Anthony to be banished from the said island of Minorca, and to leave and quit the said island. And in order to banish and send the said Anthony from and out of the said island, did then and there for that purpose gently lay hands upon the said Anthony, and did then and there seize and arrest him, and did keep and detain the said Anthony, before he could be banished and sent from out of the said island, for a short space of time, (to wit) for the space of six days then next following; and afterwards, to wit, on the seventh day of September, in the year aforesaid, at Minorca aforesaid, did carry and cause to be carried the said Anthony, on board a certain vessel, from the island of Minorca aforesaid to Carthagena aforesaid, as it was lawful for him to do for the cause aforesaid, which are the same, making the said assault upon the said Anthony in the first count of the said declaration mentioned, and beating and ill-treating him, and imprisoning him, and keeping and detaining him in prison for the said space of time in the said first count of the said declaration mentioned, and compelling the said Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforesaid, and carrying and causing to be carried the said Anthony from Minorca to Carthagena, in the dominions of the king of Spain, whereof the said Anthony hath above complained against him: and this he is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment if the said Anthony ought to have or maintain his said action thereof against him, &c. without this that the said John was guilty of the said trespass, assault, and imprisonment, at the parish of St. Mary le Bow, in the ward of Cheap, or elsewhere out of the said island of Minorca aforesaid.

Thomas Walk.

The replication.

And the said Anthony, as to the said plea of him the said John, by him secondly above pleaded in bar, as to the said assaulting the said Anthony in the said first count of the said declaration mentioned, and beating and ill-treating him, and imprisoning him, and keeping and detaining him in prison for the said space of time in the said declaration mentioned, and compelling the said Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforesaid, and carrying and causing to be carried the said Anthony from Minorca aforesaid to Carthage, in the dominions of the king of Spain, by the said John above done, protesting that the said plea, and the matters therein contained are insufficient in law to bar the said Anthony from maintaining his said action against the said John. For replication in this behalf, he saith, that the said Anthony ought not, by reason of any thing by the said John above in pleading alledged, to be barred from having his said action thereof maintained against him; because, he saith, that the said John, of his own wrong, and without such cause as the said John hath above in his said plea alledged, on the same day and year aforesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, assaulted the said Anthony, and beat and ill-treated him, and imprisoned him, and kept and detained him in prison for the said space of time in the said declaration mentioned, and compelled the said Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca aforesaid, and carried and caused to be carried the said Anthony from Minorca aforesaid to Carthage, in the dominions of the king of Spain aforesaid, in manner and form as the said Anthony hath above complained against him; and this he prays may be enquired of by the country. And the said John doth so likewise.

John Glynn.

Award of the venire.

Therefore, as well to try this issue as the said other issue between the said parties above joined, it is commanded to the sheriffs, that they cause to come here, in three weeks of the Holy Trinity, twelve, &c. by whom, &c. and who neither, &c. to recognize, &c. because as well, &c.

At which day the jury between the said parties of the plea aforesaid, was respited here until on the morrow of All Souls then next following, unless Henry Gould, knight, one of the king's justices of the Bench here assigned by form of the statute, &c. should first come, on Friday the second of July last past, at the Guildhall of the city of London. And now here at this day cometh the said Anthony, by his said attorney, and the said justice, before whom, &c. hath sent here his record in these words.

The plea.

That is to say, afterwards, on the day and in the year, and at the place within-mentioned, come as well the within-mentioned Anthony Fabrigas as the within-named John Moflyn, by their attornies within-named, before Henry Gould, knight, one of the justices of the Bench within-named, and certain of the jurors, whereof mention is within made, summoned to be upon that jury, (that is to say) Thomas Zachary, Thomas Ashby, David Powell, and Walter Ewer, being required, come, and on that jury are sworn; and because the rest of the jurors of the same jury do not appear, therefore eight other persons of the by-standers, being by the sheriffs within-written hereunto elected, at the request of the said Anthony, and by the command of the said Henry Gould, are now newly set down, whose names are affixed in the within-written pannel, according to the form of the statute, &c. which said jurors so newly set down, (that is to say) William Tomkyn, Gilbert Howard, Thomas Boulby, and John Newball, John King, James Smith, William Hurley, and James Selby, being also required, come likewise, and, together with the said other jurors before impannelled, are tried and sworn to speak the truth of the matters within contained; who upon their oath say, that as to the first issue within-joined, the said John Moflyn is guilty of the premises within laid to his charge, in manner and form as the said Anthony hath within complained against him: and as to the other issue within joined, the said jurors on their said oath further say, that the said John Moflyn, of his own wrong, and without such cause as he hath in pleading within alledged, on the day and in the year within mentioned, at London, in the parish and ward within mentioned, assaulted the said Anthony, and beat and ill-treated him, and imprisoned him, and kept and detained him in prison for the space of time in the within declaration mentioned, and compelled him the said Anthony to depart from and leave Minorca within-mentioned, and carried and caused to be carried the said Anthony from Minorca aforesaid to Carthage, in the dominions of the king of Spain within mentioned, in manner and form as he the said Anthony hath by his replication within alledged; and they assess the damages of the said Anthony, by reason of the premises within specified, besides his costs and charges by him laid out and expended about his suit in this behalf, to 3000*l.* and for his said costs and charges, to forty shillings. Therefore it is considered, that the said Anthony recover against the said John his damages aforesaid, to three thousand pounds, and two pounds by the jury aforesaid, in form aforesaid assessed, and 88*l.* to the said Anthony, at his request, for the costs and charges aforesaid, by the court here for increase adjudged; which said damages in the whole amount to three thousand and ninety pounds, &c. Afterwards (that is to say) before our lord the king at Westminster, comes the said John Moflyn, in his proper person, and says, that at the trial of the said cause before the said Henry Gould, knight, the counsel of him the said John Moflyn proposed certain exceptions to the opinion of the said Henry Gould, which exceptions were written in a bill, and sealed by the said judge; which bill of exceptions the said John Moflyn now brings into this court, and prays a writ of our lord the king to the said Henry Gould, to confess or deny his seal so put to the said bill of exceptions, according to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, which writ is granted to him returnable in fifteen days from the day of the Holy Trinity; at which day, before our lord the king at Westminster, comes the said John Moflyn in his proper person; and the said Henry Gould, knight, likewise in his proper person, comes and acknowledges his seal put to the said bill of exceptions, which bill of exceptions follows in these words.

The bill of exceptions.

That is to say, on the morrow of the Holy Trinity, 13 Geo. III. Be it remembered, that in the term of Easter, in the thirteenth year of the reign of our sovereign lord George the third, now king of Great Britain, and so forth, came Anthony Fabrigas, by Richard Gregory his attorney, into the court of our said lord the king of the Bench at Westminster, and impleaded John Moflyn, late of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, esq. in a certain plea of trespass on which the said Anthony declared against him.

[The declaration, plea, and replication, are here set out verbatim, which, to avoid repetition, are now omitted. After those pleadings the bill of exceptions proceeds in these words.]

And afterwards (to wit) at the sittings of nisi prius, holden at the Guildhall of the city of London aforesaid, in and for the said city, before the hon. Henry Gould, knight, one of the justices of our said lord the king of the Bench, Thomas Lloyd, esq. being associated to him according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, on Monday the 12th day of July, in the 13th year of the reign of our said lord the now king, the aforesaid issues so joined between the said parties as aforesaid, came on to be tried by a jury of the city of London aforesaid, for that purpose duly impannelled; at which day came there as well the said Anthony Fabrigas as the said John Moflyn, by their attornies aforesaid. And the jurors of the jury aforesaid, impannelled to try the said issues, being called over, some of them, namely, Thomas Zachary, Thomas Ashby, David Powell, and Walter Ewer, came and were then and there in due manner chosen and sworn to try the same issues; and because the rest of the jurors of the same jury did not appear, therefore others of the by-standers being chosen by the sheriffs, at the request of the said Anthony, and by command of the said justice, were appointed anew, whose names were affixed to the pannel of the said jury, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided; which said jurors so appointed anew, (to wit) William Tomkyn, Gilbert Howard, Thomas Boulby, John Newball, John King, James Smith, William Hurley, and James Selby, being likewise called, came, and were then and there in due manner tried and sworn to try the same issues. And upon the trial of the said issues, the counsel learned in the law for the said Anthony Fabrigas, to maintain and prove his said declaration, on his part gave in evidence, that the said John, at the island of Minorca, on the 17th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1771, seized and took the said Anthony, and without any trial imprisoned him for the space of six days, against his will, and banished him for the space of twelve months from the said island of Minorca, and caused him to be put by soldiers on board a ship, and to be transported from the said island of Minorca to Carthage in Spain, for the said space of twelve months: whereupon the counsel for the said John Moflyn did then and there, on the part of the said John Moflyn, give in evidence, that the said Anthony was a native of Minorca, and at the time of taking, seizing, and imprisoning him, and banishing him as aforesaid, was residing in and an inhabitant of the arraval of St. Phillip's in the said island. And it was further given in evidence on the part of the said defendant, that the said island of Minorca was ceded to the crown of Great-Britain by the king of Spain, by the treaty of Utrecht, in the year of our Lord 1713; and that the article in the said treaty, relative to the said island, is as follows: rex porro Catholicus, pro se, heredibus et successoribus suis, cedit pariter coronæ Magnæ Britannicæ totam insulam Minorcæ, ad eamque transfert in perpetuum jus omne dominiumque plenissimum supradictam insulam spectantem, vero super urbem arcem portum munitiones et sinum Minoricensis, vulgo Port Mahon, ura cum aliis portibus locis oppidisque in præfata insula sitis; provisum tamen est ut in articulo suprascripto quod nullum perfugium, neque receptaculum patebit Maurorum navibus bellicis quibuscunque in Portu Mahonis, aut in alio quovis portu dictæ insulæ Minorcæ, quo ora Hispaniæ ipsorum excursionibus infestæ reddantur. Quinimo commorandi solummodo causâ secundum pacta conventiona Mauris eorumque navigiis introitus in insulam præfatam permittitur. Promittat etiam ex sua parte regina Magnæ Britannicæ, quod si quando insulam Minorcæ et portus oppida locaque in eadem sita a coronâ regnorum suorum quovis modo alienari in posterum contigerit, dabitur coronæ Hispaniæ ante nationem aliam quamcunque prima optio possessionem et proprietatem præmemoratæ insulæ redimendi. Spondet insuper regia sua majestas Magnæ Britannicæ, se facturam ut incolæ omnes insulæ præfatæ tam ecclesiastici quam seculares bonis suis universis, et honoribus tunc pacatæque fruantur. Atque religionis Romanæ Catholicæ liber usus iis permittatur utque etiam ejusmodi rationes meantur, ad tuendam religionem prædictam in eadem insulâ, quæ a gubernatione civili atque a legibus Magnæ Britannicæ, penitus abhorre non videantur. Poterunt etiam suis honoribus et bonis frui, qui nunc suæ Catholicæ majestatis servitio addicti sunt, etiamsi in eodem permanferint; et liceat cuicunque, qui præfatam insulam relinquere voluerit, bona sua vendere et libere in Hispaniam transfere. And it was further given in evidence on the part of the said defendant, that the Minorquins are in general governed by the Spanish laws, but, when it serves their purpose, plead the English laws. And it was further given in evidence on the behalf of the said defendant, that there are certain magistrates, called the chief justice criminal, and the chief justice civil, in the said island. And it was further given in evidence by James Wright, the secretary to the defendant, that the said island is divided into four districts, exclusive of the arraval of St. Phillip's, which the witness always understood to be separate and distinct from the others, and under the immediate order of the governor; so that no magistrate of Mahon could go there to exercise any function without leave first had from the governor. And it was further given in evidence on the part of the said defendant, by colonel Patrick Mackellar, that the arraval of St. Phillip's is surrounded by a line-wall on one side, and on the other by the sea, and is called the royalty, where the governor has greater power than any where else in the island, and where the judges cannot interfere but by the governor's consent. And it was further given in evidence by Edward Blakeney, who had been secretary to governor Blakeney, that nothing can be executed in the arraval but by the governor's leave; and the judges have applied to him the witness for the governor's leave to execute process there. And it was further given in evidence by the said James Wright, that for the trial of murder and other great offences committed within the said arraval, upon application to the governor, he generally appoints the assesseur criminal of Mahon, and for lesser offences the mustaltaph; and that the said John Mostyn, at the time of the seizing, taking, imprisoning, and banishing the said Anthony, was the governor of the said island of Minorca, under and by virtue of certain letters patent of his present majesty, under the great seal of Great-Britain, bearing date the 2d day of March, in the eighth year of his reign, whereby his majesty constituted and appointed the said defendant to be captain-general and governor in chief in and over the said island of Minorca, and the town and garrison of Port Mahon, and the castles, forts, and other works and fortifications thereunto belonging, and all other towns and places within the said island; and his majesty did thereby give and grant unto the said defendant John Mostyn, or in his absence to the lieutenant-governor, or commander in chief for the time being, all powers, privileges, and authorities, civil and military, unto the said office belonging, to have, hold, and exercise the said office, powers, privileges, and authorities, during his majesty's will and pleasure; and the said defendant John Mostyn, or in his absence the lieutenant-governor, or commander in chief for the time being, are to observe and obey all the orders and instructions therewith given to him, and all such further and other orders and instructions as shall be from time to time given to him under his majesty's royal sign manual or signet, or by his majesty's order in privy-council; and his said majesty did thereby strictly charge and command all his officers, ministers, magistrates, civil and military, whatsoever, and soldiers, and all others his loving subjects, inhabiting or being in the said island, to obey him the said John Mostyn, as captain-general and chief governor thereof; and that the defendant, being so governor of the said island, caused the said Anthony to be seized, taken, imprisoned, and banished as aforesaid, without any reasonable or probable cause, or any other matter alledged in the defendant's plea, or any act tending thereto. But nevertheless the said counsel for the said John Mostyn did then and there insist before the said justice, on the behalf of the said John Mostyn, that the said several matters so produced and given in evidence on the part of the said John Mostyn as aforesaid, were sufficient and ought to be admitted and allowed as decisive evidence to entitle the said John Mostyn to a verdict, and to bar the said Anthony of his aforesaid action; and the said counsel for the said John Mostyn did then and there pray the said justice to admit and allow the said matters so produced and given in evidence for the said John Mostyn, to be conclusive evidence in favour of the said John Mostyn, to entitle him to a verdict in this cause, and to bar the said Anthony of his action aforesaid. But to this the counsel learned in the law of the said Anthony, did then and there insist before the said justice, that the same were not sufficient nor ought to be admitted or allowed to entitle the said John Mostyn to a verdict, or to bar the said Anthony of his action aforesaid. And the said justice did then and there declare and deliver his opinion to the jury aforesaid, that the said several matters so produced and given in evidence on the part of the said John Mostyn, were not sufficient to bar the said Anthony of his action aforesaid, and with that direction left the same to the said jury; and the jury aforesaid then and there gave their verdict for the said Anthony, and 3000*l.* damages. Whereupon the said counsel for the said John Mostyn did then and there, on the behalf of the said John Mostyn, except to the aforesaid opinion of the said justice, and insisted on the said several matters as an absolute bar to the said action. And inasmuch as the said several matters so produced and given in evidence on the part of the said John Mostyn, and by his counsel aforesaid objected and insisted on as a bar to the action aforesaid, do not appear by the record of the verdict aforesaid, the said counsel for the said John Mostyn did then and there propose their aforesaid exceptions to the opinion of the said justice, and requested the said justice to put his seal to this bill of exception, containing the said several matters so produced and given in evidence on the part of the said John Mostyn as aforesaid, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided. And thereupon the said justice, at the request of the said counsel for the said John Mostyn, did put his seal to this bill of exceptions, pursuant to the aforesaid statute in such case made and provided, on the said 12th day of July, in the 13th year of the reign of his present majesty.

Assignment of errors.

And hereupon the said John Mostyn says, that in the record and proceedings aforesaid, and also in the matters recited contained in the said bill of exceptions, and also in giving the verdict upon the said issues between the parties aforesaid joined, and also in giving the judgment aforesaid, there is a manifest error in this, that the justice before whom, &c. had no power, authority, or jurisdiction to try the said issues, or either of them, at the time when the same was tried, as in the record mentioned; nor had the said justice any power or authority to take or swear the said jury thereon. There is also error in this, that the said justice before whom, &c. at and upon the trial of the said issues between the parties aforesaid joined, did declare and deliver his opinion to the jury aforesaid, that the said several matters mentioned in the said bill of exceptions, and so as aforesaid produced and proved on the part of the said John Mostyn, were not upon the whole of the case sufficient to bar the said Anthony Fabrigas of his said action against him, and with that opinion left the same to the jury; whereas the same were sufficient to bar the said Anthony of his said action. There is also error in this, that by the record aforesaid it appears, that the verdict aforesaid was given upon the said issues between the said parties joined, for the said Anthony Fabrigas; whereas by the law of the land, the verdict on the said issues ought to have been given for the said John Mostyn, against the said Anthony Fabrigas. There is also error in this, that it appears by the record aforesaid, that judgment, in form aforesaid given, was given for the said Anthony Fabrigas against him the said John Mostyn; whereas by the law of the land, judgment ought to have been given for the said John Mostyn against the said Anthony Fabrigas. And the said John Mostyn prays, that the judgment aforesaid, for the errors aforesaid, and others in the record and proceedings aforesaid, may be reversed, annulled, and altogether had for nothing; and that he the said John Mostyn may be restored to all which he has lost by occasion of the judgment aforesaid, &c.

In nullo est erratum.

And the said Anthony hereupon voluntarily comes in his own proper person into court here, and says, that neither in the record or proceedings aforesaid, nor in the matter recited and contained in the said bill of exceptions, nor in giving the verdict upon the said issues between the parties aforesaid joined, nor in the giving the judgment aforesaid, is there any error; and that the said Anthony prays, that the court of our lord the king now here will proceed to the examination, as well of the record and proceedings aforesaid, as of the matters recited and contained in the said bill of exceptions and of the matters aforesaid above-assigned for error, and that the said judgment may be in all things affirmed. But because the court of our lord the king now here is not yet advised to give their judgment of and concerning the premises, a day is therefore given to the parties aforesaid, to be before our lord the king, until on the morrow of All Souls now next ensuing, wherefore, &c. to hear judgment of and upon the premises; for that the court of our said lord the king now here, is not yet advised thereof, &c.

Mr. Buller.

My lord, there are some strange blunders upon this record, which though I might make objections to, I will not mispend the time of the court in stating them, because I can easily conceive myself that they will admit of a very short answer; and therefore, waving all objections to the formal part of the record, the general question upon this record will be, whether an action can be maintained in this country against a governor of Minorca, for an imprisonment committed by him there in his character and office of governor, upon the person of a Minorquin, even though the governor should have erred in his judgment, and have been mistaken in the necessity which he conceived demanded an immediate and resolute exercise of the powers of his office? My lord, though this be the general question, I shall beg leave in the argument to divide it into two: first, whether in any case an action can be maintained in the courts at Westminster, for an imprisonment committed at Minorca upon a native of that place: and secondly, if it should be admitted that an action will lie against any other person, yet whether such action can be maintained against a governor, acting as such within the peculiar district of the arraval of St. Phillip's? My lord, in the consideration of both these questions, it may be material to attend a little particularly to the situation and constitution of the island of Minorca, and arraval of St. Phillip's, within which this transaction arose. As to that, the court will be much relieved by the contents of this record; for it is there stated, that this island, till the year 1713, was a part of the dominions of the kingdom of Spain, and then it was ceded to the crown of Great-Britain, reserving to the inhabitants their property, their religion, and the laws necessary for the preservation of their religion. It is further stated in the record, that the island is not governed by the laws of England, but by the laws of Spain; and that the arraval of St. Phillip's is subject only to the controul and government of the governor himself, for in that there is no regular law-officer; there is no power to which the subject can apply for justice but to the governor himself; he is therefore the sole and absolute judge within the arraval; his will is the law there, and that district at least is a despotic government. Whatever may be the case in colonies and new-discovered countries, I fancy it will not now be denied, that, even in countries obtained by conquest, the old laws of the place continue in force till they are changed or altered by the conquerors; much less can it be contended, that in a country ceded as this was, the laws of the place receive any alteration till a change is declared by the new sovereign. In the present case, there has been no new code of laws established in this island; and therefore, independent of the particular facts which are stated as proved in this cause, I think I may safely assert it as an undeniable proposition, that this island is now governed by the same laws as it was before the year 1713.

It is stated in the record, that the district where the present cause of action arose is subject only to the immediate order of the governor; and so much so, that no judge of the island can exercise any function there, without the particular leave of the governor for that purpose. If the laws of the country where the offence is committed are different from the laws of this kingdom, it seems to me to make no difference with respect to the propriety of an action, whether such country is subject to the crown of Great-Britain, or to any other state; for whether the fact be an offence or not, must be decided by the particular laws of the place where it was committed; and not by the laws of this country. This is a case where the law of the place is different from the law of this country; and therefore the question might have been taken much larger than I have done it: namely, whether the subject of a foreign power, who rules by laws different from ours, can, for an act done in his own country, seek redress in the courts of England. I believe there are no authorities in support of such a position; and whatever may be the case, where the laws of different countries agree, and where the transaction has been between British subjects, with a view to the laws of England, (which was the case of Robinson and Bland), that can be of no avail in the present instance: for I take it in this case, if the action can be maintained at all, it must be governed by the laws of Minorca, and not by the laws of England. It is said in the case of Robinson and Bland, that the laws of the place where the thing happened does not always prevail; and there an instance is put by Mr. Justice Wilmut, that in many countries an action may be maintained by a coortellan for the price of her prostitution, but that no such action can be allowed in this country. That is undoubtedly true; for wherever the foreign law is contrary to the law of God, to the law of nature, or contra bonas mores, this court not court will recognize it; but neither of these are the present case. My lord, besides, there is a great difference between entertaining a suit, and giving a remedy upon an immoral transaction, and punishing a man for an act, which, if done here, would be deemed a crime, but, in the country where it is committed, is esteemed none. In such a case as that, the law of this country can never be the rule by which this court will govern themselves, nor could they with propriety give a judgment contrary to the known law of this land; and therefore, I should apprehend, that in such case they would refuse to hold plea at all. That seems to have been the opinion of lord chief justice Pratt, in a case that came before him in the year 1765: that was the case of Pons against Johnson, and a like case of Ballister against Johnson. Those were two actions tried at the sittings after Trinity-Term 1765; an action of trespass and false imprisonment, brought by the plaintiff, a native of Minorca, against the defendant, who was governor. The facts were, that in Minorca there is a court called Tribunal of Royal Government: the governor is president, the assessor is judge: the fiscal is in nature of attorney-general, during the pendency of a cause; but, when sentence is to be passed, he has a voice as well as the assessor. If they agree, the governor is bound to confirm: if they disagree, the governor has the casting voice. It was proved, that this is the only court of criminal jurisdiction, and that slanders are considered as criminal suits; that the defendant wrote a letter to the assessor and fiscal, complaining that the plaintiff had spread reports injurious to him, and desiring them to enquire into it, and act as they thought just and fit. Upon this letter, the fiscal directed an enquiry, and the assessor ordered plaintiff to be imprisoned: that he applied to defendant Johnson to be bailed, who refused to bail him; but it appeared that the assessor was the person whose business it was to bail, though orders, as well for imprisoning as bailing, often passed in the name of the court. Upon this evidence it was objected, first, that by the treaty of Utrecht, the inhabitants have their own laws preserved to them, and are not to be sued here, and therefore have no right to sue here: secondly, admitting them to have a right to sue here, the action is misconceived, &c. Lord chief justice Pratt said, 'I think it very improper such action should be brought here, where foreign law is to be brought into question: the inconvenience appears here, where all the evidence we have had is the testimony of one witness; and I should think if I were under the necessity of pronouncing upon the point, that parole evidence ought not to be sufficient, but a commission should go, and the law be certified.' As to the question of jurisdiction, his lordship said, 'It is certain there are many cases of transitory actions between subject and subject, where, though the cause arises in a foreign country, the action may be brought here; such as contract, trespass, or even false imprisonment of some kinds: and the rule that should govern seems to be, where the subject matter is of that kind, that the law of nature should govern all over the world. And I think, that a person who is an alien should have a right to sue here in cases of that kind: but I think this is not to be extended to transitory actions of every kind, where the lex loci is so intermixed with the cause as to alter the case, and vary the legality of the transaction.' His lordship then expressed some doubts on the form of the plea; and finally nonsuited the plaintiffs on another point. My lord, I cite this case for the sake of the reasoning contained in it; and there was the opinion of a very learned judge, that an action in this country was improper, where it was so intermixed and blended with the law of another country, as to vary or change the legality of the transaction. My lord, another thing which appears by that case is, that though lord Camden seems to think an action may in some cases lie on a foreign transaction, yet he confines it to cases where the transaction happened between subject and subject. This is not a transaction which happened between subject and subject, (speaking as of the realm of England) nor is it a case where the same law governs all over the world; but it is that particular case pointed out by lord Camden, so mixed with the lex loci, that it alters the case, and varies the legality of the transaction. In criminal cases I take it to be clear, that an offence committed in foreign parts cannot, unless under particular statutes, be tried in this country; and of that opinion was the court of Exchequer in a case reported in 1st Vezey, 246. The East-India company against Campbell, 7th of June, 1749: an information was brought in the name of the attorney-general, that the defendant might discover how he came by the possession of certain goods, whether it was not by fraud, violence, contrivance, or other means; and whether they were not the property of the Indians, from whom they were so taken by the defendant and others. The court there say the rule is, that this court shall not oblige one to discover that, which, if he answers in the affirmative, will subject him to the punishment of a crime; for it is not material, that if he answers in the negative, it will be no harm: and that he is punishable, appears from the case of Omichund v. Barker, as a jurisdiction is erected in Calcutta for criminal facts, where he may be sent by government and tried, though not punishable here: like the case of one who was concerned in a rape in Ireland, and sent over there by the government to be tried, although the court of B. R. here refused to do it. My lord, here is a positive opinion, that in criminal cases arising abroad there is no jurisdiction in the common law courts in England. The only thing to be done is to send the party to the country where the offence was committed; but it shall not be tried here. If a man were to marry two wives in a country where bigamy is allowed, it can never be contended in such a case, if the man came into England he should be liable to be hanged here, because it is an offence in this country, though none where it was committed. If a crime committed abroad cannot be tried here, upon what ground shall a civil personal injury, done out of the kingdom, be tried here? There are many reasons why a crime committed abroad might be tried here, and a civil injury not; but no reason occurs to me why a civil injury should, and a crime not. Civil injuries depend much upon the police and constitution of the country where they occur, and the same conduct may be actionable in one country which is justifiable in another: but in crimes, as murder, perjury, and many other offences, the laws of most countries take for their basis the law of God and the law of nature; and therefore, though the trial be in a different country from that in which the offence was committed, there is a greater probability of distributing equal justice in such cases, than in civil actions. The case mentioned in Keilwey, 402, and confirmed in the 4th Institute, 283 and 4, is also an authority in my favour. It first of all gives a history of Sir John Stanley's family, and there five points were resolved: first, that the isle of Man was an ancient kingdom of itself, and no part of the kingdom of England; secondly, they affirmed the case reported by Keilwey, anno the 14th Henry the VIIIth, to be law; namely, Michaelmas the 14th, Henry VIIIth, an office was found, that Thomas earl of Derby, at the time of his death, was seised of the isle of Man in fee; whereupon the countess his wife, by her counsel, moved to have her dower in the Chancery; but it was resolved by Brudnell, Brook, and Fitzherbert, justices, and all the king's counsel, that the office was merely void, because the isle of Man was no part of the realm of England, nor was governed by the laws of this land; but was like to Tournay in Normandy, or Gascoign in France, when they were in the king of England's hands, which were merely out of the power of the Chancery, which was the place to endow the widow of the king, &c. Then it goes on, and says, it was resolved by them, that neither the statute of William the IIId, de donis conditionalibus, nor of the 27th of Henry the VIIIth, of wills, nor any other general act of parliament, did extend to the isle of Man, for the cause aforesaid. So there it is held, that for a right in the isle of Man, though it was part of the territorial dominions of the crown of England, yet that no suit would lie in the court of Chancery; and that this suit instituted by the widow for her dower there was improper, and they could not entertain it. The cases where the courts of Westminster have taken cognizance of transactions arising abroad, and entertained actions founded on them, seem to be wholly on contracts, where the laws of the foreign country have agreed with the laws of England, and between English subjects: and even there it is done by a quaint legal fiction; namely, by supposing, under the sanction of a videlicet, that the cause of action did arise within this country, and that the place abroad lay either in London or in Islington. But where the contrary has appeared, namely, that the place where the transaction did arise was not in London or Islington, there the courts have said such matters were not triable here. There is a pretty strong case arising upon a demurrer in Lutwyche, 946, Davis against Yale. That was an action for false imprisonment of the plaintiff in Fort St. George, in the East-Indies, in parts beyond the seas, videlicet, in London, in the parish of St. Mary-le-Bow, in the ward of Cheap. It was resolved by the whole court, that the declaration was ill, because the trespass is supposed to be committed at Fort St. George, in parts beyond the seas, videlicet, in London, which is repugnant and absurd: and it was said by the chief justice, that if a bond bore date at Paris, in the kingdom of France, it is not triable here; so that judgment was given upon the ground, that it appearing upon the face of the record to be in foreign parts, the supposition that it was in England was absurd and repugnant.

In Ward's case, in Latch 4. in debt, the plaintiff declares upon a bill, bearing date in the parish of St. Mary-le-Bow, London; and upon oyer of the deed, it bore date at Hamburg, and the writ was in debet only. Serjeant Bridgman objected, that although it was usual to lay such actions in any place, to wit, in Kent, London, &c. yet, as this case is, that cannot be; because when any place is named, it shall be understood prima facie, that the place named is a town, and not a particular place, as a house, as appears by 3 Ed. III. 68, et brev. 638: from whence it followed, that Hamburg here should be understood to be a town, which cannot be in London; and therefore the declaration was faulty, for not laying Hamburg within London. But it was argued on the other side by Barnes, who took this difference in pleading: 'I confess that a place named shall be understood to be a city or town, as the serjeant has said, but nevertheless the date of the deed shall be understood to be a particular place or a house; and therefore, if an obligation bears date at Antwerp, or Callis-Sands, it shall be understood to be of those taverns in London, and not of those places beyond the seas,' 21 Ed. IV. 26. And in the case of one Highams and Flowers, 3 Jac. B. R. the date of an obligation was at Athlone in Ireland, and therefore the action could not be laid here, inasmuch as Ireland cannot be in England: but if it had been in Athlone only, then it was agreed that it could be sued here, because Athlone might be alleged to be in England. So here in our case, if the date had been at Hamburg, in partibus transmarinis, it could not be sued here, inasmuch as it could not be in London; but bearing date at Hamburg only, it may be understood to be in England. Whitlock agreed with him: Brook said, 9. and so have been all deeds by experience. 10 Jac. an obligation dated at Elvin was sued in this court, and the action laid in Kent and allowed; and yet Elvin is in Poland. Doderidge said, 'I agree also, if the deed bears date in Little Britain or in Scotland, it shall be understood to be dated at those places, so here being named in London, we, as judges, ought to maintain the jurisdiction of our court, if the case is not plainly and evidently out of our jurisdiction; and for this reason we ought to understand Hamburg to be in London, to maintain the action, because otherwise it would be out of our jurisdiction. And if in truth we should know the date to be at Hamburg super le mere, yet, as judges, we should not take notice that it is super le mere. In this case it does appear upon the record, that the offence complained of was committed in parts beyond the seas, and not in England. My lord, the plea states, that it was committed in the island of Minorca, in parts beyond the seas; these are the words of the plea; and the defendant has concluded his plea with a traverse, that he was not guilty in London, in the parish of St. Mary-le-Bow, or elsewhere, out of the island of Minorca. Now, my lord, this stands admitted by the plaintiff, because if he had thought fit to have denied the place mentioned in the plea, and which was absolutely essential for the defendant to mention, because his justification was a local one, (and tho' the cause of action be transitory in its nature, yet, if the defence be local, the defendant has a right to state it so in his plea, and by that means make that local which before was transitory) he should have made a new assignment, or have taken issue on the place.

It was incumbent upon the defendant to aver, that what he had done was within the arraval, because his authority was confined to that particular place; and therefore, however unjustifiable he might be elsewhere, he was justified there. That part of his allegation stands admitted by the plaintiff; therefore it does appear from the record, that the cause of action did arise out of the kingdom, and consequently, as Dodderidge says in Litch, it does arise out of the jurisdiction of this court; and where it so appears, the judges cannot help taking notice of it; for, as Lucwyche says, as I mentioned before, it is not triable here. Even in cases the most transitory, before the statute of Jesuits, if an action was brought in London, and there was a local justification at Oxford, the cause could not have been tried in London. That was the case in 1st Saunders, 227, an action for words laid in London, charging him with having stolen plate out of Wadham College, viz. in London. The defendant justified speaking the words, because the plaintiff stole plate out of Wadham College in Oxford. It was admitted in that case, that it would have been a fatal error, had it not been for the statute of Jesuits. Now the statute of Jesuits does not extend to Minorca; therefore this case will stand entirely upon the common law; and by that the trial is bad, and the verdict void: for supposing that this or any court at Windsor could hold cognizance of any cause that arises abroad, yet it should not have been tried in London, but should have been tried in the next English county to Minorca. If the law in criminal cases be as I conceive it is, that for a murder committed by a foreigner in another country the criminal could not be punished here, I am at a loss for a reason why he should be punished here for a trespass committed under like circumstances. In order to support that doctrine, this absurdity must be contended for: if Mr. Mofyn, who stood there in the capacity of a governor, and had the sole direction and government of this place, had thought Fabrigas guilty of an offence which forfeited his life, and had punished him accordingly, he could not have been punished; but because he has proceeded in a milder way, and has imprisoned and banished him, therefore he shall be punished. The inconveniences of entertaining such an action in this country are many, and some of them would certainly be intolerable; but the inconveniences that would ensue from rejecting the action would be very slight, if any: and the argument ab inconvenienti, lord Coke says, has been ever allowed to be very forcible in our law. Now if the action be maintained here, it must be determined by the law of this country, or by the law of the place where the offence was committed. If it be determined by our law, that would be unjust indeed; for then a man, who is compelled to regulate his conduct by one law, would be condemned by another, which is totally opposite. And yet the law of this country is the law the plaintiff has thought fit to put this cause upon; and I doubt not but he hopes, under the idea of English liberty, totally to destroy the Minorquin constitution. His declaration is founded on the law of England. The imprisonment is laid in the declaration to be contrary to the law and customs of this realm; so that the law of England is the law to which he appeals, and by which he desires his case may be determined. If an imprisonment is committed there agreeable to the laws of that place, but not consonant to the laws of this realm, is that a ground for punishment in this country? If it is not, the plaintiff cannot support his case upon the law of England in the manner he now attempts to do. If the cause is to be tried here by the law of Minorca, how is that law to be proved? There is no legal mode of certifying the law, and till the trial it may not be known what points of law it may be requisite to inquire into: witnesses cannot be compelled to attend, nor can this court by any means oblige them to answer here; so the defendant would stand in the situation of being called upon to make his defence, without the power of proving either the law or the facts of his case. If this action succeeds, every Frenchman that is confined in the Bastille, and has the good fortune afterwards to escape to this country, would be bringing actions against the officers that confined him; every soldier, who in time of war thinks himself ill used by his commander, when he returns home will harass the commander with a law-suit for any confinement or correction that he may have suffered abroad; and in the end it would be nothing less than that a German army would be governed by an English jury. It would be necessary for every general officer to have a lawyer always at his elbow; and even that, as Mr. Mofyn has found by fatal experience, would not be sufficient to secure him from censure and punishment: for in this case it was proved, that Mr. Mofyn had consulted all the lawyers, and all the military gentlemen in the island, on the expediency and necessity of the measure he took, before he did what is now complained of, and that they were all unanimous in their ideas of the absolute necessity of the business. Some of them openly professed their opinions, and the rest acquiesced by their silence. The lawyers went further, and undertook to answer for the legality of the measure, even at the peril of their heads. In the second place, supposing an action could be maintained here at all for a thing done in Minorca, I shall beg leave to submit to your lordship, that whatever might be the case of other persons, though they might be liable to an action here for things done in foreign parts; yet that the governor or general officer, who has the immediate command and absolute direction of the place, shall not be called upon in an action here to answer for his conduct in that character. Minorca is an absolute government. The governor for the time being is the immediate representative of the king there; and he, at least within the arraval of St. Philip's, whatever may be the case in the rest of the island, as all absolute sovereigns do, governs as he thinks convenient; without being tied up to any fixed rules, which it is not lawful for him to deviate from.

There is no government wherein the power over the lives, as well as the liberties and properties of the subject, is not vested in the supreme power; and whether that power be lodged in a single person, as a monarch, or many, as a parliament or an aristocracy, whatever that supreme power does, it is accountable for to none but God; and the deputy of that power is answerable only to God and his principal. That a judge cannot be punished for any thing he does in his capacity as a judge will not, I believe, be disputed; if it be, there are the strongest authorities upon that point. The strongest perhaps in Salkeld, 396, and 2 Mod. 218; in the latter of which cases, the judge had been guilty of the most unconstitutional conduct. My lord, that in Salkeld is Groenvelt against Burwell and others. The case was this: the censors of the College of Physicians in London are empowered to inspect, govern, and censure all practisers of physic in the city of London, and seven miles round, so as to punish by fine, amercement, and imprisonment. They convicted Dr. Groenvelt of administering insalubres pillulas & noxia medicamenta, and fined him 20*l.* and twelve months imprisonment. Accordingly, the doctor was taken in execution upon this sentence, and brought trespass against the officers and the censors. And it was holden by Holt, chief justice, first, that the censors had a judicial power; for a power to examine, convict, and punish is judicial, and they are judges of record, because they can fine and imprison: secondly, that being judges of the matter, what they have adjudged is not traversable; and the plaintiff cannot be admitted to gainsay what the censors have said by their judgment, which is, that they were insalubres pillulas & noxia medicamenta, 43*d* Eliz. 3, 17, 9*th* E. 4, 3, 12 C. 24, 25: thirdly, that tho' the pills and medicines were really wholesome pills and good medicines, that yet no action lies against the censors, because it is a wrong judgment in a matter within the limits of their jurisdiction; and a judge is not answerable either to the king or the party for the mistakes or errors of his judgment, in a matter of which he has jurisdiction. It would expose the justice of the nation, and no man would execute the office, at the peril of being arraigned by action or indictment for every judgment he pronounces. The other case, which is in 2*d* Modern, 218, is as strong a case, if an action could be maintained against a judge at all, as any that can exist; that is, an action for false imprisonment. The defendant pleaded specially, that there was a commission of oyer and terminer directed to him amongst others, &c. and that before him and the other commissioners, Mr. Penn and Mr. Mead, two preachers, were indicted for being at a conventicle, to which indictment they pleaded not guilty; and this was to be tried by a jury whereof the plaintiff was one; and that after the witnesses were sworn and examined in the cause, he and his fellows found the prisoners, Penn and Mead, not guilty, whereby they were acquitted; and quia the plaintiff male se gesserit in acquitting them both against the direction of the court in matter of law, and against plain evidence, the defendant and the other commissioners then upon the bench fined the jury forty marks a piece, and for non-payment committed them to Newgate. This was a case where a judge had taken upon himself to fine a juryman, because he did not find agreeable to his direction, and had committed him to Newgate. Serjeant Goddellow, who argued for the defendant, said, he would not offer to speak to that point, whether a judge can fine a jury for giving a verdict contrary to evidence, since the case was so lately and solemnly resolved by all the judges of England in Bushell's case, that he could not fine a jury for so doing. But, says he, admit a judge cannot fine a jury, yet, if he doth, no action will lie against him for so doing, because it is done as a judge; but the court told him he need not labour that point, but desired to hear the argument on the other side. In this manner the court would not suffer the question to be argued, whether an action would lie or not against a judge for that which was done by him in that character. On the other side it was urged, that what was done was not warranted by the commission; but at last the whole court say, that the bringing this action was a greater offence than fining of the plaintiff, and committing him for non-payment; and that it was a bold attempt both against the government and justice in general. Lord Coke in his 12*th* Report, 25, says, that the reason and cause why a judge, for any thing done by him as a judge, by the authority which the king has committed to him, and as sitting in the seat of the king, concerning his justice, shall not be drawn in question before any other judge for any surmise of corruption, except before the king himself, is for this: the king himself is de jure to deliver justice to all his subjects; and for this, that he himself cannot do it to all persons, he delegates his power to his judges, who have the custody and guard of the king's oath. And forasmuch as this concerns the honour and conscience of the king, there is great reason that the king himself shall take account of it, and no other. My lord, within the arraval of St. Philip's, general Mofyn was quatuor judge; there was no magistrate within the place but himself; he might appoint another, or might preside himself, to decide upon offences committed within that district. It was so stated in the record, that it was subject to the immediate order of the governor, and no judge could interfere there unless particularly deputed by him; so that the absolute government of that part at least of the island rested solely in his hands. He acted there under an authority committed to him by the king, and there (which is the reason in the 12*th* Report why an action will not lie against a judge) he had the custody and guard of the king's oath; and therefore, as lord Coke says, if he acts improperly in the discharge of the functions of his office, he is accountable to the king only, and no other. My lord, there is another case in the law-books, upon which I shall beg leave to lay great stress; and at present I am not aware how that case will be distinguished, so as to make it inapplicable to the present: but I can find many circumstances even in that, which are much stronger against the determination there, than any that exist in this case against any determination on the part of the defendant. The case I allude to is that of Dart against Huggell, in Shower's parliament cases, 24; that is a writ of error upon a judgment given in the King's Bench. The case from the record is this: the plaintiff declared against Dart, for that he, with several others atfaulted, beat, wounded, and imprisoned him, and took and seized his goods, and imprisoned the plaintiff for three months. There is a plea as to part not guilty, and as to the rest there is a justification, that the defendant at this time was governor of Barbadoes, and sets out the patent constituting him governor; that after the making this patent, and before the time of the assault, the defendant arrived at Barbadoes, and did take upon him and exercise the government of that and the other islands in the patents mentioned, till the first of May, when he had licence to return to England; that before his departure he constituted the plaintiff to be his deputy-governor, and that the first of August following the defendant arrived at London, in England; that the 4th of May, after defendant's departure, the plaintiff took upon himself the administration of the government of the island of Barbadoes, and did unlawfully and arbitrarily execute that government and office, to the oppression of the king's subjects; that after the return of the defendant, the plaintiff at a council was charged with misbehaviour in the administration of his office, in not taking the oath of office, not observing the act of navigation, assuming the title of lieutenant-governor, and altering decrees in Chancery; that it was then ordered by the defendant and council, that the plaintiff should be committed. To this there is a demurrer. In this court judgment was given for the plaintiff; on which a writ of error was brought in the house of lords; and tho' the particular reasons of the judgment in the house of lords do not appear further than can be collected from the argument, yet there are several things in the argument from whence it may be collected upon what grounds the judgment of the house of lords went. It was argued upon the part of the plaintiff in error, that this action did not lie against him, because it was brought against him for that which he did as a judge; that the rule seems to be the same for one sort of a judge as another, and that this person was lawfully made a governor, and so had all the powers of a governor. As to the plea, it was admitted there were several informalities in that. It was said it might be much shorter than it was; but that it sufficiently shewed what the plaintiff in error's authority was. That this action cannot lie, because the fact is not triable here; the laws there may be different from ours. Besides, no action lies, unless it were a malicious commitment as well as causeless; and that no man will pretend that an action can lie against the chief governor or lieutenant of Ireland or Scotland; and by the same reason it ought not in this case. He had a power to make judges, and therefore was more than a judge. Other reasons alledged against the action lying here are, first, that all the records and evidence are there: secondly, the laws there differ from what they are here; and governments would be very weak, and the persons intrusted with them very uneasy, if they are subject to be charged with actions here for what they do in those countries. In the argument on the part of the defendant in error, much pains are taken to shew, and it is insisted, that the law of Barbadoes is the same as the law of England. Another thing that is there relied on is, that this was an action between two Englishmen, for an injury done by one Englishman against another. These grounds are strongly relied upon on the part of the then defendant in error; and they shew at least that his counsel thought these distinctions very necessary and material in order to support the action at all: for though it is denied on one part that the laws of Barbadoes were the same as in England, yet on the other side it is insisted they were, and that this action arose between Englishman and Englishman, and that therefore the action ought to be maintained in this court. The house of lords finally determined that the action could not lie here, and the judgment was given for the plaintiff in error. As to the form of the plea, it was impossible for any one to say a word in vindication of that, or to say that the judgment could go upon any other ground than that of the defendant's being governor; and the offence complained of committed by him in that character. That was the substance of the case, and upon that the judgment of the house of lords was founded; for as to the plea, it is admitted by the counsel for the defendant, that in other respects it was bad upon the face of it. In that case, one argument relied on is, that it was an injury committed by one Englishman against another. Now that is not the case here: for the plaintiff himself was a Minorquin; he was so by birth, and had always lived in that country. My lord, in this case the argument cannot hold, that the action shall lie because Minorca is governed by the same laws as England; for it is otherwise, and it is stated to be governed by the law of Spain. The acts upon which the commitment was founded, in the case of Dutton and Howell, were done by the plaintiff in the character of governor of the place, which is an objection against that case that will not hold in the present; for that is not this case. Mr. Fabrigas never stood in the character that the plaintiff in that action did, for there the acts complained of were done by him in the character of governor; and that was urged as one ground why it should not be canvassed here. But neither of these distinctions will hold in the present case; but all the inconveniences pointed out against the action in that case will hold very strongly in the present. This is an action brought against the defendant for what he did as judge; he had a power in that case to make judges there, and therefore he was something more than a judge; all the records and evidence which relate to the transaction are there, and cannot be brought here; the laws there are different from what they are in this country; and, as it is said in the conclusion of that argument, government must be very weak indeed, and the persons intrusted with them very uneasy, if they are subject to be charged with actions here for what they do in that character in those countries. My lord, unless that case can be materially distinguished from the present, it will be an authority, and the highest authority that can be adduced, to shew that this action cannot be maintained, and will be a sufficient authority to entitle the plaintiff in error in this cause to your lordship's judgment. What answer may be given to that case, or distinctions made between that case and the case now before the court, I cannot at present foresee; but if any are attempted, when I hear them, I shall be at liberty to give such answers to those arguments as may occur to me by way of reply.

Mr. PUGHAM. To the same effect.

My lord, as the moderation and mildness of governor Mostyn's proceedings have been insisted on by Mr. Buller, I trust it will not be thought irrelevant to the present question, if I shortly state to your lordships the nature of those injuries which gave birth to the action.

It appeared in evidence on the trial, that Mr. Fabrigas was a natural-born subject, being born in Minorca subsequent to the cession by the Spaniards at the treaty of Utrecht, and prior to the capture by the French in the year 1758; that he was a man of irreproachable character and good property; not of the first class of nobility, but, to borrow an expression from colonel Bidulph, 'what we should call in England a gentleman farmer'; that he lived in friendship with the first noblesse in the island; and that he had a father living, and a wife and five children.

Thus circumstanced and thus situated, he was at the express command of the governor taken from his house by a party of soldiers, and dragged at noon-day through the streets of Mahon as a criminal, and thrown into a dungeon appropriated solely to capital offenders.

It appeared likewise in evidence, that he was confined six days in this dungeon, with nothing but the boards to lie on, and with no other sustenance than bread and water, though felons under sentence of death were allowed the common food of the island; that he was refused the consolation of his friends, and denied all intercourse with his family; that on the seventh morning he was hurried aboard a ship, without being permitted to take leave of his children, to see his wife, or to be accommodated with money or other necessaries for his subsistence; that during this whole time he had heard of no charge against him, he had been confronted with no accuser, he had not even seen his judge: yet he was to be banished to Cartagena in Spain for the space of twelve months. The sentence was faithfully executed; and Mr. Fabrigas, having experienced that distress which a moneyless stranger must necessarily be reduced to in a country whose language he did not understand, as fortunately for himself as unexpectedly to governor Mostyn, escaped from the Spaniards: I say unexpectedly, my lord, because he little thought that Mr. Fabrigas would live to tell an English jury of his sufferings and the governor's oppression.

I thought it necessary to state these facts to your lordships, that you might judge of the mildness of that treatment which Mr. Buller deemed it prudent to expatiate on.

It now becomes requisite for me to state the conduct of the governor through the subsequent stages of his very extraordinary defence; and that I must do with some precision, as I mean to contend, that the plaintiff in error by that defence is estopped from agitating the question of jurisdiction.

The declaration was delivered in Hilary-Term, 1773; a rule to plead was given, and a plea demanded. Had the governor then pleaded to the jurisdiction, the question would have come before the court on a demurrer; and if that had been determined in our favour, a writ of inquiry would have been executed, and Mr. Fabrigas would in a short space of time, at a little expence, have received a satisfaction adequate to the injury, and would have been enabled to return to his friends and to his family. But that would not have answered the purpose of the governor, as Mr. Fabrigas would not then have been delayed in England, nor have been harassed with this expensive litigation.

Had the governor at the expiration of the four days pleaded in chief, he might then have had the appearance of an argument in his application to your lordships; for it then would have been competent for him to have said, 'I was hurried into this plea before I had time to advise with my counsel, and consult upon the propriety of admitting the jurisdiction.' But he has debarred himself even of this shadow of an argument; for instead of pleading at the usual time, he applied to the court of Common-Pleas for six weeks time to plead. Here then was an admission of the jurisdiction; for he could not apply for time to plead, unless the court had cognizance of the matter.

I shall presently state to your lordships some cases, whose authority cannot be shaken, to prove, that even after imparlance the question of jurisdiction cannot be gone into.

But this was not the only submission to the jurisdiction of the court; for he then applied to put off the trial till after Easter-Term. It would have been nugatory, it would have been absurd, to have prayed the court to put off that trial, which they had no power to try at all. When Easter-Term arrived, the governor made a second attempt to postpone the trial; but the court saw through his design, and, satisfied that he did it only for the purpose of delay, they tied him down by the rule to try it peremptorily in Trinity-Term, and that he should not bring a writ of error for delay.

When he saw the court of Common-Pleas would not lend him their power for so base a purpose, he next made application to the court of Exchequer for an injunction to stay proceedings, and a bill was filed in Trinity-Term to effectuate that intention; but the bill was dismissed on argument, and the governor was at length driven in the subsequent sittings to trial. When the cause came on, the defendant's counsel did not object to the jurisdiction, they did not request the learned judge to nonsuit the plaintiff; but they suffered us to go into our case, they cross-examined our witnesses, and finding that we had made good our declaration by evidence irrefragable, they then went into their justification, and called many witnesses in support of it. But a verdict being found for the plaintiff, they tendered a bill of exceptions; and in last Michaelmas-Term, they applied to the court of Common-Pleas for a new trial; first, for excess of damages; secondly, because the court had no jurisdiction—the most extraordinary reason perhaps that ever was given; to desire a second trial, because the court had no jurisdiction to try it at all.

Governor Mostyn having in so many instances admitted the jurisdiction of the court, I must beg leave to state some authorities to your lordship, which prove that he is now too late to take any advantage of a defect of jurisdiction.

The first case I shall mention to your lordships is to be found in the Year-Books, in the 22d H. 6. fo. 7. where there was a special imparlance, salvis omnibus allegacionibus & exceptionibus, tam ad breve quam ad narratio- nam; and the court would not allow the defendant's privilege, because, says the case, 'by imparling he has admitted the jurisdiction of the court.' This doctrine is confirmed by lord Coke, in his comment on the 195th section of Littleton, where speaking of a personal action he says, three parts are to be considered; first, when the defendant defends the wrong and force, he maketh himself a party to the matter; secondly, by the defence of the damages he affirmeth, that the plaintiff is able to sue and to recover damages upon just cause; and by the last part, viz. 'all that which he ought to defend when and where he ought,' he affirmeth the jurisdiction of the court.

The case of Barrington and Venables, 13 C. 2. reported in fit Thomas Raymond, 34, is very clear on this head. The defendant after imparlance pleaded to the jurisdiction; the plaintiff demurred: the judgment was, that he should answer over, for such plea cannot be pleaded after imparlance.

The next case in order of time is reported in 1 Modern, 81, Cox and St. Alban's, 22 C. 2. A prohibition was prayed for the city of London, because the defendant had offered a plea to the jurisdiction which had been refused. Lord chief justice Hale said, 'in transitory actions, if they will plead a matter that ariseth out of the jurisdiction, and swear it before imparlance, and it be refused, a prohibition will go.' There was a case, said his lordship, in which it was adjudged that the jurisdiction must be pleaded and the plea sworn, and it must come in before imparlance. It was also agreed in that case, 'that the party should never be received to assign for error, that it was out of the jurisdiction, but it must be pleaded.' I have in vain endeavoured to find this case; but it is sufficient for my purpose to observe, that lord chief justice Hale would not have cited it unless it had been law. If therefore the opinion of that great man, solemnly given in the court of King's Bench, is authority, I am bold to say, that governor Moslyn, not having pleaded to the jurisdiction, cannot now assign it for error.

In a few years after, lord chief justice Hale was again called upon to consider this question in the case of Mandyke and Stint, 2 Modern, 273, 22 C. 2. There was a prohibition to the sheriff's court of London: the suggestion was, that the contract was made in Middlesex, therefore the cause of action did not arise within their jurisdiction. The chief justice and justice Wyndham were of opinion, 'that after the defendant had admitted the jurisdiction by pleading to the action, especially if verdict and judgment pass, the court will not examine whether the cause of action did arise out of the jurisdiction or not; on which a prohibition was denied, and judgment was given for the plaintiff. I cannot distinguish this from the present case; for as the court will not examine whether the cause of action did arise out of the jurisdiction, there can be no difference whether it was in Middlesex or in Minorca; and that question cannot now be asked, because verdict and judgment have passed.

Lord chief justice Holt, in the case of Andrews and Holt, 2 Lord Raymond, 884, said, that he was counsel in the case of Denning and Norris (reported in 2 Lewin, 243) and that the court held there, 'that since the defendant had admitted the judge to be a judge by a plea to the action, he was estopped to say, that he was not a judge afterwards.' If then a defendant, by having submitted the decision of his cause to a judge, precluded himself from objecting to him afterwards, how much stronger is the present case, where the defendant has submitted his cause to the determination of a court which has cognizance over all transitory actions. It is again laid down by lord chief justice Holt, 'that there ought to be no plea to the jurisdiction after imparlance, and that a special imparlance admits the jurisdiction.' Holt's Reports, East. T. 5 W. and M.

I must trouble your lordships with the case of Trelawny and Williams, to shew, that there has been but one opinion on both sides of the Hall respecting a plea to the jurisdiction; and that equity and common law have united in saying, that if the jurisdiction is not pleaded to, it must be afterwards admitted. This case is reported in 2 Vernon 483, Hil. T. 1704. The plaintiff prayed an account relative to a tin-set: the defendant insisted that he ought to have been sued in the Stannary-Court. The lord-keeper decreed an account; and as to the objection that the plaintiff ought to have sued in the Stannary-Court, he said, 'to oust this court of its jurisdiction, the defendant must plead to the jurisdiction, and not object to it at the hearing.'

There are a great variety of cases tending to establish this position, that when a defendant has once submitted to the jurisdiction, he has for ever precluded himself from objecting to it. To state them all, after the great authorities I have mentioned, would be to multiply the witnesses without strengthening the testimony: I shall therefore only cite a few passages from lord chief baron Gilbert's History of the Common-Pleas, which are decisive upon this part of the argument. In page 40, speaking of the order of pleading, he says, 'the defendant first pleads to the jurisdiction of the court; secondly, to the person of the plaintiff; and thirdly, to the count or declaration. By this order of pleading each subsequent plea admits the former. As, when he pleads to the person of the plaintiff, he admits the jurisdiction of the court; for it would be nugatory to plead any thing in that court which has no jurisdiction in the case. When he pleads to the count or declaration, he allows that the plaintiff is able to come into that court to implead him, and he may be there properly impleaded.' He lays it down in a subsequent part of his treatise (p. 148.) as a positive rule of law, that 'if a defendant pleads to the jurisdiction of the court, he must do it instantly on his appearance; for if he imparls, he owns the jurisdiction of the court, by craving leave of the court for time to plead in, and the court shall never be ousted of its jurisdiction after imparlance.' When I find this doctrine in our old law-books, when I see it ratified in modern times, and stamped with the authorities of Coke, Hale, Holt, and Gilbert, I am warranted in saying, that governor Moslyn cannot now agitate the question of jurisdiction; and if he cannot, the judgment must be affirmed.

Notwithstanding which, I have no objection to follow Mr. Buller through the grounds of argument that he has adopted; and I shall endeavour to prove,

That an action of trespass can be brought in England for an injury done abroad:

That Mr. Fabrigas is capable of bringing such action:

And, that governor Moslyn may be the subject of it.

It cannot be contended, but that an action of trespass is a transitory action, and may be brought any where: 'all personal actions, says lord Coke, may be brought in any county, and laid any where.' C. L. 282.

In the earl of Derby's case, 12 Coke, the chancellor, the chief justice, the master of the rolls, and justices Dodderidge and Winch, resolved, 'that for things transitory, altho' that in truth they be within the county palatine, the plaintiff may by law alledge them to be done in any place within England; and the defendant may not plead to the jurisdiction of the court, that they were done within the county palatine.' This doctrine is not confined to counties palatine; for lord Coke, in his comment on Littleton, 261, says, 'that an obligation made beyond the seas at Bordeaux, in France, may be sued here in England in what place the plaintiff will.' Captain Parker brought an action of trespass and false imprisonment against lord Clive, for injuries received in India, and it was never doubted but that the action did lie. Even at this moment there is an action depending between Gregory Cojimaul, an Armenian merchant, and governor Vareff, in which the cause of action arose in Bengal. A bill was filed by the governor in the Exchequer for an injunction, which was granted; but on appeal to the house of lords, the injunction was dissolved. The supreme court of judicature, by dissolving the injunction, acknowledged that an action of trespass could be maintained in England, though the cause of action arose in India.

The next point to be considered is, whether there is any disability attending the person of Mr. Fabrigas, that incapacitates him from bringing this action. But it will be requisite for me first to state, that governor Moslyn pleaded not guilty, and then justified what he had done by alledging, that the plaintiff had endeavoured to create mutiny among the troops; therefore he, as governor, had a right to imprison and banish him. Your lordship observes, that, according to his own plea, he does not pretend to justify what he has done as governor merely from the plenitude of his power, but from the necessity of the act, because the plaintiff had endeavoured to create mutiny and sedition. The learned judge who tried the cause, foreseeing the importance of this justification, requested the jury, at the same time they brought in their verdict, to find whether the governor's justification had been proved. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with 3000*l.* damages, and, that the plaintiff had not endeavoured to create mutiny or desertion, or had acted in any way tending thereto.

In consequence of that decision, the question now is, whether Mr. Fabrigas, a man perfectly innocent, can bring an action against governor Moslyn for this wanton and unparalleled injury?

As the law grants redress for all injuries, so it is open to all persons, and none are excluded from bringing an action, except on account of their crimes or their country. Littleton says, there are six manner of persons who cannot bring actions: Mr. Fabrigas is not included in either of those descriptions. The only person that can bear the least resemblance to him is an alien, who, Littleton says, to be incapacitated from bringing an action, must be born out of the allegiance of the king. Lord Coke, in his comment on that passage, observes, that 'Littleton saith not, out of the realm, but out of the allegiance; for he may be born, says Coke, out of the realm of England; yet within the allegiance, and shall be called the king's liege-man, for ligeus is ever taken for a natural-born subject.' C. L. 120.

Mr. Fabrigas was born in Minorca subsequent to the cession of Spain, consequently he is a natural-born subject; every natural-born subject, according to lord Coke, owes allegiance to the king; allegiance implies protection, the one is a necessary consequence of the other; the king of England can protect only by his laws; by the laws of England there is no injury without a remedy; the remedy for false imprisonment and banishment is an action of trespass, which is a transitory action, and may be brought any where, therefore rightly brought in the city of London, where this action was actually tried, and Mr. Fabrigas recovered 3000*l.* damages. I hope your lordships will justify me in saying, that this is a fair deduction from established principles.

Lord Coke (C. L. 130.) mentions three things whereby every subject is protected, rex, lex, et scripta regis; and he adds, 'that he that is out of the protection of the king, cannot be aided or protected by the king's law, or by the king's writ.' The natural inference to be drawn from thence is, that he who is under the king's protection may be aided by the king's law. Mr. Fabrigas is under the king's protection, because he owes him allegiance, therefore he may be aided by the king's laws; consequently is warranted in bringing this action, the only aid the laws of England can afford him for that injury.

Mr. Buller has mentioned the case of Pons and Johnson, lieutenant-governor of Minorca, and seems to rely on what was said by lord Camden on that occasion. If my memory does not mislead me, the plaintiff could not make good his case, being unable to prove Mr. Johnson's hand-writing to the order for the fiscal to commit him, and the question of jurisdiction was not agitated; but if it had, however respectable lord Camden's opinion ever will be, yet it was only the opinion of a judge at nisi prius. And according to Mr. Buller's own state of the case, he makes lord Camden confess, that an action might lie in a transaction between subject and subject. That concession is sufficient for me; for I have your lordship's own words to prove, that Mr. Fabrigas, being born in a conquered country, is a subject.

In the king and Cowle, 2 Burrows, 858, your lordship, speaking of Calvin's case, said, 'the question was, whether the plaintiff Calvin, born in Scotland after the descent of the crown of England to king James the first, was an alien born, and consequently disabled to bring any real or personal action for any lands within the realm of England; and your lordship added, 'but it never was a doubt whether a person born in the conquered dominions of a country is subject to the king of the conquering country.' From this two points are gained: first, that Calvin, though born in Scotland, was not an alien, and might bring a real action; and that there never was a doubt, but that a person born in a conquered country was subject to the conqueror. As therefore the twelve judges determined that Calvin could bring a real action, because he was not an alien; certainly Fabrigas may bring a transitory action, as he is a subject, being born in a country that was conquered by the state of Great-Britain.

There is an anonymous case in 1 Salkeld, 404, 4 Ann. A bill was brought in Chancery to foreclose a mortgage of the island of Sarke: the defendants pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, viz. that the island of Sarke was governed by the laws of Normandy; and it was objected, that the party ought to sue in the courts of the island, and appeal. On the other side, it was said, that if the person be here, he may be sued in Chancery, though the lands lie in a county palatine, or in another kingdom, as Ireland, or Barbadoes. Lord-keeper Wright over-ruled the plea, saying, 'that the court acted against the person of the party and his conscience, and there might be a failure of justice if the Chancery would not hold plea in such a case, the party being here.' How much stronger then is the present case? for this is a transitory action that may be brought any where; Mr. Fabrigas on the spot to bring it, and governor Mostyn in England to defend it.

The case Mr. Buller has cited, of the East-India Company and Campbell, admits of a short answer; for had the defendant confessed the matter charged, he would have confessed himself to be guilty of a felony; and the humanity of the laws of England will not oblige a man to accuse himself: but this is not a public crime, but a civil injury. As Mr. Buller has gone to the East-Indies for a case, I shall be excused mentioning the case of Ramkissen and Barker, 1 Atkyns 51; where the plaintiff filed a bill against the representatives of the governor of Patna, for money due to him as his banyan. The defendants pleaded, that the plaintiff was an alien born, and an alien infidel, and therefore could have no suit here: but lord Hardwicke said, as the plaintiff's was a mere personal demand, it was extremely clear that he might bring a bill in this court; and he over-ruled the defendant's plea without hearing one counsel of either side. As therefore lord Hardwicke was of opinion, that by the laws of England an alien infidel, a Gentoo merchant, the subject of the great mogul, could claim the benefit of the English laws against an English governor for a transaction in a foreign country; I trust that your lordships will determine, that Mr. Fabrigas, who is neither an infidel nor an alien, but a subject of Great-Britain, may bring his action here for an injury received in Minorca.

The case of the countess of Derby does not affect the present question; for that was a claim of dower, which is a local action, and cannot, as a transitory action, be tried any where. The other cases, mentioned by Mr. Buller, from Latch and Lutwich, were either local actions, or questions upon demurrer, therefore not applicable to the case before the court; for a party may avail himself of many things upon a demurrer, which he cannot by a writ of error.

Mr. Buller's endeavouring to confound transitory with local actions, must be my apology for mentioning another case in support of the distinction. The case I allude to is Mr. Skinner's, which was preferred to the twelve judges from the council-board. In the year 1657, when trade was open to the East-Indies, he possessed himself of a house and warehouse, which he filled with goods at Jamby; and he purchased of the king of Great Jamby the islands of Baretha. The agents of the East-India Company assaulted his person, seized his warehouse, carried away his goods, and took and possessed themselves of the islands of Baretha. Upon this case, it was propounded to the judges, by an order from the king in council, dated the 12th April 1665, whether Mr. Skinner could have a full relief in any ordinary court of law? Their opinion was, 'that his majesty's ordinary courts of justice at Westminster can give relief for taking away and spoiling his ship, goods, and papers, and assaulting and wounding his person, notwithstanding the same was done beyond the seas: but that as to the detaining and possessing of the house and islands, in the case mentioned, he is not relievable in any ordinary court of justice.'

Your lordships will collect from this case, that the twelve judges held that an action might be maintained here for spoiling his goods, and seizing his person, because an action of trespass is a transitory action; but an action could not be maintained for possessing the house and land, because it is a local action.

I trust I have proved that an action of trespass may be brought here for an injury received in Minorca; and that Mr. Fabrigas, a natural-born subject, is capable of bringing such action. The only remaining question is, whether Mr. Mostyn, as governor, can tyrannize over the innocent inhabitants within his government, in violation of law, justice, and humanity, and not be responsible in our courts to repair by a satisfaction in damages the injury he has done? Mr. Buller has contended, that general Mostyn governs as all absolute sovereigns do, and that set pro ratione voluntas is the only rule of his conduct. I did not expect to hear such an assertion advanced in this court. From whom does the governor derive this despotism? Can the king delegate absolute power to another, which he has not in himself? Can such a monster exist in the British dominions as tyranny uncontrolled by law? Mr. Buller asserts, that the governor is accountable to God alone; but this court I hope will teach him, that he is accountable to his country here, as he must be to his God hereafter, for this wanton outrage on an unoffending subject. Many cases have been cited, and much argument adduced, to prove that a man is not responsible in an action for what he has done as a judge. I neither deny the doctrine, nor shall endeavour to impeach the cases; but I must observe, that they do not affect the present question. Did governor Mostyn sit in judgment? Did he hear any accusation? Did he examine a witness? Did he even see the prisoner? Did he follow any rule of law in any country? Set pro ratione voluntas was his law, and his mercy was twelve months banishment, to an innocent individual.

As Mr. Buller has dwelt so much upon the case of Dutton and Howell, it will be expected that I take some notice of it. I need not go over the case again, as it has been already very accurately stated; but I must beg leave to read the reasons which were given with the printed case to the lords, before it came on to be argued in the house of peers. It is stated, that sir Richard Dutton ought to have the judgment that was obtained against him below, reversed; for 1st, That what he did, he did as chief governor, and in a council of state, for which he ought not to be charged with an action. If he shall, it may be not only the case of sir Richard Dutton, but of any other chief governor or privy-counsellor in Scotland, Ireland, or elsewhere.

2. What was done, was in order to bring a delinquent to justice, who was tried in Barbadoes and found guilty; and if for this he shall be charged with an action, it would be a discouragement to justice.

3. What was done, was done in court; for so is a council of state, to receive complaints against state delinquents, and direct their trials in proper courts. What a judge acts in court, as sir Richard Dutton did, no action lies against him for it.

4. There never was such an action as this maintained against a governor for what he did in council; and if this be made a precedent, it will render all governments unsafe.

5. If a governor of a plantation beyond the seas shall be charged with actions here, for what he did there, it will be impossible for him to defend himself: first, for that all records and evidences are there: secondly, the laws there differ in many things from what they are here.

Though the first part of this reason seems to operate in favour of governor Mostyn, yet it goes no farther than this; that if an action is brought here, it will be impossible for him to defend himself. The latter part shews the meaning of the whole; that is, if an action is brought here against the governor for any thing done by him in his judicial capacity, then he will not be able to defend himself, because all the records and evidences are there. This clearly proves, that it refers to what he did as judge, otherwise there could have been no occasion to have mentioned the records being there.

These reasons must have been the ground of the counsel's argument, and the whole is bottomed in sir Richard Dutton's having acted with his council in a judicial capacity. I take no notice of the arguments of counsel, as reported by Shower, because it can be no authority for this court. I shall only observe, that in respect to the jurisdiction, which was but slightly touched on, that the assertion of the counsel for the defendant in error, affirming the jurisdiction, is as good authority for me, as the denial of it by sir Richard Dutton's counsel is for Mr. Buller. The report is silent as to the grounds of the judgment: it only says, 'that the action was reversed;' but not one word that the action could not be maintained. But I venture to affirm, that this case has not the least resemblance to the present. My duty calls on me to draw the invidious parallel.

Governor Dutton sat with his council, to hear and enquire in the supreme court of judicature in Barbadoes:

Governor Mostyn sat neither as a military nor a civil judge.

Mr. Fabrigas was not brought before him, neither was he accused by any man:

Sir John Witham was publicly accused before the governor and council of state.

Mr. Fabrigas was thrown into a dungeon, and treated with the most unheard-of severity:

Sir John Witham was only confined for the purpose of securing his person.

Fabrigas was banished for twelve months to the Spanish dominions:

Sir John was kept in custody for fourteen days, till he could be brought to his trial.

Mr. Fabrigas, on the governor's justification, was found to be innocent: Sir John Witham, when brought before the court of general sessions, was found guilty, and recommitted.

The governor of Barbadoes followed the laws of Barbadoes:

The governor of Minorca acted in diametrical opposition to all laws, and in violation of the natural dictates of humanity.

Sir Richard Dutton let the law take its course against a criminal:

But governor Mostyn went out of his way to persecute the innocent.

Having shewn the difference between the two cases, permit me to mention an observation of lord chief justice de Grey, in his opinion on the motion for a new trial. 'If the governor had secured him, said his lordship, nay, if he had barely committed him, that he might have been amenable to justice, and if he had immediately ordered a prosecution upon any part of his conduct, it would have been another question: but the governor knew he could no more imprison him for a twelvemonth, (and the banishment for a year is a continuation of the original imprisonment) than that he could inflict the torture.'

Lord chief justice de Grey then undoubtedly thought that governor Mostyn had acted illegally: if so, I hope I shall be able to shew, that he is amenable to the courts of law in England.

Lord Bellamont's case, in 2 Salkeld 625, 12 W. 3. B. R. East. T. evinces, that a governor abroad is responsible here. The attorney-general moved for a trial at bar the last paper-day in the term, in an action against the governor of New-York, for matter done by him as governor, and granted, because the king defended it. I collect from this case, that the attorney-general knew the court had jurisdiction, or he would not have made the motion; and the court would not have granted it, if they had not been legally empowered to try it. The legislature, in the same year (12 W. 3. cap. 12.) enacted, that governors beyond the sea should be tried in the King's Bench, or in such county as shall be assigned by his majesty, by good and lawful men, for offences committed in their governments abroad against the king's subjects there; as, by the common law, an indictment could be preferred only in that county where the offence was committed. Governors abroad were not criminally amenable till this act had passed. When the legislature so carefully provided to bring governors to justice for the offences they might commit in their governments, they would indisputably, by the same law, have protected the subjects from civil injuries, had they not known that such provision was unnecessary, and that, by the common law, all personal actions might be brought.

brought in England; of which lord Bellamont's case was a recent instance.

In Michaelmas-Term, 11 Geo. II. 1737, Stephen Conner brought an action against Joseph Sabine, governor of Gibraltar: and he stated in his declaration, that he was a master carpenter of the office of ordnance at Gibraltar; that governor Sabine tried him by a court-martial, to which he was not subject; and that he underwent the sentence of receiving 500 lashes, and that he was compelled to depart from Gibraltar, which he laid to his damage of 10,000*l.* The defendant pleaded not guilty, and justified by trying him by a court-martial. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, with 700*l.* damages. A writ of error was brought, and the judgment affirmed. No distinction can be made between the governor of Gibraltar and the governor of Minorca; except only, that the one tried Conner by a court-martial, and punished him by military law; while the other, without any trial, banished Mr. Fabrigas, contrary to all ideas of justice and of law.

I must now beg leave to advert to the bill of exceptions; in which it is alleged, that 'Minorca is divided into four districts, exclusive of the arraval, which the witnesses always understood to be distinct from the others, and under the immediate order of the governor.'

I am well aware, that I am not at liberty to go out of the record; if I was, the fact warrants me in saying, that the evidence is most untrue.

It is notorious that Minorca is divided into four terminos only; Ciudadella, Alayor, Marcadel, and Mabon, which latter includes the arraval of St. Phillip's. This is known to every man who has been at Minorca, and to every man who has read Armstrong's history of that island. That the governor has a legislative authority within the arraval, is too absurd to dwell on. By what law, by what provision, does he claim that power? When process is executed within St. Phillip's, or its environs, the civil magistrate usually pays the governor the compliment of acquainting him with it; but the same compliment is paid to the commanding officer at Ciudadella, where an exclusive jurisdiction is not even pretended. In fact, it is a matter of civility merely, but never was a claim of right.

Lord chief justice de Grey, in the solemn opinion which he gave upon the motion for a new trial, has been explicit on these two heads. 'One of the witnesses in the cause (said his lordship) represented to the jury, that in some particular cases, especially in criminal matters, the governor resident upon the island does exercise a legislative power. It was gross ignorance in that person to imagine such a thing: I may say, it was impossible, that a man who lived upon the island, in the station he had done, should not know better, than to think that the governor had a civil and criminal power in him. The governor is the king's servant; his commission is from him, and he is to execute the power he is invested with under that commission, which is to execute the laws of Minorca, under such regulations as the king shall make in council. It was a vain imagination in the witnesses to say, that there were five terminos in the island of Minorca. I have at various times seen a multitude of authentic documents and papers relative to that island; and I do not believe, that, in any one of them, the idea of the arraval of St. Phillip's being a distinct jurisdiction was ever started. Mabon is one of the four terminos, and St. Phillip's, and all the district about it, is comprehended within that termino: but to suppose, that there is a distinct jurisdiction, separate from the government of the island, is ridiculous and absurd.'

These were the words of lord chief justice de Grey; to which, I am confident, this court will pay a proper attention.

The bill of exceptions then states, that general Mostyn was appointed governor by the king's commission, which gives him all the powers belonging to the said office. I wish to ask Mr. Buller, whether to persecute the innocent, and to banish those subjects committed to his care, is a power incident to or springing out of the office of governor? If it is not, the governor cannot justify himself under his commission.

It is then stated, that the king ordered 'all his loving subjects in the said island to obey him, the said John Mostyn;' but nothing in particular is mentioned of the arraval. Had it been a peculiar district, under the despotic will of the governor, there must have been some notice taken of it, either in the commission, or in his majesty's orders. The governor then confesses in his bill of exceptions, 'that he banished Mr. Fabrigas without any reasonable or probable cause, or any other matter alleged in his plea, or any act tending thereto.' Notwithstanding which admission, in the very next sentence, he insists that the plaintiff ought to be barred his said action, although it is stated in the bill of exceptions, that 'the Minorquins plead sometimes the English laws.'

Were the bill of exceptions less absurd than it is, yet I should contend, that the governor, by pleading in chief, and submitting his cause to the decision of an English jury, has precluded this court from enquiring into the original jurisdiction. Were it possible that this ground should fail me, when supported by so many great authorities, yet I should be very easy about the event; for, as an action of trespass can be brought in England for injuries abroad, and as every subject can bring that action, and as governor Mostyn (being a subject) must answer to it, I have no doubt but the judgment will be affirmed. Should it be reversed, I fear the publick, with too much truth, will apply the lines of the Roman satyrists on the drunken Marius to the present occasion; and they will say of governor Mostyn, as was formerly said of him, and to the Minorquins, if Mr. Fabrigas should be deprived of that satisfaction in damages which the jury gave him,

Hic est damnatus inani judicio;

At tu victrix provincia ploras.

Mr. BULLER's reply.

Mr. Buller. I beg leave to trouble the court with a few words by way of reply: and though Mr. Peckham has thought fit to declaim so much upon the particular facts of this cause, yet I was confident at first, and do not now find I was deceived in thinking, I should not be contradicted in what I said about the propriety of governor Mostyn's conduct; that he had taken every precaution that a man in his situation could do, had consulted many persons there, civil and military, and that they were all unanimous in advising the governor to do what was done.

The first objection made by Mr. Peckham has been, that Mr. Mostyn should be precluded from contending, that this court hath not a jurisdiction, because he has submitted to the jurisdiction of the court in so many instances during the whole of these proceedings. He has stated the whole proceedings during the stages of this cause, by which he supposes Mr. Mostyn hath done such acts as shall be construed into a submission to the jurisdiction of the court, and is therefore now precluded from entering into the question. Further, Mr. Peckham has insisted upon it, that at the trial we did wrong in making a defence; because, if we meant to go into the question, whether the court has jurisdiction or not, we should have then insisted upon a non-suit, and not gone into the merits of the cause. I do not apprehend any of the cases he has cited will come up to the present: and as to the different periods of the cause, where he supposes we have submitted to the jurisdiction of the court, if this court hath no jurisdiction at all, I do not know how it can then be said we have submitted to it. Saying, that at the trial we should have insisted upon a non-suit, is saying we should have insisted upon what we could not demand; for it is at all times at the option of the plaintiff, whether he will submit to a non-suit or not. If the defendant can avail himself of the objection at all, it must be by intitling himself by that means to a verdict; for it is in the power of the plaintiff to get up and say, I will not be non-suited. It was impossible for us to insist upon the objection in any other way than it is now done: the objection arises out of the facts of the case, and what was proved at the trial. It was there proved, that Mr. Mostyn was the governor; that what he did was in that character; and therefore, says he, these facts being proved, I insist I am not answerable in a court of justice in England, for what I have done in this character: therefore the objection would have been improper, if it had come at any other time; it could only come when these facts appeared in evidence upon which his objection was founded. As to the many cases that have been cited, I believe I may safely give this general answer to them all: they are cases where an action has been brought in a court in England, for a transaction arising in England, but, on account of a charter or statute, the jurisdiction of the superior court has been excluded. Where that is so, and this court has a general superintendent jurisdiction, but it is taken away by a particular law, in such case it is necessary to plead to the jurisdiction: but when the question arises upon a transaction happening in foreign parts, and where the courts of England cannot have any controul whatsoever, (suppose, for instance, in France, where the king or parliament of England can make no laws to bind the inhabitants) it is just the same as a court of inferior record in England, where it holds plea of a thing done out of their jurisdiction. In that case, if it appears upon the proceedings, that the cause of action arose out of the jurisdiction, the whole proceedings are void; they are coram non judice; and an action will lie against the party, the officers, and the judges, for what is done under them.

In this case, as I submit to your lordship, the question is the same; because it is not on a transaction happening within the limits, or within the country where this court resides or has a jurisdiction, but on a transaction arising in foreign dominions. I beg leave to mention too, that if these cases were so very general as Mr. Peckham wishes to have them understood, it is not possible that the case in Latch, or the case in Lutwyche, ever could have existed; because, if it was to hold as a general rule, that where the cause of action arises out of the kingdom you must plead to the jurisdiction, it would have been a sufficient answer in those cases to say, it was not so pleaded. In the case in Lutwyche, there was a plea in bar, and demurrer to that plea; but it appearing, that the cause of action did not arise in this kingdom, but in foreign parts, the court agreed, that the supposition and quaint legal fiction, which otherwise would avail, that it was in London or England, was absurd, and the plaintiff could not support his action. It was the same in the case in Latch; for that was not on a plea to the jurisdiction, but the objection arose long after, and in a subsequent period of the cause: the judges there agreed, that if it appeared on the record, that the case was plainly and evidently out of their jurisdiction, they were bound to take notice of it.

Mr. Peckham has divided his argument into three heads: first, whether a transitory action is capable of being brought in England, if the cause of that action arise beyond the seas: secondly, whether the plaintiff is capable of bringing such action: and, in the third place, whether the defendant is a proper object of it. On the first of these questions it has been insisted, that an action of false imprisonment is a transitory action; and some cases cited, where transitory actions, arising abroad, are holden to be maintainable here. An action of false imprisonment certainly is a transitory action: but, my lord, the cases cited from 12th Co. and Co. Lit. were not cases of action for false imprisonment, but debt upon bond. These cases were where the law, in the different countries, was the same; and they therefore come within the distinction laid down in the case before lord Camden. For, where the law of the different countries is the same, this court may hold plea; it may do as much justice as the foreign courts, and can be involved in no difficulty with respect to the rules by which they are to decide. But in the case of transactions arising in foreign dominions, where the law of the foreign country is different from the law of this kingdom, this court has no way of informing themselves what the foreign law is, nor can they know what rules to decide by; and therefore every inconvenience arises against their entertaining such a suit. Mr. Peckham then cited the case of Parker against lord Clive, in this court, and observed, that there never was any objection taken there, that the action would not lie. That case is different from the present. That was a case between English subjects, and a case that was to be determined, not by the law of the East-Indies, (for that was not set up as a defence, or at all intermixed with the case) but by the law of England; and therefore is still within the distinction I have laid down, and endeavoured to support. Then the second question Mr. Peckham has made is, whether the plaintiff can maintain this action? The plaintiff, he says, is not an alien, but a natural-born subject, and as such he owes allegiance, allegiance, and is intitled to protection; and that the king of England can protect only by the laws of England; and therefore this man has a right to bring his action here. The proposition will itself shew how enormous it would be, if it were to hold in this case. How is the king to rule by the laws of England? Is it meant that this case is to be determined by the laws of England? If so, that would be injustice in the most glaring light; because it would be condemning the defendant by one law, when he was bound to regulate his conduct by a different. But it is not true that the king of England can protect by the laws of England only; for, in other places, a transaction must be tried by the laws of that place where it arises; and the king can, in other places, govern by other laws than those of England: and I contend, this question must be determined by such laws, and not by the laws of this country. Mr. Peckham has then insisted, that this is a case between subject and subject. If he means it is between subject and subject, speaking of the king of England, it is true; but Fabrigas is not a subject of this realm, nor subject to be governed by the laws of this country, and therefore shall not avail himself of the laws of this country. The case in Salkeld, 404, was then cited, where the court of Chancery proceeded against a foreigner; and the reason there given for so doing is, because that court acts in personam. But, my lord, that case does not appear to be at all blended with foreign law; nor is any thing there stated, which called on the court to determine that case by any other law than the known laws of this country, and the rules of their own court. The case in the 4th Institute was then endeavoured to be distinguished from the present, by insisting, that the subject-matter of that case was local: but that answer cannot hold. If it had been an action in a court of law, the answer would have been a good one; because an action of dower is local, and can only be tried in the county where the land lies: but that was a suit in Chancery, and not an action; and, as is said in the case cited from Salkeld, the court of Chancery don't proceed against the thing, but against the person.

Then the last question that has been made is, whether the defendant in this case is the proper subject of an action? My lord, Mr. Peckham has observed, I said the governor was absolute; but that he insists is impossible, because there is no person who could delegate such an authority to him; that if he derived such authority from any one, it must be from the king; but the king, not being absolute himself, could not grant such authority to Mr. Mostyn. If it be meant only, that the king is not absolute in this country, I most readily accede to the proposition; but what the constitution of this country is, can be no argument to prove what is the state or constitution of Minorca. That Minorca is of a different constitution, and is governed by different laws from what prevail in this country, is stated in the record; which record is decisive upon that point, for the court cannot depart from it. It is there stated, that the arraval of St. Phillip's is subject to the immediate order of the governor, and to his order and direction only; for no judge, either criminal or civil, can interfere, or has any jurisdiction there, unless under his express leave: therefore the argument, as to the authority or power of the king here, is totally foreign to the situation of the governor of Minorca, or the power or jurisdiction he has there. Then it is said, it does not appear on the record, that the defendant did act as judge. This also must be decided by the record; and it is there stated, that the defendant was governor, and so being governor he caused the plaintiff to be taken, imprisoned, &c. The case of Dutton v. Howell has been much observed upon, and the printed reasons given in that case particularly stated; but I do not perceive that case has been distinguished from the present. Some of the reasons alledged for the defendant there, are equally strong in favour of the present defendant. It is said, there never was such an action maintained before; and if a governor beyond sea be charged here, he cannot defend himself, because all the records and evidence are there. Mr. Peckham has not been able to produce one case, in which such an action as this has been maintained before. But then another distinction he endeavoured to avail himself of, is, that, in the case of Dutton and Howell, the action was for an act done in council, and therefore varied from this case, because here there was no council at all. I cannot see how that difference will at all avail Mr. Peckham's client. In the first place, in Barbadoes, there was a council, and the governor had no power without the council: but is that the case here? In Minorca, there is no council at all; and therefore, in this case, the governor stands in the same situation as the governor and council of Barbadoes. As to the necessity of pleading in abatement to the jurisdiction, it is very observable, that in the case of Dutton v. Howell, the counsel who argued in that case do not venture to rely upon that objection. But they insist further, that the jurisdiction cannot be examined in the Exchequer-Chamber, because both the statute and writ of error expressly provide against it; and therefore, say they, it is questionable, whether it can be insisted upon in the house of lords: and it is admitted by them, that a question might have been made on the trial of an issue, if one had been joined. However, that question was gone into in the house of lords, and the final decision of the cause appears from the book; namely, that the judgment in that case was for the defendant, and that the action could not be maintained. Then the words of lord chief justice de Grey, in this present cause, upon a motion for a new trial, have been much relied upon; and his lordship is made to say, that if the governor had secured the present plaintiff, merely for the sake of a trial, it would be a different affair. In this case, I apprehend it would be quite sufficient for me, if the governor had a power of committing at all; for if he had, that is sufficient to prevent the defendant's being a trespasser by such commitment: and the reasonableness of the time for which he was committed, would be a very different question; for, if the governor had a power of committing, he has pursued that power, and then this action cannot be maintained. The next case that has been cited, is lord Bellamont's case in 2d Salkeld, which was an action against a governor for what he did in that character: but that is simply a motion for a writ of habeas corpus. The merits of the case, or the propriety of the action, were not before the court, or at all entered into; nor was any objection made to the jurisdiction of the court; and where a thing is not objected to, the case can never be an authority on the point: there is not one syllable said about it; and therefore that case cannot have the least weight whatsoever respecting this question. Then Mr. Peckham cited the statute of the 12th of William the third: but that was admitted by him to extend only to criminal prosecutions at the king's suit, and therefore can have nothing to do with the present question. The case of Conner against Sabine is as different from this case, as any one case can be from another. There the defence was put upon the ground, that the plaintiff was amenable to a court-martial. The fact turned out otherwise: they stated a limited jurisdiction; and it appeared the plaintiff was not the object of that jurisdiction. Then it is said, that Minorca is not a military camp, but that there are judges both criminal and civil. Here again I must have recourse to the record itself; for there it is stated, that within the arraval of St. Phillip's, where this transaction occurred, there is no judge either criminal or civil; there is no power but that of the governor. Mr. Peckham observed, that it is stated in the record, that the inhabitants sometimes claim protection from the law of England, as well as the law of Spain. It is so stated; but what is said further? Not that they ever have it allowed to them, or that they are governed by it; but it is expressly stated, that they are in general governed by the law of Spain: therefore the record does not prove, that the people in Minorca are governed by the same laws as the people here; but it does prove, that they are governed by laws which are totally different, and that within the arraval of St. Phillip's, the will of the governor is the law. Mr. Peckham then attacks the veracity of the record with respect to the different districts which there are within the island; and has insisted, that though in the execution of process, &c. the law-officers may consult the governor, or inform him what they are going to do, yet that they are not bound by law to do so. My lord, the record must, in these respects, also decide for us. It is there stated what the districts are; that the arraval of St. Phillip's is distinct from the others; and that no magistrates can come there, nor can any process be executed there, without the governor's particular leave. Mr. Peckham asks, where is the authority that enables a governor to banish an innocent man? In the first place, as to his being an innocent man, it is not competent to this court to enquire whether he was innocent or not, or whether the governor was strictly justifiable or not; but it is sufficient to prove, that the governor had an authority to imprison. That authority appears upon the face of the record; for it is there stated that he was governor, and had every power, civil and military, and that all he did was in the character of a governor. These facts being proved, I submit are a sufficient bar to this action, and the court cannot go into the question, whether the plaintiff was innocent or guilty. The last argument that has been relied upon by Mr. Peckham is, some other expressions of lord chief justice de Grey, in the course of this cause; in which his lordship said, that the witnesses must have been mistaken in the account they gave of the constitution and law of the island. Here it is impossible for the court to go out of the record: but these observations of lord chief justice de Grey go certainly a great way towards proving the impropriety of maintaining such an action here as the present. If the account given by lord chief justice de Grey of the island be true, and I make no doubt it is, the consequence is this: that even though all the evidence was obtained in this cause that could be had; though persons were called as witnesses, who, from their situation, and the departments they had officiated in, were most likely to be conversant with the law and constitution of the island; yet that all the accounts that have been given are imperfect, erroneous, and unworthy of credit. That is the strongest evidence of the impropriety of maintaining such an action as this in England. For if, as lord chief justice de Grey says, the evidence that has been given of the foreign law in this case is not to be relied upon, but is all a mistake; it may happen, and it must naturally be expected, that in every case which is brought here from foreign dominions, where the cause of action arises abroad, all the evidence is abroad, and the court can get no other evidence of the law of the place than the loose opinions of those who have occasionally been there; and the courts here having no established legal mode of obtaining certificates from such country, properly authenticated, to say what the law there is, the same mistakes and inconvenience will arise.

Therefore, on the whole, I trust the court will be of opinion, that this action is improper, and ought not to be maintained here.

Lord MANSFIELD.

Let it stand for another argument. It has been extremely well argued on both sides.

On Friday the 27th January, 1775, it was very ably argued by Mr. Serjeant Glynn, on the part of Mr. Fabrigas, and by Mr. Serjeant Walker, on behalf of governor Mostyn: but as no new cases were cited, we shall proceed to give the judgment of the court of King's Bench, which was in substance as follows.

Lord MANSFIELD.

This was an action for an assault and false imprisonment by the defendant upon the plaintiff. And part of the complaint being for banishing him from the island of Minorca to Carthagena, in Spain, it was necessary for the plaintiff to take notice in the declaration of the real place where the cause of complaint arose; which he has stated to be at Minorca, with a videlicet in London, at St. Mary-le-Bow. Had it not been for that particularity, he might have stated it to have been in the county of Middlesex; but part of the complaint making the locality, where the cause of action arose, necessary to be stated, being a banishment from Minorca to Carthagena, he states it with this videlicet. To this declaration the defendant put in two pleas; first, not guilty; and then he pleads, that he was governor of Minorca, by letters patent from the crown, and that the defendant was raising sedition and mutiny; in consequence of which which he did imprison him and send him out of the island, which he alleges he had an authority to do, for that sedition and mutiny that he then was raising. To this plea the plaintiff does not demur, nor does he deny that it would be a justification, in case it was true; but he denies the truth of the fact, and puts in issue whether the fact of the plea was true. The plea avers, that the assault for which the action was brought arose in the island of Minorca, out of the realm of England, and no where else. To this the plaintiff has made no new assignment, and therefore by his replication he admits the locality of the cause of action. Thus then it stood upon the pleadings. When the trial came on, the plaintiff went into the evidence of his case, and the defendant went likewise into his evidence. But, upon the part of the defendant, evidence different from any fact alleged in his plea of justification was given; and witnesses were called to prove that the district in Minorca called the arraval, where the injury complained of was done, was not within either of the four precincts, but that it is in the nature of a peculiar liberty, more immediately under the power of the governor, and that no judge of the island can exercise jurisdiction there without an appointment from him. That is the substance of their evidence.

The judge left it to the jury upon the facts of the case; and they found for the plaintiff. The defendant then tendered a bill of exceptions, upon which bill of exceptions it comes before us. And the great difficulty I have had upon both these arguments is, to be able clearly to comprehend what question it is that is meant seriously to be brought before the court for their judgment. If I understand the counsel for governor Mostyn right, what they say is this: the plea of not guilty is totally immaterial, and the plea of justification is totally immaterial, for it appears on the plaintiff's own shewing that this matter arose in Minorca; and the replication to the plea admits it: and it likewise appears that the defendant was governor of Minorca; and as the imprisonment arose in Minorca by the authority of the defendant, the judge ought to have stopped all evidence whatsoever, and have directed the jury immediately to have found for the defendant. Why? There are three reasons given. One of them insisted upon in the first argument (but abandoned to-day) is, that the plaintiff is a Minorquin, born in the island of Minorca. To dispose of that objection at once, I shall only say that it is wisely abandoned to-day. A Minorquin; what then? Has not a subject of the king, born at Minorca, as good a right to apply to the king's courts of justice, as a person born within the sound of Bow-Bell, in Cheapside? If there is no other objection to him, would that make any? To be sure not. But it is abandoned, so I shall lay it out of the case.

The other two grounds which are enforced to-day are, if I take them right—but I am under some difficulties, because they are such propositions that you may argue as well whether there is such a court existing as this which I am now sitting in—the first is, that he was governor of Minorca, and therefore for no injury whatsoever that is done by him, right or wrong, can any evidence be heard, and that no action can lie against him; the next is, that the injury was done out of the realm: I think these are the whole amount of the questions that have been laid before the court. Now as to the first, there is nothing so clear as that in an action of this kind, which is for an assault and false imprisonment, the defendant, if he has any justification, must plead it; and there is nothing more clear than that, if the court has not a general jurisdiction of the matter, he must plead to that jurisdiction, and he cannot take advantage of it upon the general issue: I therefore, upon that ground, at once lay out of the case every thing relative to the arraval; for if he acted as a judge, it is synonymous to a court of record: and tho' it arises in a foreign country, where the technical distinction of a court of record does not exist, yet if he sat in a court of justice, and subject to a superior review, it is within the reason of the law of England, which says, that shall be a justification; and he would, if he had acted according to the law of the land, be entitled to a justification in the fact that is complained of; but that must be pleaded. If an action is brought against a person who is a judge of record, he must lay it before the court, by way of plea and justification, that he was a judge. I don't lay a stress upon the word record, but there is no colour upon the evidence that he acted as a judge of a court of justice; therefore every thing stated relative to the arraval, which is stated in the bill of exceptions, is nothing at all to the purpose. The first point that I shall begin with is the sacredness of the person of the governor. Why, if that was true, and if the law was so, he must plead it. This is an action of false imprisonment: prima facie, the court has jurisdiction. If he was guilty of the fact, he must shew a special matter that he did this by a proper authority. What is his proper authority? The king's commission to make him governor. Why then, he certainly must plead it: but, however, I will not rest the answer upon that. It has been singled out, that in a colony that is beyond the seas, but part of the dominions of the crown of England, though actions would lie for injuries committed by other persons, yet it shall not lie against the governor. Now I say, for many reasons, if it did not lie against any other man, it shall most emphatically lie against the governor. In every plea to the jurisdiction, you must state a jurisdiction; for if there is no other method of trial, that alone will give the king's courts jurisdiction. If an action is brought here for a matter arising in Wales, you must shew the jurisdiction of the court in Wales: and in every case to repel the jurisdiction of the king's courts, you must shew a better and a more proper jurisdiction. Now in this case no other jurisdiction is shewn, even by way of argument; and it is most certain, that if the king's courts cannot hold plea in such a case, there is no other court upon earth that can do it; for it is truly said, that a governor is in the nature of a vicaroy, and, of necessity, part of the privileges of the king are communicated to him during the time of his government. No criminal prosecution lies against him, and no civil action will lie against him; because, what would the consequence be? Why, if a civil action lies against him, and a judgment obtained for damages, he might be taken up and put in prison on a capias; and therefore, locally, during the time of his government, the courts in the island cannot hold plea against him. But in this peculiar case, it is said to have happened in the arraval. Why, it is stated in the evidence, that no judge can sit there at all without his leave. If he is out of the government, he leaves it; he comes and lives in England, and he has no effects there to be attached: then there is no remedy whatsoever, if it is not in the king's courts. But there is another very strong reason alluded to by Mr. Serjeant Glyn, which would alone be decisive. This is a charge against him, which, though a civil injury, has a mixture of criminality in it: it is an assault; which is criminal by the laws of England, and is an abuse of that authority given him by the king's letters patent under the great seal. Now, if every thing within a dominion is triable by the courts within that dominion, yet the consequence of the king's letters patent, which gives the power, must be tried here; for nothing concerning the feignory can be tried in the place where it is. In the proprietary governments in America, they cannot try any question concerning the feignory in their own courts; and therefore, though questions concerning lands in the isle of Man are triable in the courts of the isle of Man, yet wherever there is a question concerning the feignory, it must be tried in some courts in England. It was so held by the chief justice and many of the judges in the reign of queen Elizabeth, upon a question arising concerning the feignory of the isle of Man. Or whenever there is a question between two provinces in America, it must be tried in England, by analogy to what was done with respect to the feignories in Wales being tried in English counties: so that emphatically the governor must be tried in England, to see whether he has exercised legally and properly that authority given him by the king's letters patent, or whether he has abused that authority, contrary to the law of England, which governs the letters patent by which he is appointed. It does not follow from this, that, according to the nature of the case, let the cause of action arise where it may, that a man is not entitled to give every justification that ought to be a defence to him. If by the authority of that capacity in which he stood he has done right, he is to lay that before the court by a proper plea, and the court will exercise their judgment whether that is not a sufficient justification. In this case, if the justification had been proved, perhaps the court would have been of an opinion that it was a sufficient answer, and he might have moved in arrest of judgment afterwards, and taken the opinion of the court; but the court must be of opinion that it is a sufficient answer, and that the raising a mutiny in a garrison, though in time of peace, was a reason for that summary proceeding, in taking him up and sending him out of the island. I could conceive cases in time of war, in which a governor would be justified, though he acted very arbitrarily, in which he could not be justified in time of peace. Suppose in a siege, or when the French were going to invade Minorca, suppose that the governor should think proper to send a hundred of the inhabitants out of the island, and that he did this really acting for the best: or suppose, upon a general suspicion, he should take people up as spies: why, upon proper circumstances laid before the court for their judgment and opinion, it would be very fit to see whether he had acted as the governor of the garrison ought, according to the law of England and the justice of the case. But it is said, if there is a law in the garrison, or if he acts as the Spanish governor might have done before, how is that to be known here?—How? Why, there are ways of knowing foreign laws as well as our own, but in a different manner: it must be proved as a fact, and in that shape the court must assist the jury in finding out what the law really is. Suppose there is a French settlement (there is a case in point of the sort I am stating) which depends upon the custom of Paris; why, we must receive witnesses with regard to it, to shew what the custom is, just as you receive evidence of a custom with respect to trade.

The judges in the courts of England do determine all cases that arise in the plantations, all cases that arise in Gibraltar or Minorca, in Jersey or Guernsey, and they must inform themselves by having the law stated to them. As to suggestions with regard to witnesses, the plaintiff must prove his case, and the court must take care that the defendant is not surprised, and that he has a fair opportunity of bringing his evidence, if it is a case proper in other respects for the jurisdiction of the court. There may be some cases arising abroad, which may not be fit to be tried here; but that cannot be the case of a governor injuring a man, contrary to the duty of his office, and in violation of the trust reposed in him by the king's commission. If he wants to send for witnesses to prove his justification, and applies to the court, they will do what this court did in a case of a criminal prosecution which arose in Scotland. This court forced the prosecutor (and would have put off the trial from day to day if he had not submitted to it) to suffer the witnesses to be examined by a commission where the cause arose, who could not be compelled to come here. The court obliged them to come into these terms; or, if they did not, it is a matter of course, in aid of a trial at law, to apply upon a real ground, and not upon a fictitious pretence of delay, to a court of equity to have a commission and injunction in the mean time; and the court will certainly take care that justice shall be done to the defendant as well as to the plaintiff, who must come with witnesses to prove his case; and therefore, in every light in which I see this matter, it holds emphatically in the case of a governor, if it did not hold in respect of any other man within the colony, province, or garrison. But to make questions upon matters of settled law, where there have been a number of actions determined, which it never entered into a man's head to dispute—to lay down in an English court of justice such monstrous propositions as that a governor, acting by virtue of letters patent under the great seal, can do what he pleases; that he is accountable only to God and his own conscience—and to maintain here that every governor in every place can act absolutely; that he may spoil, plunder, affect their bodies and their liberty, and is accountable to nobody—is a doctrine not to be maintained; for if he is not accountable in this court, he is accountable no-where. The king in council has no jurisdiction of this matter; they cannot do it in any shape; they cannot give damages, they cannot give reparation, they cannot punish, they cannot hold plea in any way. Wherever complaints have been before the king in council, it has been with a view to remove the governor; it has been with a view to take the commission from him which he held at the pleasure of the crown. But suppose he holds nothing of the crown, growth, suppose his government is at an end, and that he is in England, they have no jurisdiction to make reparation to the party injured; they have no jurisdiction to punish in any shape the man that has committed the injury: how can the arguments be supported, that, in an empire so extended as this, every governor in every colony and every province belonging to the crown of Great-Britain, shall be absolutely despotic, and can no more be called in question than the king of France? and this after there have been multitudes of actions in all our memories against governors, and nobody has been ingenious enough to whisper them, that they were not amenable.

In a case in Salkeld, cited by Mr. Peckham, there was a motion for a trial at bar in an action of false imprisonment against the governor of New-York; and it was desired to be a trial at bar, because the attorney-general was to defend it on the part of the king, who had taken up the defence of the governor. That case plainly shews that such an action existed; the attorney-general had no idea of a governor's being above the law. Justice Powell says, in the case of Way and Yally, in 6 Modern, that an action of false imprisonment had been brought here against the governor of Jamaica for an imprisonment there; and the laws of the country were given in evidence. The governor of Jamaica in that case never thought that he was not amenable. He defended himself. He shewed, I suppose, by the laws of the country, an act of the assembly which justified that imprisonment; and the court received it, to be sure, as they ought to do. Whatever is a justification in the place where the thing is done, ought to be a justification where the case is tried. I remember (it was early in my time; I was counsel in it) an action against governor Sabine, and he was very ably defended. Nobody thought the action did not lie against him. He was governor of Gibraltar, and he barely confirmed the sentence of a court-martial, which tried one of the train of artillery by martial law. Governor Sabine affirmed the sentence. This plaintiff was a carpenter in the train. It was proved at the trial, that the tradesmen that followed the train were not liable to martial law; the court were of that opinion; and therefore the defendant was guilty of a trespass in having a share in that sentence which punished him by whipping. There is another case or two, but they don't occur to me at present.

Let us see now what the next objection is, with regard to the matter arising abroad; and that is a general objection, that as the matter arose abroad, it cannot be tried here in England. There is a formal distinction that prevails in our courts, and likewise a substantial one as to the locality of trials. The substantial distinction is, where the proceeding is in rem, and where the effect of the judgment cannot be had if it is laid in a wrong place. That is the case of all ejectments where possession is to be delivered by the sheriff of the county: and as trials here are in particular counties, the officers are county officers; therefore the judgment could not have effect if it was not laid in the proper place and in the proper county. But there likewise is a formal distinction, where, perhaps, complete justice could be done, let it be laid in what county it might; that is mere matter of form as to cases that arise within the realm: but even with regard to matters that arise out of the realm, to be sure there is a distinction of locality too; for there are some cases that arise out of the realm, that ought not to be tried any where but in the country where they arise, as the case alluded to by serjeant Walker. If there is a sort of fighting in France between two Frenchmen, and they happen both casually to be here, and an action of assault is brought by the one against the other, which charge a criminality too, that it is done against the king's peace, and the laws and customs of England; in that case it may be a very material question whether that could be maintained here: for though it is not a criminal prosecution, yet it has that sort of criminality that, perhaps, without giving an opinion, it ought to be tried by the laws of that country where both parties are subjects; it may be a substantial objection of locality. So likewise, if it is concerning an estate in a foreign country, where it is a matter of title and not of damages, it may be a substantial distinction. There is likewise a question of form, and that arises upon the trial; for trials in England being by a jury, and the kingdom being divided into counties, and every county, in respect of trial, considered almost as if a separate kingdom or principality, it is absolutely necessary that there should be some county where the action is particularly brought, that there may be a process to the sheriff of that county, to bring a jury from thence to try it; and that is matter of form, which goes to all cases that arise abroad. But the law makes a distinction between transitory actions and local actions. If the matter which is the cause of a transitory action arises within the realm, it may be laid in any county; the place is not material: and if an imprisonment in Middlesex, it may be laid in Surrey; and though proved to be done in Middlesex, the place not being material, it does not at all prevent the plaintiff recovering damages: for the place of transitory actions is never material. But where, by particular acts of parliament, it is made so, as in the case of churchwardens and constables, and other cases that require the action to be brought in the county; there, by the force of the act of parliament, the objection is fatal: but otherwise it may be laid in any county in England, let it be done where it will: the parties have an opportunity of applying to the court in time to change the venue. But if they go to trial without it, that is no objection; and all actions of a transitory nature that arise abroad may be laid as happening in an English county. But there are occasions which make it absolutely necessary to state in the declaration, that it really happened abroad; as in the case of specialties, where the date must be set forth. When an action is brought upon a specialty which bears a date, if that specialty is set out, or if oyer is prayed of it, by which the place where it was made must appear; if the declaration states it to have been made at Westminster, in Middlesex, and upon producing the deed it bears date at Bengal, there is a variance between the deed and the declaration, which makes it appear to be a different instrument. I don't put the case, though there are some in the books that seem to me to have confounded the statute of the 6th of Richard the second, therefore I don't put the objection upon the 6th of Richard the second; but it goes fully upon this: if you don't state the true date or true description of the bond, it is a variance. What does the law in that case? (and it has done it for hundreds of years) Why; the law invented a fiction, and has said, 'You shall set out the description truly, and then give a venue only for form for the trial; videlicet, in the county of Middlesex, or any other county you please.' Did any judge ever think that when the declaration said, in fort St. George in Cheapside, that the plaintiff meant that it was in Cheapside? No; it is a fiction in form: every country has its forms: it is for the furtherance of justice that these fictions were invented; to get rid of formalities; to further and advance justice. This is a certain rule: You never shall contradict the fiction so as to defeat the end for which it was invented, but you may contradict it for every other purpose. Now this fiction is invented barely for the mode of trial; to every other purpose you shall contradict it, but not for the purpose of saying, You shall not try it. It is just like that question that was long agitated and finally determined some years ago, upon a fiction of the teste of writs taken out in the vacation, which bore date as of the last day of the term. That is a fiction of the court. You never shall contradict that fiction, and go into the truth of the case, to destroy the writ, and shew it a bad writ. Why? Because the court invented the fiction to make the writ good, for the furtherance of justice, that it may appear right in the form; but for every other purpose in the world you may contradict it. I am sorry to observe there are some sayings which have been alluded to, inaccurately taken down. Perhaps there were short-hand writers in those days, as there are at present, who mistake every word they hear, and, being unable to correct it, have printed it improperly: but to say, that as men they have one way of thinking, and as judges they have another, is an absurdity. No; they meant to support the fiction. I will mention a case or two to shew that is the meaning of it. There is a case in 6 Modern 208, of Roberts and Harnage. The plaintiff declares, that the defendant became bound to him at fort St. David's in the East-Indies at London, in such a bond. Upon demurrer the objection was, that the bond appeared to have been sealed and delivered at fort St. David's in the East-Indies, and therefore the date made it local; and, by consequence, the declaration ought to have been of a bond made at fort St. David's in the East-Indies, viz. at Islington in the county of Middlesex, or in such a ward or parish in London; and of that opinion was the whole court. You see how this case is stated. But I will state it from another book, where it is reported more truly; I mean in lord Raymond, 1042. There it is stated thus. It appeared by the declaration, that the bond was made at London, in the ward of Cheap. Upon oyer, the bond was set out, and it appeared on the face of it to be dated at fort St. George in the East-Indies. The defendant pleaded the variance in abatement, and the plaintiff demurred, and it was held bad; but the court said, that it would have been good, if laid at fort St. George in the East-Indies, to wit, at London, in the ward of Cheap. What was the objection there? Why, they had laid it falsely. They had laid the bond as made at London. The bond is produced, and appears to be made at another place: that is a variance. You must take the bond as it is. Then how do you get to trial? Why, introduce a fiction, and the formality gives you the trial in that county by the videlicet, and the bond is truly described. A case was quoted from Latch, and a case from Lutwyche, on the former argument; but I will mention a case posterior in point of time, where the court took it up upon the true ground, where both these cases were cited, and no regard at all was paid to them; and that is the case of Parker and Crook, 10 Modern 255. This was an action of covenant upon a deed indented. It was objected to the declaration, that the defendant is said in the declaration to continue at fort St. George in the East-Indies; and upon the oyer of the deed it bears date at fort St. George; and therefore the court, as was pretended, had no jurisdiction. Latch, fol. 4. Lutwyche, 56. Lord chief justice Parker said, that an action will lie in England upon a deed dated in foreign parts, or else the party can have no remedy; but then, in the declaration, a place in England must be alledged, pro forma. Generally speaking, the deed, upon the oyer of it, must be consistent with the declaration; but in these cases propter necessitatem, if the inconsistency be as little as possible, not to be regarded: as here, the contract, being of a voyage which was to be performed from fort St. George to Great-Britain, does import, that fort St. George is different from Great-Britain: and after taking time to consider of it, in Hilary-Term the plaintiff had his judgment, notwithstanding the objection. Why then, it all amounts to this: that where the action is substantially such a one as the court can hold plea of, as the mode of trial is by jury, and as they must be called together by process directed to the sheriff of the county, matter of form is added to the fiction, to say it is in that county; and then the whole of the inquiry is, whether it is an action that ought to be maintained. But can it be doubted, that actions may be maintained here, not only upon contracts, which follow the persons, but for injuries done by subject to subject; especially for injuries where the whole that is prayed is a reparation in damages, or satisfaction to be made by process against the person or his effects within the jurisdiction of the court? We know it is within every day's experience. I was embarrassed a great while to find out whether it was really meant to make a question of it. It is so in sea-batteries; but is it to be supposed that the judge thought it happened in Cheapside, when the party proves where the place was? In sea-batteries, the plaintiff often lays the injury to have been done in Middlesex, and then proves it to be done a thousand leagues distant, on the other side of the Atlantic. There are cases of offences on the high-seas, where it is of necessity to lay in the declaration, that it was done upon the high-seas; as the taking of a ship as a prize. There is a case of that sort occurs to my memory:—the reason I remember it is, because there was a question about the jurisdiction. There likewise was an action of that kind before lord chief justice Lee, and another before me, in which I quoted that determination, to shew that when the lords commissioners of prizes have given judgment, that is conclusive in the action; and likewise, when they have given judgment, it is conclusive as to the costs, whether they have given costs or not. But how is that action laid? It is necessary to be laid, that his ship was taken or seized on the high-seas, videlicet, in Cheapside.

Cheapside. Now is it seriously contended, that the judge and jury, and counsel, who tried the cause, fancied that ship was sailing in Cheapside? No; it is plain sense; the ship was taken upon the high-seas; for which an action lies in England; and you say in Cheapside, which is saying no more than that, I pray this action may be tried in London; it is plainly understood: but if you offer reasons of fact contrary to the truth of the case, there is no end of the embarrassment. At the last sittings, there were two actions brought by the Armenian merchants for assaults and trespasses in the East-Indies, and they are very strong authorities. Serjeant Glynn said, that the defendant, Mr. Verelst, was ably assisted. So he was, and by men who would have taken the objection, if they thought it had been maintainable: and that was after this case had been argued once; yet the counsel did not think it could be supported. Mr. Verelst would have been glad to have made the objection: he would not have left it to a jury, if he could have stopped them short, and said, 'You shall not try it at all.' I have had some actions before me, rather going further than these transitory actions; that is, going to cases which in England would be local actions: and I remember one, I think it was an action brought against captain Gambier, who by order of admiral Boscawen had pulled down the houses of some sutlers who supplied the navy and sailors with spirituous liquors; and whether the act was right or wrong, it was certainly done with a good intention on the part of the admiral, for the sailors' health were affected by it. They were pulled down. The captain was inattentive enough to bring the gentleman over in his own ship, who would never have got to England otherwise; and as soon as he came here, he was advised that he should bring an action against him. He brought his action, and one of the counts in the declaration was for pulling down the houses. The objection was taken to the count for pulling down the houses; and the case of Skinner and the East-India Company was cited in support of the objection. On the other side, they produced, from a manuscript note, a case before lord chief justice Eyre, where he over-ruled the objection; and I over-ruled the objection upon this principle, that the reparation here was personal, and for damages; that there would be a failure of justice, for it was upon the coast of Nova-Scotia, where there were no regular courts of justice, but if there had been, captain Gambier might never go there again; and that the reason of locality in such an action in England did not hold in this case. I quoted a case of an injury of that sort in the East-Indies, where even in a court of equity lord Hardwicke had directed satisfaction to be made in damages. That case was not fully argued; but this was argued, and there were large damages given against Gambier. I do not quote it for the opinion I was of there, because that opinion is very likely to be erroneous; but I quote it for this reason, that there were large damages given against captain Gambier: and though he was not at the expence, for he acted by the orders of admiral Boscawen, yet the admiral's representatives paid the expence, therefore their inclination was to have got rid of that verdict if they could; but there never was any motion for a new trial. I recollect another cause that came on before me: that was the case of admiral Palliser; there the very gist of the action was local. It was for destroying fishing-huts upon the Labrador-coast. It was a nice question; when the Canadians settled, and when they had a right to it. It was a dispute between them and the fishermen in England. The cause went on a great way: the defendant would have turned it short at once, if he could have made that objection; but that objection was not made. There are no local courts among the Esquimaux Indians upon that part of the Labrador-coast. Whatever injury had been done there by any of the king's officers would have been altogether without redress, if that objection of locality would have held: and the consequence of that circumstance shews, that where the reason fails, even in actions which in England would be local actions, yet that does not hold to places beyond the seas within the king's dominions. That of admiral Palliser's went off upon a proposal of a reference, and ended by an award. But as to transitory actions, there is not a colour of doubt but that every action that is transitory may be laid in any county in England, though the matter arises beyond the seas: and when it is absolutely necessary to lay the truth of the case in the declaration, there is a fiction of law to assist you, and you shall not make use of the truth of the case against that fiction, but you may make use of it to every other purpose. I am clearly of opinion not only against the objections made, but that there does not appear a question upon which the objections could arise.

The other judges declared themselves of the same opinion, and the court ordered, 'that the judgment should be affirmed.'

In consequence of the above judgment, on Saturday the 4th day of February 1775, the gentlemen who were bail for governor Moslyn, to prevent his being taken in execution and carried to prison, were obliged to pay to Mr. Fabrigas the sum of 3000*l.* for his damages, and 159*l.* which the court amerced the governor in costs.

XXX. The Trial of ELIZABETH Duchess-Dowager of Kingston, for Bigamy, before the Right Hon. the House of Peers, in Westminster-Hall, in full Parliament assembled, 15th, 16th, 19th, 20th, and 22d Days of April, 1776.

[This trial was printed under an order of the house of lords.]

Monday, April the 15th, 1776.

In the court erected in Westminster-Hall, for the trial of Elizabeth duchess-dowager of Kingston, for bigamy.

ABOUT ten of the clock the lords came from their own house into the court erected in Westminster-Hall, for the trial of Elizabeth duchess-dowager of Kingston, in the manner following:

The lord high steward's gentlemen attendants, two and two.

The clerks assisant to the house of lords, and the clerk of the parliament.

Clerk of the crown in Chancery, bearing the king's commission to the lord high steward, and the clerk of the crown in the King's Bench.

The masters in Chancery, two and two.

The judges, two and two.

The peers eldest sons, two and two.

Peers minors, two and two.

Chester and Somerset heralds,

Four serjeants at arms with their maces, two and two.

The yeoman-usher of the house.

The barons, two and two, beginning with the youngest baron.

The bishops, two and two.

The viscounts and other peers, two and two.

The lord privy seal and lord president.

The archbishop of York and the archbishop of Canterbury.

Four serjeants at arms with their maces, two and two.

The serjeant at arms attending the great seal, and purse-bearer.

Then Garter king at arms, and the gentleman-usher of the black rod carrying the white staff before the lord high steward.

Henry earl Bathurst, chancellor of Great-Britain, lord high steward, alone, his train borne.

His royal highness the duke of Cumberland, his train borne.

The lords being placed in their proper seats, and the lord high steward upon the woolpack, the house was resumed.

The clerk of the crown in Chancery, having his majesty's commission to the lord high steward in his hand, and the clerk of the crown in the King's Bench, standing before the clerk's table with their faces towards the state, made three reverences; the first at the table, the second in the mid-way, and the third near the woolpack; then kneeled down; and the clerk of the crown in Chancery, on his knee, presented the commission to the lord high steward, who delivered the same to the clerk of the crown in the King's Bench to read: then rising, they made three reverences, and returned to the table. And then proclamation was made for silence, in this manner:

Serjeant at arms. Oyez, oyez, oyez! Our sovereign lord the king strictly charges and commands all manner of persons to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment.

Then the lord high steward stood up, and spoke to the peers.

Lord High Steward. His majesty's commission is about to be read: your lordships are desired to attend to it in the usual manner; and all others are likewise to stand up uncovered while the commission is reading.

All the peers uncovered themselves; and they, and all others, stood up uncovered, while the commission was read.

GEORGE R.

GEORGE the third, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, and so forth. To our right trusty and right well-beloved cousin and counsellor Henry earl Bathurst, our chancellor of Great-Britain, greeting. Know ye, that whereas Elizabeth the wife of Augustus John Hervey, late of the parish of St. George, Hanover-Square, in our county of Middlesex, esquire, before our justices of oyer and terminer, at Hicks's-Hall, in St. John-Street, in and for our county of Middlesex, upon the oath of twelve jurors, good and lawful men of the said county of Middlesex, then and there sworn and charged to enquire for us for the body of the said county, stands indicted of polygamy and feloniously marrying Evelyn Pierrepont late duke of Kingston, the being then married, and the wife of the said Augustus John Hervey: we, considering that justice is an excellent virtue, and pleasing to the Most High, and being willing that the said Elizabeth, of and for the felony whereof she is indicted as aforesaid, before us, in our present parliament, according to the law and custom of our kingdom of Great-Britain, may be heard, examined, sentenced, and adjudged; and that all other things which are necessary in this behalf may be duly exercised and executed; and for that the office of high steward of Great-Britain (whose presence in this behalf is required) is now vacant (as we are informed) we, very much confiding in your fidelity, prudence, provident circumspection, and industry, have for this cause ordained and constituted you steward of Great-Britain, to hear, execute, and exercise for this time the said office, with all things due and belonging to the same office in this behalf: and therefore we command you, that you diligently set about the premises, and for this time do exercise and execute with effect all those things which belong to the office of steward of Great-Britain, and which are required in this behalf. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent. Witness ourself at Westminster, the fifteenth day of April, in the sixteenth year of our reign.

By the KING himself, signed with his own hand.

Yorke.

Serjeant at arms. God save the king!

Then Garret, and the gentleman-usher of the black rod, after three reverences, kneeling, jointly presented the white staff to his grace the lord high steward: and then his grace, attended by Garret, black rod, and the purse-bearer (making his proper reverences towards the throne) removed from the woolpack to an armed chair, which was placed on the uppermost step but one of the throne, as it was prepared for that purpose; and then seated himself in the chair, and delivered the staff to the gentleman-usher of the black rod on his right hand, the purse-bearer holding the purse on his left.

Clerk of the Crown. Serjeant at arms, make proclamation.

Serjeant at Arms. Oyez, oyez, oyez! Our sovereign lord the king strictly charges and commands all manner of persons to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment.

Then the clerk of the crown, by direction of the lord high steward, read the certiorari, and the return thereof, together with the caption of the indictment, and the indictment certified thereupon, against Elizabeth duchess-dowager of Kingston; in hæc verba:

GEORGE the third, by the grace of God, of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, and so forth. To our justices of oyer and terminer, at Hicks's-Hall, in St. John-Street, in and for our county of Middlesex, and to every of them, greeting. We being willing, for certain reasons us thereunto moving, that all and singular indictments of whatsoever felonies whereof Elizabeth calling herself duchess-dowager of Kingston, by the name of Elizabeth the wife of Augustus John Hervey, late of the parish of St. George, Hanover-Square, in the county of Middlesex, esquire, is indicted before you (as is said) be determined before us in our parliament, and not elsewhere; do command you and every of you, that you or one of you do send under your seals, or under the seal of one of you, before us in our present parliament, immediately after the receipt of this our writ, all and singular the indictments aforesaid, with all things touching the same, by whatsoever name the said Elizabeth is called in the same, together with this writ, that we may cause further to be done thereon what of right and according to the law and custom of England we shall see fit to be done. Witness ourself at Westminster the eleventh day of November, in the sixteenth year of our reign.

Yorke.

To the justices of oyer and terminer, at Hicks's-Hall, in St. John-Street, in and for the county of Middlesex, and to every of them, a writ of certiorari to certify into the upper house of parliament the indictment found against Elizabeth calling herself duchess-dowager of Kingston, by the name of Elizabeth wife of Augustus John Hervey, for bigamy, returnable immediately before the king in parliament.

Middlesex. THE jurors for our sovereign lord the now king, upon their oath present, that Elizabeth the wife of Augustus John Hervey, late of the parish of St. George, Hanover-Square, in the county of Middlesex, esquire, on the eighth day of March, in the ninth year of the reign of our sovereign lord George the third, now king of Great-Britain, and so forth, being then married, and then the wife of the said Augustus John Hervey, with force and arms, at the said parish of St. George, Hanover-Square, in the said county of Middlesex, feloniously did marry and take to husband Evelyn Pierrepont duke of Kingston (the said Augustus John Hervey, her former husband, being then alive) against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said lord the king, his crown and dignity: and the said jurors for our said sovereign lord the now king, upon their oath aforesaid, further present, that the said Elizabeth, heretofore (to wit) on the fourth day of August, in the eighteenth year of the reign of our late sovereign lord George the second, late king of Great-Britain, and so forth, at the parish of Laimston, in the county of Southampton, by the name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, did marry the said Augustus John Hervey, and him the said Augustus John Hervey then and there had for her husband; and that the said Elizabeth being married, and the wife of the said Augustus John Hervey, afterwards (to wit) on the eighth day of March, in the ninth year of the reign of our said sovereign lord George the third, now king of Great-Britain, and so forth, with force and arms, at the said parish of St. George, Hanover-Square, in the said county of Middlesex, feloniously did marry and take to husband the said Evelyn Pierrepont duke of Kingston (the said Augustus John Hervey, her former husband, being then alive) against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the now king, his crown and dignity.

Sworn in court.

Lord High Steward. Is it your lordships' pleasure, that the judges have leave to be covered?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Clerk of the Crown. Serjeant at arms, make proclamation for the gentleman-usher of the black rod to bring his prisoner to the bar.

Serjeant at Arms. Oyez, oyez, oyez! Elizabeth duchess-dowager of Kingston, come forth and save you and your bail, or else you forfeit your recognizance.

[After her surrender she was, during the trial, called to the bar by the following proclamation.]

Gentleman-usher of the black rod, bring your prisoner Elizabeth duchess-dowager of Kingston to the bar, pursuant to the order of the house of lords.

Then Elizabeth duchess-dowager of Kingston was brought to the bar by the deputy-gentleman-usher of the black rod. The prisoner, when she approached the bar, made three reverences, and then fell upon her knees at the bar.

Lord High Steward. Madam, you may rise.

The prisoner then rose up, and curtsied to his grace the lord high steward, and to the house of peers; which compliment was returned her by his grace, and the lords.

Then, proclamation having been made again for silence, the lord high steward spake to the prisoner, as follows.

Lord High Steward.

Madam,

YOU stand indicted for having married a second husband, your first husband being living.

A crime so destructive of the peace and happiness of private families, and so injurious in its consequences to the welfare and good order of society, that by the statute-law of this kingdom it was for many years (in your sex) punishable with death: the lenity, however, of later times has substituted a milder punishment in its stead.

This consideration must necessarily tend to lessen the perturbation of your spirits upon this awful occasion.

But that, madam, which, next to the inward feelings of your own conscience, will afford you most comfort is, reflecting upon the honour, the wisdom, and the candour of this high court of criminal jurisdiction.

It is, madam, by your particular desire that you now stand at that bar: you were not brought there by any prosecutor.

In your petition to the lords, praying for a speedy trial, you assumed the title of duchess-dowager of Kingston, and it was by that title that the court of King's Bench admitted you to bail; in your petition you likewise averred, that Augustus John Hervey, whose wife the indictment charges you with being, is at this time earl of Bristol: upon examining the records, the lords were satisfied of the truth of that averment, and have accordingly allowed you the privilege you petitioned for, of being tried by your peers in full parliament; and from them you will be sure to meet with nothing but justice tempered with humanity.

Before I conclude, I am commanded by the house to acquaint you, madam, and all other persons having occasion to speak to the court during the trial, that they are to address themselves to the lords in general, and not to any lord in particular.

Duchess of Kingston. My lords, I, the unfortunate widow of your late brother, the most noble Evelyn Pierrepont duke of Kingston, am brought to the bar of this right honourable house without a shadow of fear, but infinitely awed by the respect that is due to you, my most honourable judges.

My lords, after having, at the hazard of my life, returned from Rome in a dangerous sickness to submit myself to the laws of my country, I plead some little merit in my willing obedience; and I intreat your lordships indulgence, if I should be deficient in any ceremonial part of my conduct towards you, my most honoured and respectable judges; for the infirmities of my body and the oppression of spirits under which I labour, leave your unhappy prisoner sometimes without recollection: but it must be only with the loss of life, that I can be deprived of the knowledge of the respect that is due to this high and awful tribunal.

Lord High Steward. Madam, your ladyship will do well to give attention, while you are arraigned on your indictment.

Then

Then proclamation was made for ſilence.

After which, Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton was arraigned, in the form of the ſaid indictment againſt her, by the clerk of the crown in the King's Bench.

ELIZABETH ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, you ſtand indicted by the name of Elizabeth the wife of Auguſtus John Hervey, late of the pariſh of St. George, Hanover-Square, eſquire (now become a peer of this realm) for that you, on the eighth day of March, in the ninth year of the reign of his preſent majeſty our ſovereign lord king George the third, being then married, and then the wife of the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, with force and arms, at the ſaid pariſh of St. George, Hanover-Square, in the ſaid county of Middleſex, feloniously did marry and take to huſband Evelyn Pierrepont duke of Kingſton, the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, your former huſband, being then alive; againſt the form of the ſtatute in ſuch caſe made and provided, and againſt the peace of our ſaid lord the king, his crown and dignity.

The indictment further charges, that you the ſaid Elizabeth, heretofore (to wit) on the fourth day of Auguſt, in the eighteenth year of our late ſovereign lord George the ſecond, late king of Great-Britain, and ſo forth, at the pariſh of Lainſton, in the county of Southampton, by the name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, did marry the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, and him the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey then and there had for your huſband; and that you the ſaid Elizabeth, being married, and the wife of the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, afterwards (to wit) on the eighth day of March, in the ninth year of the reign of our ſaid ſovereign lord George the third, now king of Great-Britain, and ſo forth, with force and arms, at the ſaid pariſh of St. George, Hanover-Square, feloniously did marry and take to huſband the ſaid Evelyn Pierrepont duke of Kingſton, the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, your former huſband, being then alive.

How ſay you? are you guilty of the felony whereof you ſtand indicted, or not guilty?

Duchefs of Kingſton. I Elizabeth Pierrepont, ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, indicted by the name of Elizabeth the wife of Auguſtus John Hervey, eſquire, ſay, that I am not guilty.

Clerk of the Crown. Cul' prit—How will you be tried?

Duchefs of Kingſton. By God and my peers.

Clerk of the Crown. God ſend your grace a good deliverance.

Clerk of the Crown. Serjeant at arms, make proclamation.

Serjeant at Arms. Oyez, oyez, oyez! All manner of perſons that will give evidence, on behalf of our ſovereign lord the king, againſt Elizabeth ducheſs-dowager of Kingſton, the priſoner at the bar, let them come forth, and they ſhall be heard; for now ſhe ſtands at the bar upon her deliverance.

Lord High Steward. My lords, the diſtance of this place from the bar is ſo great, that I muſt deſire your lordſhips leave to go down to the table for the convenience of hearing.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Then his grace removed to the table.

Duchefs of Kingſton. My lords, the ſuppoſed marriage in the indictment with Mr. Hervey, which is the ground of the charge againſt me, was inſiſted upon by him in a ſuit inſtituted by me in the Conſiſtory Court of the right reverend lord biſhop of London; by the ſentence of which court, ſtill in force, it was pronounced, decreed, and declared, that I was free from all matrimonial contracts or eſpouſals with the ſaid Mr. Hervey: and, my lords, I am adviſed that this ſentence, which I now deſire leave to offer to your lordſhips (remaining unreverſed and unimpeached) is concluſive, and that no other evidence ought to be received or ſtated to your lordſhips reſpecting ſuch pretended marriage.

Lord High Steward. Do the counſel for the proſecutor object to the reading of the ſentence?

Mr. Attorney-general. My lords, obſerving that the priſoner was about to make ſome application to your lordſhips, I was not ſollicitous to riſe in the order and place wherein I ought to have addreſſed myſelf to the houſe; becauſe I would not interrupt, or prevent, any thing which ſhe might think material for her to lay before your lordſhips.

I attended much to the form of the application. If I comprehend the aim of it, ſhe means to object to your lordſhips hearing any evidence, either given or ſtated, in ſupport of the preſent indictment; the ground of her objection being a ſentence, ſaid to have paſſed in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, againſt the firſt marriage ſuppoſed in the indictment. Upon this, your lordſhips have demanded, whether I object to the reading of the ſentence?

If the proceeding referred to had been tendered to your lordſhips in the only place which can be thought the proper or regular one, for receiving the defendant's evidence, to be ſure, many queſtions would naturally have ariſen upon it. Firſt, whether that proceeding, explained as it will be, has the force of a ſentence, or amounts to more than a circumſtance and proof of the fraud complained of? Secondly, whether a ſerious ſentence of that ſort, pronounced between party and party, ought to be admitted in a criminal proſecution, and againſt the king, who was no party to it, nor could have become ſo by any means? Thirdly, whether it creates an eſtoppel, or concluſive evidence againſt the crown? Fourthly, whether it does ſo in this peculiar ſpecies of proſecution?

But in the way this thing is urged, it ſeems perfectly impoſſible, or at leaſt altogether premature, to diſcuſs the force and effect of it, as evidence.

That ſuppoſes a caſe already made for the proſecutor, which requires the aid of evidence, on the part of the priſoner, to diſprove or explain it. But, if I catch the idea perfectly, the preſent inſiſting is, that the ſentence now offered to the conſideration of your lordſhips carries ſome legal force—what, I do not pretend to define or explain; for I proteſt I have no gueſs what is meant; but—ſome legal force with it, which enables the priſoner to demand, in this ſtage of the buſineſs, that the trial ſhall not proceed, nor any evidence be heard to maintain the indictment, but that the whole matter ſhall be wound up, and conclude with ſome reſolution of your lordſhips,—not to acquit (for in order to that you muſt try) but to diſmiſs the priſoner without trial, after putting herſelf upon her peers for trial.

Vol. XI.

I have, notwithſtanding, ſhortly intimated the nature of the objections which may be made to it, as an article of evidence for the priſoner; partly to point out, how untenable the propoſition is of ſtopping the trial, by interpoſing a thing whoſe reality, competence, and effect will be ſo much diſputed in matter of fact and of law; but chiefly, to lay in my claim, that this paper (if your lordſhips ſhould think it worth hearing) may be read at this time, and for the purpoſe of the motion now made by the priſoner only, without prejudice to any objection which I may think fit to make to it, if it ſhould be offered as evidence in the courſe of the trial.

If it be read under the reſerve I have mentioned; not as a part of the trial, but to make this application of the priſoner to your lordſhips, pre-viously to her trial, intelligible; and for the ſake of raiſing the argument upon it, in caſe your lordſhips ſhould ſuffer ſuch a point to be argued at all; in theſe views, I will not object to the reading of it.

But if it be offered as a piece of evidence for the priſoner, ſo that I muſt admit or object to it now, I ſhall certainly inſiſt upon going on with the proſecution, and drive this article of evidence into its own place, the priſoner's defence. There it will be better ſeen, how far it is available, or even competent.

Unleſs I could learn the purpoſe of offering it from thoſe who adviſed it, I do not know how to make a more particular answer to your lordſhips queſtion.

Duchefs of Kingſton. Will your lordſhips pleaſe to permit my counſel to be heard to this point?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Wallace, you may proceed for the priſoner.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I have the honour to be assigned one of the counſel to adviſe and aſſiſt the noble priſoner at the bar in all matters of law that may ariſe in the courſe of the trial.

I ſhall ſubmit with great deference to your lordſhips, that the preſent ſtage of the buſineſs is the proper ſeaſon to introduce the ſentence which has been mentioned to the court.

My lords, the ſentence is conceived to be concluſive upon the fact of that marriage which is the ground of this indictment. The indictment ſuppoſes that the priſoner at the bar was married to Auguſtus John Hervey: the ſentence now offered to your lordſhips is not only of a competent jurisdiction to decide that queſtion, but the only conſtitutional jurisdiction.

My lords, whiſt this ſentence remains unimpeached, I conceive that it is concluſive againſt all evidence to be produced of the fact of the marriage. It is in that light the priſoner is adviſed to offer it to your lordſhips, that a court of competent jurisdiction having decided the point, it will be in vain to call parole witneſſes to the fact; and it will only take up your lordſhips time, and it will be of no real uſe, to ſtate the evidence of witneſſes, which witneſſes cannot appear to give that evidence before the court.

My lords, the office of a counſel in opening the caſe to any court is, as I conceive, to ſtate with clearneſs the evidence that is to be adduced, that the court may better underſtand and apply it: therefore, unleſs the evidence is competent, your lordſhips will not hear any ſtate of it. This too perhaps may be the time, though I ſhall forbear at preſent to enter into it, to diſcuſs whether the ſentence be admiſſible; or, if admiſſible, whether concluſive: but we are now, my lords, upon the order of producing this ſentence; and if it has the effect which I ſhall humbly ſubmit in a proper ſeaſon to your lordſhips that it has, of being abſolutely concluſive, then the evidence, which is now ready to be ſtated by the counſel for the proſecution, ought not to be produced, and of courſe ought not to be ſtated. This is the light in which the cauſe appears to me at this moment; and I truſt your lordſhips will concur in opinion, that if the ſentence has the concluſive effect which we are ready to ſubmit to your lordſhips it has, it repels all testimony, and makes it improper therefore to ſtate any. If a precedent ſhould be thought neceſſary for what is prayed by the noble priſoner at the bar, I beg leave to refer your lordſhips to a caſe determined at the bar of the court of King's Bench in the reign of king William: it is reported in Mr. Serjeant Carthw's Reports, 225, upon a trial of an ejectment. The queſtion was, if ſir Robert Carr was actually married to Iſabella Jones, by whom he had iſſue, and under whom the plaintiff in that cauſe claimed the eſtate. The defendant, by way of anticipation of the evidence which the plaintiff was about to give, moved the court, that the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to prove a marriage between them, becauſe there was a ſentence in the Archbiſhop's upon a ſuit of jactitation brought againſt her; by which it was decreed, that there was no marriage between them, but that they were free from all matrimonial contracts and eſpouſals. The ſentence was then offered in evidence by the defendant's counſel at the bar, to conclude the plaintiff from any proof of the marriage, unleſs he could ſhew that the ſame was repealed: and upon a debate, the court were all of opinion, that this ſentence, whiſt unrepealed, was concluſive againſt all matters precedent; and that the temporal courts muſt give credit to it, until it is reverſed, it being a matter of mere ſpiritual cognizance: and upon this the plaintiff was nonſuited. Your lordſhips may perceive that this caſe is applicable to another part of the buſineſs before your lordſhips; but I cite it now merely to ſhew the ſentence was offered, and received, to preclude the examination of witneſſes; and ſurely if witneſſes are not admiſſible, their testimony ought not to be ſtated.

Mr. Attorney-general. My lords, I do not even now comprehend the order of proceeding propoſed.

If there be any thing in the preſent motion, conſidered as propoſing a fit manner of regulating this trial, or as a point of general law—in ſhort, if their propoſition be maintainable at all—I do aſſure your lordſhips, that I am not anxious, or in any degree deſirous, to ſtate a caſe to this audience which muſt wound the ſenſibility of the priſoner: this I would avoid, unleſs public juſtice, and the neceſſity of the proſecution, ſhould abſolutely require it of me.

If it be poſſible, on her part, to make any ground for ſtopping the proſecution in this manner, I ſhall be well content to ſtop here: to me it appears flatly impossible. I stated some general hints to this effect when I spoke last.

The learned counsel, in attempting to make good their proposition of stopping the trial in this stage, have contented themselves with a general avowment, that the law is with them; and refer to the manner in which evidence was received in the particular case of one ejectment, where no contradiction or controversy appears to have been raised among the counsel about the nature of the cause depending, the sentence produced, or the parties to both. Here, a great deal is to be previously settled on those heads.

I did not imagine the learned counsel would have stopped so shortly: but if they thought well of the motion, I expected they would have gone the length of arguing on it, and of endeavouring to demonstrate the possibility of winding up the whole proceeding here, by comparing the nature of the sentence with the whole compass of the prosecution, stated with every degree of imaginable aggravation.

Your lordships might easily perceive my reason for expecting the argument to take this course. The sentence may be read—indeed it must be read. It is the only ground of the motion. But unless such is demonstrated to be the effect of it, your lordships can take no order upon it, nor make any use or application of it, without hearing the prosecutor's case. It is not therefore enough to read the sentence.

My reason for troubling your lordships at all was only to observe, that the motion concludes against even hearing the prosecutor; and to submit, according to my humble duty, to your lordships, whether that be a point of law fit to hear the prisoner upon by her counsel. If it be, your lordships will call upon the learned counsel whom you have allowed the prisoner, to sustain it fully in argument. Otherwise your lordships will reject it as inadmissible. All prosecutions might be stopped in this manner.

A Lord. Does Mr. Attorney-general object to the reading of the sentence?

Mr. Attorney-general. Subject to the reservation of my right to object to it in every shape, when it shall be offered in evidence: upon that ground I do not object to it. I am not now admitting this sentence to be adduced in the course of the cause, or as a part of the defence, to which I shall say, it is incompetent. But I let it in, to ground a motion anterior to the hearing of the cause. In that view, and in that view only, I admit it to be read. Indeed it seems to be offered as a part of the counsel's speech; and I admit it as containing the whole of the argument, yet offered in support of the motion.

That your lordships may understand what is to be made of this sentence when read, they must read, in their order, the original allegation of Elizabeth Chudleigh; the cross-allegation delivered in by Mr. Hervey; her answer; the articles on which the proofs were taken; the depositions; and the sentence: for thus the sentence proceeded.

Lord Mansfield. They must give in evidence the whole sentence.

(The sentence only begun to be read.)

Mr. Attorney-general. I must trouble your lordships again.

They are now offering to read the sentence only, without reading the allegations of the parties, their articles and proofs. For what reason I very well comprehend. But I apprehend, that, if a judgment be read in a court of law, they must read the declaration, plea, replication, and all other matters leading to the judgment, in order to make it intelligible. Here they would read the sentence, abstractedly from the allegations and other matters upon which that sentence proceeded.

Lord Camden. I wish to know of the counsel for the prisoner, whether they meant to object to the whole proceedings in the justification cause being read.

Mr. Wallace. I have not, upon the part of the noble prisoner, the least objection that all the proceedings should be brought before your lordships. I conceive that what the officer has now brought before the court was what is usually given in evidence in such case. I do not recollect any other, in any case I have found, being produced but the sentence, which states in short the proceedings had in that court; but I understand the proceedings are here; and on the part of the noble prisoner there is not the least objection to the whole being laid before the court.

The lords then permitted the following proceedings in the justification cause, and the sentence pronounced in the Ecclesiastical Court, to be read de bene esse.

SECOND SESSION. Michaelmas-Term 1768.

Chudleigh against Hervey. Libel given the 9th of November 1768. Bishop.

In the name of God, Amen. Before you the worshipful John Bettefworth, doctor of laws, vicar-general of the right reverend father in God Richard, by divine permission, lord bishop of London, and official principal of the consistorial episcopal court of London lawfully constituted, your surrogate, or any other competent judge in this behalf of the proctor of the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, of the parish of Saint Margaret, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex spinster; against the honourable Augustus John Hervey, of the parish of Saint James's, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex and diocese of London, a bachelor; and against any other person or persons lawfully intervening or appearing for him in judgment before you by way of complaint, and hereby complaining unto you in this behalf, doth say, alledge, and in law articulately propound as follows; that is to say,

1. THAT the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh was and is free, and no way engaged in any matrimonial contract or espousals with the said honourable Augustus John Hervey; and for and as a person free, and no way engaged, was and is commonly accounted, reputed, and taken to be, amongst her neighbours, friends, and familiar acquaintance: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound every thing in this article contained jointly and severally.

2. That the said honourable Augustus John Hervey, sufficiently knowing the premises, and notwithstanding the same, did in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-four, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-five, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six, and one thousand seven hundred and sixty-seven, and in the several months therein concurring, and in this present year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight, within the parish of Saint James, Westminster, aforesaid, and in other parishes and places in the neighbourhood thereof and thereto adjoining, or in all, some, or one of the afore-mentioned times and places, in the presence of several credible witnesses, falsely and maliciously boast, assert, and report, that he was married to or contracted in marriage with the aforesaid honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh; whereas in truth and fact not any such marriage was ever solemnized or ever contracted between them: and this was and is true, publick, and notorious; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound of any other time or times and places as shall appear from the proofs to be made in this cause, and as before.

3. That the said honourable Augustus John Hervey hath been oftentimes, or at least once, on the part and behalf of the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, and her friends and acquaintance, asked and requested, or desired to desist and abstain from his aforesaid pretended false and malicious boasting, asserting, and reporting, as mentioned in the next preceding article: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

4. That the said honourable Augustus John Hervey, being as aforesaid asked and requested to cease, desist, and abstain from his aforesaid pretended false and malicious boasting, asserting, and reporting, hath not in the least, nor doth in the least at present, cease, desist, and abstain therefrom, but continually with like malice and rashness does constantly, falsely, and maliciously boast, assert, affirm, and report the same, to the great danger of his soul's health, no small prejudice to the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, and pernicious example of others: and this was and is true, publick, and notorious; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

5. That of all and singular the premises it was and is, by and on the part and behalf of the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, thinking herself greatly injured, aggrieved, and disquieted by reason of the aforesaid pretended false and malicious boasting, asserting, and reporting of the said honourable Augustus John Hervey, rightly and duly complained to you the judge aforesaid, and to this court, for a fit and meet remedy to be had and provided in this behalf: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

6. That the said honourable Augustus John Hervey was and is of the parish of Saint James, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex and diocese of London, and therefore and by reason of the premises was and is subject to the jurisdiction of this court: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

7. That all and singular the premises were and are true, publick, and notorious, and thereof there was and is a public voice, fame, and report, and of which legal proof being made, the party proponent prays right and justice to be effectually done and administered to him and his party in the premises; and also that by this court it may be pronounced, decreed, and declared, that the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh at and during all the times in this libel mentioned was a spinster, and free from all matrimonial contracts and espousals with him the said honourable Augustus John Hervey; and that he, notwithstanding the premises, did, in the years, months, and places in this libel mentioned, or in some or one of them, falsely and maliciously boast, assert, and report, that he was married to, or contracted in marriage with, the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh; and that he may be enjoined perpetual silence in the premises, and obliged and compelled to cease, desist, and abstain from such his aforesaid false and malicious boastings, assertions, and reports for the future; and that he may be condemned in the costs made and to be made in this cause on the part and behalf of the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, and compelled to the due and effectual payment thereof by you or your definitive sentence or final decree to be given in this cause; and further to do and decree in the premises what shall be lawful in this behalf, the party proponent not obliging himself to prove all and singular the premises, or to the burthen of a superfluous proof, against which he protests; and prays, that, so far as he shall prove in the premises, he may obtain in his petition, the benefit of the law being always preserved, humbly imploring the aid of your office in this behalf.

Hervey against Hervey called Chudleigh. Fountain—Bishop.

Which day Fountain, in the name of and as the lawful proctor of the right honourable Augustus John Hervey, and as such, and under that denomination, did, by all ways and means which may be most beneficial and effectual for his said party in this behalf, and to all intents and purposes in law whatsoever, say, alledge, and in law articulately propound as follows; to wit:

1. THAT some time in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-three, or one thousand seven hundred and forty-four, the right honourable Augustus John Hervey, then the honourable Augustus John Hervey, esquire, and son of the right honourable John late lord Hervey, became acquainted with Elizabeth Chudleigh, now Hervey, at Winchester races; and the said honourable Augustus John Hervey, esquire, having conceived conceived a liking and affection for the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, and being a bachelor, and a minor of the age of seventeen or eighteen years, and free from any matrimonial contract, did privately make his addresses of love and courtship to the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, who was then also a minor, and a spinster of the age of about eighteen years, and also free from any matrimonial contract; and she the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, now Hervey, did receive and admit such his addresses and courtship, and entertain him as a suitor to her in the way of marriage, but without the privity or knowledge of either of their relations or friends, excepting her aunt the late Mrs. Hanmer; and they mutually contracted themselves to each other: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound of any other time and place, and of every thing in this article contained jointly and severally.

2. That in the said year one thousand seven hundred and forty-four, the said honourable Augustus John Hervey, esquire, was a lieutenant in the navy, and belonged to his majesty's ship Cornwall, which in August one thousand seven hundred and forty-four lay at Portsmouth; that the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, in July one thousand seven hundred and forty-four, being on a visit at John Merrill's, esquire, at Lainston, in the parish of Sparshot, in the county of Southampton, with her aunt Mrs. Hanmer, and the said Augustus John Hervey, being then on board the said ship the Cornwall at Portsmouth, went from thence to the said Mr. Merrill's in order to see the said Elizabeth Chudleigh; and the said ship being under sailing orders for and being soon to depart for the West-Indies, it was proposed between the said Augustus John Hervey and Mrs. Hanmer, that they the said Augustus John Hervey and Elizabeth Chudleigh should be married privately at the said Mr. Merrill's house; and accordingly they the said Augustus John Hervey and Elizabeth Chudleigh were, on or about the fourth day of August one thousand seven hundred and forty-four, in Mr. Merrill's house in the parish of Sparshot aforesaid, joined together in holy matrimony, about eleven o'clock at night, by the reverend Thomas Amis, since deceased, a clergyman in holy orders, according to the rites and ceremonies of the church of England, in the presence of Mrs. Hanmer, the aunt of her the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, and Mr. Mountney, both since deceased; and were then and there by him the said Thomas Amis pronounced for and as lawful husband and wife: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

3. That after the said Augustus John Hervey and Elizabeth Chudleigh, now Hervey, were so privately married, they consummated such their marriage at the said Mr. Merrill's house, by having the carnal knowledge of each other's bodies, and laying for some time in one and the same bed naked and alone, but without the privity or knowledge of any part of the family and servants of the said Mr. Merrill: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

4. That the said Augustus John Hervey, esquire, continued at the said Mr. Merrill's about two or three days, and then returned to his said ship Cornwall, wherein he in November following sailed for the West-Indies; and that, on account of certain circumstances of his family, it being necessary that the said marriage should be kept a secret from every person, except those before-mentioned, therefore the said Elizabeth Hervey continued to go by the name of Chudleigh when she left the said Mr. Merrill's, residing at different places, and passing for a single person; that the said Augustus John Hervey, esquire, remained in the West-Indies till the month of August in the year one thousand seven hundred and forty-six, when he sailed for England, and landed at Dover on or about the sixteenth of October following; that the said Elizabeth Hervey at that time resided in Conduit-Street, where the said Augustus John Hervey, esquire, went to see her as his wife several times, and she received him and acknowledged him to be her husband, but they did not publicly own their marriage, or cohabit together as husband and wife: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

5. That the said Augustus John Hervey, esquire, on the twenty-eighth day of the month of November in the said year one thousand seven hundred and forty-six, went to sea again, and returned to England in the January following; that the said Elizabeth Hervey otherwise Chudleigh at that time continued in Conduit-Street; but some differences arising between them on account of the conduct of the said Elizabeth Hervey, they continued to live separate from each other for the future; and the said honourable Augustus John Hervey thereupon forbore visiting the said Elizabeth Hervey, and, some time in the month of May one thousand seven hundred and forty-seven, sailed for the Mediterranean sea in the ship called the Princessa, and continued abroad till the month of December in the following year; that from the time they so continued to live separate as aforesaid to this time, the said Augustus John Hervey has never visited the said Elizabeth Hervey: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

6. That all and singular the premises were and are true, publick, and notorious, and therefore there was and is a publick voice, fame, and report, of which legal proof being made, the party proponent prays right and justice to be administered to him and his party in the premises, and that it may be pronounced, that the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey and Elizabeth Chudleigh were and are lawful man and wife.

Geo. Harris.

Consistory of London, FOURTH SESSION of Michaelmas-Term, 6th December 1768.

Chudleigh against Hervey. Bishop—Fountain.

On which day Bishop, in the name of, and as lawful proctor of the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, and as such, and under that denomination, did, by all ways and means which may be most beneficial and effectual in this behalf, and to all intents and purposes in law whatsoever, say, alledge, and articulately propound as follows; to wit:

1. THAT as well before as ever since the pretended time of the pretended marriage pleaded and propounded by the right honourable Augustus John Hervey, the other party in this suit, to have been on or about the fourth of August one thousand seven hundred and forty-four, the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh has always passed as a single woman, and has always gone, been known, and been addressed by the name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, and by no other, and hath always visited and received visits as a single woman, and hath always lived separate and apart from the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey, without any interposition, let, or hindrance of the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey, and hath not at any time lived or cohabited with him, or he with her: and this was and is true; and so much the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey well knows and believes in his conscience to be true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound every thing in this article contained jointly and severally.

2. That in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and forty-three, the said Elizabeth Chudleigh was admitted a maid of honour to her royal highness the princess of Wales; and on the death of his royal highness the prince of Wales, on or about the seventeenth of April one thousand seven hundred and fifty-one, re-admitted and continued maid of honour to her royal highness the princess-dowager of Wales, without any let or hindrance of the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey, and hath during the whole of the said time continued and now continues a maid of honour to her royal highness the princess-dowager of Wales, without any let or hindrance of the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey: and this was and is true; and so much the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey knows and believes in his conscience to be true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

3. That in supply of proof of the premises mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex two certificates, and copies of the entries from the treasurer's office of the princess-dowager of Wales, marked with the letters A and B, of the admission of the said Elizabeth Chudleigh as maid of honour, and of her continuance now in such post, and prays that the same may be here read, and taken as if herein inserted; and doth alledge that the same contain true copies of the entries of the said Elizabeth Chudleigh as maid of honour, and was and is signed by Mr. William Watts, deputy-treasurer to her royal highness the princess-dowager of Wales; and that Elizabeth Chudleigh therein named, and Elizabeth Chudleigh party in this suit, was and is one and the same person, and not divers: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

4. That in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-three, the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, in her own name as a spinster, and without any interposition, let, or hindrance of the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey, or his being a party thereto or any ways concerned therein, took a lease of the right honourable lord Berkeley of Stratton of certain land in Hill-Street, in the parish of St. George, Hanover-Square, in the county of Middlesex, whereon the said Elizabeth Chudleigh caused to be built a house, wherein she continued to live for the space of five years and upwards, and afterwards sold the same to Hugo Meynell, esquire, and received the money proceeding from the sale thereof to her own use: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

5. That in supply of proof of the premises mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex the original lease of the land aforesaid, dated the fourteenth of April one thousand seven hundred and fifty-three, executed by the said lord Berkeley and John Phillips, who was interested therein, and thereby leased to the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, her executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of eighty-seven years, and marked with the letter C, and prays that the same may be here read, and taken as if herein inserted; and doth alledge that every thing was so had and done as is therein contained; and that Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, therein mentioned, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, party in this cause, was and is one and the same person, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

6. That on the third day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven, the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, was admitted a copyholder and tenant to the dean and chapter of Westminster for the house and land, or some part thereof, wherein she now lives, at Knightsbridge, in the county of Middlesex, in her own then and now maiden name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, and without any interposition, let, or hindrance of the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey, or without his being a party thereto or any ways concerned therein: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

7. That in supply of proof of the premises mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inserted, a copy of the court-roll of the said Elizabeth Chudleigh's being admitted tenant to the premises mentioned in the next preceding article, and marked with the letter D; and that Elizabeth Chudleigh therein mentioned, and Elizabeth Chudleigh party in this cause, was and is one and the same person, and not divers: and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

8. That in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-two the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, transacted business with John Butcher in her own maiden name of Chudleigh, and took a lease from the said Mr. Butcher of certain lands situate in the parish of Kensington, in the county of Middlesex, and this without any interposition, let, or hindrance of the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey, or his being a party thereto or any ways concerned therein; and in such lease the said Elizabeth Chudleigh was described by the name of Elizabeth Chudleigh: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

9. That in supply of proof of the premises mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if therein inserted, the said lease mentioned in the preceding article, and marked with the letter E; and doth alledge that every thing was so had and done as therein is contained; and that Elizabeth Chudleigh therein named, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, party in this cause, was and is one and the same person, and not divers: and and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

10. That Mrs. Ann Hanmer, the aunt of the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, the party proponent, and who, in the ſecond article of the pretended allegation admitted on the part of the ſaid right honourable Augustus John Hervey, is pretended to have been preſent at the pretended marriage pleaded by the ſaid Augustus John Hervey, did, in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-two, write a letter with her own hand to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, wherein ſhe addreſſes her as a ſingle woman, therein calling her 'dear Mrs. Chudleigh;' and alſo in or about the year following did make her laſt will and teſtament, and codicil, the codicil not dated, but the will bearing date the eleventh day of June one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-three, and both will and codicil, as well as the letter aforeſaid, are of the hand-writing of the ſaid Mrs. Ann Hanmer, and ſo known to be by perſons who have ſeen her write and ſubſcribe her name to writings, and are well acquainted with her manner and character of hand-writing; and in which will and codicil, proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and now remaining in the regiſtry thereof, the ſaid Mrs. Hanmer hath by the will given a ſilver ſugar-urn and ſpoon, and by her codicil hath given and bequeathed a legacy of one hundred pounds, to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, by the name and deſcription of the honourable Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

11. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, the party propounding doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, the ſaid letter marked with the letter F, beginning thus; 'Sunning-hill, Auguſt the 14th 1762. Dear Mrs. Chudleigh,' and ending, 'I am, dear madam, your ſincere well-wiſher and humble ſervant, A. Hanmer;' and alſo doth exhibit a copy of the ſaid will and codicil of the ſaid Mrs. Hanmer, marked with letter G; and doth alledge that Mrs. Hanmer, the aunt of the party proponent, who wrote the ſaid letter to the ſaid Mrs. Chudleigh, and who made the ſaid will and codicil, and Mrs. Hanmer, whom the ſaid right honourable Augustus John Hervey pretends to have been a witneſs to his pretended marriage, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers; and that Mrs. Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid letter, and the honourable Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid laſt will and codicil, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this cauſe, was and is the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

12. That Mr. Merrill, at whoſe houſe the ſaid right honourable Augustus John Hervey hath pleaded the ſaid pretended marriage to have been ſolemnized, wrote two letters with his own hand, and ſent them by the poſt to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, party in this cauſe, wherein he addreſſes her as a ſingle woman, the ſaid letters being dated Nov. 1ſt, 1765, and Nov. 3d, 1765, written in one ſheet of paper, and ſuperſcribed or directed thus; 'To the honourable Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh, at Chalmington, near Dorcheſter, Dorſet;' and in the letter of the 3d of Nov. 1765 are theſe words, to wit; 'I have added your Chriſtian name to your ſurname in the direction of this, left the word honourable ſhould not be ſufficient to prevent a blunder, and the letter ſhould be given to Mrs. Chudleigh. I have met with ſo many and ſuch groſs blunders, that I think I can never enough guard againſt them;' and the party proponent doth alledge, that by theſe words, 'ſhould be given to Mrs. Chudleigh,' was meant Mrs. Chudleigh, at Chalmington, aunt to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, the party proponent, at whoſe houſe ſhe then was: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

13. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes in the next preceding article mentioned, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, the ſaid two letters mentioned in the next preceding article, the firſt marked with the letter H, beginning thus, 'Lainſtone, November the 1ſt, 1765. Dear madam, tho' I have nothing particular to write to you upon,' and ending thus, 'Tho' had I mentioned it to them, Mrs. Kelly's and Mrs. Elſob's would not have been wanting. I am, dear madam, your moſt obedient humble ſervant, John Merrill;' and the other letter, marked with the letter I, beginning thus, 'November 3d, 1765. Dear madam, the above, as you ſee, was intended to go by the laſt poſt,' and ending thus, 'that I think I can never enough guard againſt them. I am, dear madam, your moſt obedient humble ſervant, John Merrill;' and the party proponent doth alledge and propound that the whole body, ſubſcriptions, and ſuperſcription of the ſaid letters were and are of the proper hand-writing and ſubſcription of the ſaid John Merrill, and ſo known and believed to be by perſons who are well acquainted with his manner and character of hand-writing and ſubſcription; and that by the words, 'I have added your Chriſtian name to your ſurname in the direction of this,' was meant and intended the Chriſtian and ſurname of Elizabeth Chudleigh the party in this ſuit; and that the honourable Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid ſuperſcription, and the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh party in this ſuit, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

14. That the ſaid Mr. Merrill hath alſo in and by his laſt will and teſtament, bearing date the firſt day of January one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-seven, proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and now remaining in the regiſtry thereof, given and bequeathed a legacy or legacies to the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this ſuit, by her then and now maiden name of Elizabeth Chudleigh: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

15. That in ſupply of the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, a copy of the claſe of the will of the ſaid Mr. Merrill, marked with the letter K; and doth alledge that Mr. Merrill at whoſe houſe the pretended marriage pleaded by the ſaid right honourable Augustus John Hervey is ſaid to have been ſolemnized, and Mr. Merrill who made the ſaid will, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers; and that the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid will, and the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this ſuit, was and is alſo one and the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

16. That in the year of our Lord one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-fix, the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh borrowed of Mr. John Drummond, a banker, at divers times, on mortgage and bond ſecurity, in her own name, and without any interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Augustus John Hervey, or his being a party thereto, or his being any ways concerned therein, the ſum of five thouſand one hundred and ſixty pounds, and gave the ſaid Mr. Drummond a bond for one thouſand pounds, part thereof, in her then and now maiden name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, and alſo mortgaged certain premiſes ſituate in the manor of Knightſbridge, in the county of Middleſex, in her ſaid then and now maiden name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, unto the ſaid Mr. Drummond, for the repayment of the ſum of four thouſand one hundred and ſixty pounds to the ſaid Mr. Drummond, as will appear by the original bond and mortgage-deed now in the cuſtody or power of the ſaid Mr. Drummond, to which ſhe refers; and the party proponent doth alledge that Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid bond and mortgage-deed, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this ſuit, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

17. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes mentioned in the next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, the counter-part of the ſaid mortgage-deed, dated the eighteenth of April one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-fix, marked with the letter L; and doth alledge and propound that the ſame was and is the counterpart of the ſaid mortgage-deed remaining in the cuſtody or power of the ſaid Mr. Drummond, as mentioned in the next preceding article; and that Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid bond and mortgage-deed, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this ſuit, was and is the ſame perſon, and not divers: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

18. That in the month of February in the year of our Lord one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-five, and in the month of June one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-eight, the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, borrowed of Mr. William Field, of the Inner-Temple, attorney at law, ſeveral ſums of money, to the amount of the ſum of one thouſand nine hundred pounds, or thereabouts, for which ſhe gave to the ſaid Mr. Field, as ſecurity, two bonds in her own name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, without the interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid Augustus John Hervey, or without his being party thereto, or any ways concerned therein: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

19. That on or about the twenty-fifth of February one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-fix, adminiſtration of the goods, chattels, and credits of Harriot Chudleigh, late of Windſor-Caſtle, in the county of Berks, widow, deceased, the mother of the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, party in this ſuit, was granted to the ſaid William Field, as the attorney and for the uſe and benefit of Elizabeth Chudleigh, deſcribed in the ſaid adminiſtration, and in the records of the Prerogative-Court of Canterbury, by the name and deſcription of Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, the natural and lawful daughter and only child of the ſaid Harriot Chudleigh deceased, without the interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Augustus John Hervey, or without his being party thereto, or any ways concerned therein: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

20. That in ſupply of proof of the premiſes in the next preceding article mentioned, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, a copy of the adminiſtration-aſt entered on record in the ſaid Prerogative-Court of Canterbury, and ſigned by the deputy-regiſtrars of the ſaid court, or one of them, marked with the letter M; and doth alledge that Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, therein mentioned, and Elizabeth Chudleigh, ſpinſter, party in this cauſe, was and is one and the ſame perſon: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

21. That the ſaid Mr. William Field, as the attorney of the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, and by virtue of a letter of attorney from her for that purpoſe, given in her name of Elizabeth Chudleigh to him, uſed to receive her ſalary as maid of honour, without any interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Augustus John Hervey: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

22. That on or about the fifth day of May one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-fix, the ſaid Elizabeth Chudleigh, party in this ſuit, preſented, in her own name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, by virtue of a preſentation ſigned by her for that purpoſe, the reverend Mr. John Julian junior, to the living of Hartford, in the county of Devon, who was in virtue of the ſaid preſentation duly inſtituted and inducted to the ſaid living, without any interpoſition, let, or hindrance of the ſaid right honourable Augustus John Hervey, or his being a party thereto, or any ways concerned therein: and that this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

23. That in ſupply of the proof of the premiſes mentioned in the ſaid next preceding article, the party proponent doth exhibit and hereunto annex, and prays may be here read and taken as if herein inſerted, an authentic copy of the ſaid preſentation marked with the letter N, ſigned by the ſaid reverend Mr. John Julian to the ſaid rectory of Hartford, ſigned by Richard Burn, notary-publick, ſecretary to the lord biſhop of Exeter, and marked with the letter O; and doth alledge that Elizabeth Chudleigh mentioned in the ſaid preſentation and certificate, and Elizabeth Chudleigh party in this cauſe, was and is one and the ſame perſon, and not divers: and

and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

24. That the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, for many years subsequent to the pretended time of the pretended marriage aforesaid, kept a current account of cash with the Bank of England in her name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, and as a single woman; and also in all common as well as other occurrences of buyings and sellings, and other money matters, whenever occasion happened, the said Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, party in this suit, hath, as well before as ever since the pretended time of the pretended marriage pleaded by the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey, constantly in her own name of Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, transacted such business, by paying and receiving money, giving and taking receipts for the same, hiring and discharging servants, and on all other occasions, without the interposition, let, or hindrance of the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey, or his being any ways concerned therein: and this was and is true; and the party proponent doth alledge and propound as before.

25. That all and singular the premises were and are true, and so forth.

Chudleigh against Hervey. — Sentence read and promulged the 10th of February 1769.

IN the name of God, Amen. We John Bettefworth, doctor of laws, vicar-general of the right reverend father in God Richard, by divine permission, lord bishop of London, and official principal of the consistorial and episcopal court of London, having seen, heard, and understood, and fully and maturely discussed the merits and circumstances of a certain cause of justification of marriage which was lately controverted, and as yet remains undetermined before us in judgment, between the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, of the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, spinster, the party, agent, and complainant, of the one part, and the right honourable Augustus John Hervey, of the parish of St. James, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex and diocese of London, bachelor, falsely calling himself the husband of the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, the party accused and complained of, on the other part; and we rightly and duly proceeding therein, and the parties aforesaid lawfully appearing before us by their proctors respectively, and the proctor of the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh praying sentence to be given and justice to be done to his party, and the proctor of the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey also earnestly praying sentence and justice to be done to his said party; and we having carefully looked into and duly considered of the whole proceedings had and done before us in the said cause, and observed by law what ought to be observed in this behalf, have thought fit and do thus think fit to proceed to the giving and promulging our definitive sentence or final decree in this same cause, in manner and form following (to wit):

Forasmuch as, by the acts enacted, alledged, exhibited, propounded, proved, and confessed in this cause, we have found and clearly discovered, that the proctor of the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh hath fully and sufficiently founded and proved his intention deduced in a certain libel and allegation and other pleadings and exhibits given in, exhibited, and admitted on her behalf in this same cause, and now remaining in the registry of this court (which libel and allegation and other pleadings and exhibits we take and will have taken as if herein repeated and inserted for us to pronounce as herein after we shall pronounce); and that nothing, at least effectual in law, hath on the part and behalf of the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey been excepted, deduced, exhibited, propounded, proved, or confessed in this same cause, which may or ought in any wise to defeat, prejudice, or weaken the intention of the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh deduced as aforesaid; and particularly that the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey hath totally failed in the proof of his allegation given in and admitted in this cause, whereby he pleaded and propounded a pretended marriage to have been solemnized between him and the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster: and therefore we John Bettefworth, doctor of laws, the judge aforesaid, first calling upon God and setting him alone before our eyes, and having heard counsel in this cause, do pronounce, decree, and declare, that the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh at and during all the time mentioned in the said libel given in and admitted in this cause, and now remaining in the registry of this court, was and now is a spinster, and free from all matrimonial contracts or espousals (as far as to us as yet appears) more especially with the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey; and that the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey, notwithstanding the premises, did in the years and months libellate wickedly and maliciously boast and publicly assert (though falsely) that he was contracted in marriage to the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, or that they were joined or contracted together in matrimony: wherefore we do pronounce, decree, and declare, that perpetual silence must and ought to be imposed and enjoined the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey as to the premises libellate, which we do impose and enjoin him by these presents; and we do decree the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey to be admonished to desist from his boasting and asserting that he was contracted to or joined with the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh in matrimony as aforesaid; and we do also pronounce, decree, and declare, that the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey ought by law to be condemned in lawful expences made or to be made in this cause on the part and behalf of the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, to be paid to the said Elizabeth Chudleigh or her proctor; and accordingly we do condemn him in such expences, which we tax at and moderate to the sum of one hundred pounds of lawful money of Great-Britain, besides the expence of a monition for payment on this behalf by this our definitive sentence or final decree, which we read and promulge by these presents.

J. Bettefworth.

This sentence was read, promulged, and given by the within-named the vicar-general and official principal on Friday the tenth day of February in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine, in the dining-room adjoining to the common-hall of Doffers-Commons, situate within the parish of St. Benedict, near Paul's Wharf, London, there being then and there present the witnesses specified in the acts of court, which I attest.

Mark Holman, notary-publick, deputy-register.

Mr. Wallace.

Your lordships are now possessed of a sentence given by the consistory court of the bishop of London in a cause instituted there to try a claim made by Mr. Hervey of marriage with the noble prisoner; your lordships find by that sentence the claim examined, and the decree pronounced upon the allegations and the evidence given in the cause; by which decree the noble prisoner at the bar is declared free from all matrimonial contracts and espousals with Mr. Hervey.

My lords, the noble prisoner by the indictment is charged, subsequent to this supposed marriage to Mr. Hervey, to have married the late duke of Kingston.

It is for me now to submit to your lordships, that this sentence is conclusive as long as it remains in force, and that of necessity it must be received in evidence in all courts and in all places where the subject of that marriage can become a matter of dispute.

My lords, I don't know any court which the constitution of this kingdom has placed the decisions of the rights of marriage in but the ecclesiastical: I believe it will not be contended, that the common-law courts of this country have any such original jurisdiction. Marriages may indeed incidentally come to be discussed and determined in the courts of common law, and in many cases absolutely necessary to the due administration of justice; but, my lords, it will not be found, that where the proper forum has given a decision upon the point, the common-law courts have ever taken upon themselves to examine into the grounds, or at all question the validity, of that sentence.

My lords, as far as we have books to resort to, we find instances from the earliest times down to the present, where the power of the ecclesiastical courts is in terms recognized by the common-law courts, and where their decisions have been considered as conclusive upon every question in which they have jurisdiction, and especially in cases like the present, particularly belonging to them.

My lords, I don't know in the common-law courts any instance where the legality of marriage can come directly in question, that the courts have decided upon it without referring to the bishop, the ordinary of the place, to certify; unless the marriage has been decided by a suit instituted in the Ecclesiastical Courts.

Your lordships will permit me to refer your lordships to those authorities of law which are to be found in our books; and by the able assistance which your lordships indulgence has given the prisoner at the bar, you will more particularly have explained the nature of the proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts, how far and to what purposes in those courts they are conclusive, and where they are open to such litigation. I shall beg to refer your lordships to a case reported by lord chief justice Coke, in the fourth part of his Reports, by the name of Bunting and Addingshall. In the 27th year of the reign of Elizabeth, there was a marriage between one Thomas Tweede and one Agnes Addingshall, and subsequent to this marriage a person of the name of Bunting libelled against the wife of Tweede, claiming under a pre-contract, and the Spiritual Court enforced that contract: afterwards, on the death of Bunting, a question arose between the issue of the second marriage and the collateral relations of Bunting; the collateral relations insisting that the second marriage was utterly void, because there had existed a first marriage, and the husband living at the time of the second. Another objection I shall state to your lordships was, that though it might be conclusive between the parties, yet Tweede the first husband being no party to the suit, nor to the sentence which dissolved the marriage between them in the Ecclesiastical Court, it could not affect him, nor indeed any body but the parties: the resolution of the court was, that he being then de facto the husband, though he was not a party to the suit, nor in the Ecclesiastical Court, yet the sentence against the wife should bind the husband de facto; and 'forasmuch as the cognizance of the right of marriage belongs to the Ecclesiastical Court, and the same court has given sentence in this case, the judges of our law ought (although it be against the reason of our law) to give faith and credit to their proceedings and sentences, and to think that their proceedings are consonant to the law of holy church, for cuiuslibet in suo arte perito credendum est; and so the issue of the first marriage, in consequence and upon the credit of the sentence, were considered as legitimate.' My lord chief justice Coke has also reported another case upon the subject of marriage in the 40th year of queen Elizabeth, which your lordships will find in the seventh part of his Reports, page 41, by the name of Kenn's case, which is shortly this: — Christopher Kenn, esquire, married Elizabeth Stewall, and had issue; afterwards the Ecclesiastical Court pronounced a sentence of divorce between Mr. Kenn and the lady, who were not of the age of consent at the time of the marriage; and in consequence of this sentence he married a second wife: the issue of the first marriage, claiming the inheritance, exhibited a bill in the court of Wards of that day, in order to have the benefit of the succession; and offered to prove, that though the sentence had been given in the Ecclesiastical Court on the ground of his father and mother being within the age of consent, yet that they were above the age of consent; that in truth they had cohabited together for eight or nine years, and had issue of that marriage. There could be no doubt, if the matter was open to examination, that the first marriage was effectual: for, in the first place, the parties were above the age of consent, and if they had been under the age of consent, yet their cohabitation together after that age, and more especially as they had issue, would have been sufficient to establish the marriage. It was argued too, that it was open to examination, because both the statute and common law of the country take notice of the age of consent; and therefore it was equally competent to a court of common law to examine into the question, as to an ecclesiastical court. It was further urged, that the question related to an inheritance of which the Ecclesiastical Court had no jurisdiction or controul, and therefore it was a question properly before a court of common law: but the court then conceived themselves so far bound by the decision of the Ecclesiastical Court, though founded on false suggestion, that they held the plaintiff in that cause not intitled to any relief.

My lords, I beg leave to trouble your lordships with the words of the court upon that subject: after stating the reasons, the book proceeds:

‘But it was resolved by all the justices’ (for it was a reference to the two chief justices, to two other justices, to the chief baron, and two other barons) ‘that the sentence should conclude as long as it remained in force.’ And, my lords, the reasons given are, ‘that the ecclesiastical judge has sentenced the contract and marriage to be void and of no effect; and although they were of the age of consent, yet if the original contract was void and of no effect, then there was just cause of divorce; and if the marriage had been within the age of consent, the ecclesiastical judge is judge as well of the assent as of the first contract, and what shall be a sufficient assent or not; and although the ecclesiastical judge shews the cause of his sentence, yet forasmuch as he is judge of the original matter, that is, of the lawfulness of the marriage, we will never examine the cause, whether it be true or false; for of things the cognizance whereof belongs to the Ecclesiastical Court, we ought to give credit to their sentences, as they give to the judgments in our courts.’

Your lordships find here a case where, according to the facts stated, there was no doubt of the validity of the first marriage, and of the legitimacy of the issue claiming in that cause; and if there had been no sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court, no doubt could have existed of the right of succession; but the sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court having interposed, the court of common law conceived themselves absolutely bound, nay, that they had no right to look into the cause of that sentence, for it was a matter originally of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and they must give faith and credit to the sentence of the ecclesiastical judge in that cause. Your lordships will find that my lord chief justice Coke cited a case so long ago as the 22d of Edward the fourth, where the same doctrine was laid down in the Ecclesiastical Court having a complete and decisive jurisdiction upon this point.

My lords, these cases, from the reporter and from the judges who determined them, the reporter being one, I take to be of the highest authority, and acknowledging those principles which occur frequently in the books, though not under solemn decisions, but as the received opinions of judges and of lawyers from the earliest of times.

My lords, I did before mention to your lordships a case from Carthew; I shall not state it particularly now, but only to the point which we are now upon, that is, of the sentence being conclusive.

My lords, this was not, as supposed in the argument, a nisi prius opinion, which every judge must give with the information he carries with him, and without the assistance of the rest of the judges of the court, but a solemn decision in trial at bar in the court of King’s Bench in the fourth of king William, when I think lord chief justice Holt presided in that court: it was too upon a sentence of jactitation of marriage, which your lordships have now before you, which was there held to be conclusive evidence, and that no testimony whatever ought to be received against it. Your lordships will take the words of the court upon that occasion: ‘upon the debate, the court were all of opinion, that this sentence whilst unrepealed was conclusive against all matters precedent; and that the temporal courts must give credit to it until it is reversed, being a matter of mere spiritual cognizance.’

Your lordships find, that in the reign of king William, that notion which had from all time prevailed was as strong as ever, and that the judges of the court of King’s Bench, in which it was tried, were all clearly of opinion, that a case like the present of jactitation of marriage was conclusive upon the point, till it was reversed or repealed.

My lords, the same doctrine is laid down by my lord chief justice Holt, who presided at the trial of this cause, in a case reported in Salkeld, 290, by the name of Blackham’s case: it turns upon the claim of property in the goods of a woman deceased. The plaintiff proved the goods to be in his possession, and to be taken away by the defendant. Against this claim of the plaintiff, the defendant shewed that these were the goods of one Jane Blackham in her life-time, and that the defendant had taken out letters of administration to her, and so was intitled to the goods. Upon this the plaintiff proved, that some few days before her death she was actually married to him; and in answer to that it was insisted, that the Spiritual Court had determined the right to be in the defendant; for they could not have granted administration to the defendant but upon a supposition that there was no such marriage; and that this sentence being a matter within their jurisdiction was conclusive, and could not be gain said as in evidence. My lord chief justice Holt, who was the judge sitting at nisi prius, who determined the case I last cited, says thus: ‘a matter which has been directly determined by their sentence cannot be gain said; their sentence is conclusive in such cases, and no evidence shall be admitted to prove the contrary; but then it must be in point directly tried.’

My lords, the sentence before your lordships at present is in a cause, where the object of the prosecution was to question the claim of marriage, and where the marriage is the point directly tried and determined; so that according to lord Holt’s opinion, if the sentence be directly upon the question, it is so conclusive, that it is not competent for any court of common law to examine into the matter, or receive any evidence to contradict it.

My lords, these are cases as far as have happened in the courts of law.

I shall now trouble your lordships with a case determined in the house of lords, under the name of Hatfield and Hatfield: it came on before the house of lords in the year 1725. The case, as collected from the printed cases of the times, is thus:—one Leonard Hatfield married Jane Porter, who had different names I see assigned her, and by his will made a provision for her as his wife. In March, 1720, she filed a bill in the court of Exchequer, in Ireland, where the subject of her provision lay, against Leonard Hatfield, a son by a former wife, and against a trustee, to have the benefit of the provision. In January following the defendant, the son and heir of her husband, having discovered that she had been before married to one Porter, which Porter was then living, he procured a release of part of the provision from Porter, and filed a cross-bill for a discovery of the marriage, and to stay the proceedings upon her bill. In this cross-bill he questioned her upon her marriage to Porter: she denied that she had ever gone by the name of Porter; but with respect to a marriage with Porter, she pleaded that she ought not to make a discovery, because it tended to criminate herself; and being an accusation of bigamy against her, the plea by the rules of the court of equity was of course allowed, that court never compelling persons to discover on oath crimes which may be the subject of prosecution against themselves.

My lords, however by the plea one pretty plainly discovers, that there was reason to suppose she was the wife—indeed she knew it—it was capable of proof, and would be proved in the cause.

My lords, they proceeded to the examination of the witnesses, and clear evidence was given that this woman was the wife of Porter: Porter himself had confessed it in his answer, and he had stated the minister and the witnesses who were present at the marriage; so that he gave Hatfield, the heir at law, an opportunity of bringing direct proof of the marriage from the very persons present. This woman, finding that she would be pressed by that proof, had recourse to the Ecclesiastical Court: she instituted a suit against this Porter of jactitation of marriage, pending the cause; and after depositions taken, though not published, she got Porter over to her interest. He was willing to defeat that release which he had given; and therefore he does not enter into proof, but appears by a proctor for form sake, that a judgment might pass against him. Upon this the ecclesiastical judge decreed, as in all causes of jactitation they do where they find that there is no marriage, that the party libelling was free from all matrimonial contracts and espousals with Porter. In this case Porter had given a release, as her husband had upon oath, in the court of Exchequer in Ireland, stated the marriage with precision, even named the minister and the witnesses at the marriage, yet in the Ecclesiastical Court he appears by a proctor, and has sentence passed against him, without insisting on the marriage or any defence. The court of Exchequer in Ireland received this sentence as conclusive against the marriage with Porter; they conceived they were bound to give credit to the Ecclesiastical Court. The plaintiff in the cause, knowing in what manner he had been deceived, that in truth Porter was the husband of this woman, appealed to the house of lords in England. The house of lords here conceived, as the court of Exchequer had done, that the matter was determined by a competent jurisdiction; and yet your lordships see there was fraud upon the face of the proceedings, if it had been competent to the court to have entered into that consideration: but the house of lords here conceived the matter at an end whilst the sentence remained in force, and the decree of the court of Exchequer was affirmed. Upon the pleading this sentence, the court of Exchequer in the first instance, the house of lords in the last, proceeded to determine the matter. It is so taken notice of by sir John Strange, in a case I shall presently mention. It is taken notice of by a very laborious compiler of the law, Mr. Viner: under his title of Marriage, he mentions the ground of the determination thus:—the legality of marriage shall never be agitated in equity, especially after sentence in the Spiritual Court in a cause of jactitation of marriage, although the proceedings in the Spiritual Court were only faint and collusive.

My lords, I take this to be a case of the greatest authority, a decision of the house of peers in this country; and upon a point of jactitation of marriage, a sentence of the same nature with the present before your lordships.

I shall beg leave to trouble your lordships with a case of two more upon the subject, which are of more modern times: one is reported by sir John Strange in the second part of his Reports, 960, under the name of Clews and Bathurst. The action was for maliciously procuring the plaintiff’s wife to exhibit articles of the peace against him, and for living with her in adultery: the plaintiff proved the marriage by the parson and a woman, and also a consummation; to encounter which, the defendant produced a sentence of the Consistory Court of London, in a cause of jactitation of marriage brought by the woman against the plaintiff, wherein she was declared free from all contract, and perpetual silence imposed upon the plaintiff; which sentence was pronounced since the issue had been joined in the cause; and the chief justice ruled this to be conclusive evidence till reversed by appeal, and the plaintiff was non-suited. Your lordships find here was a cause rightly brought, clear proof of the marriage made at the trial by the witnesses present, no doubt of the fact, but the production of a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court in disaffirmance of that marriage; a sentence of jactitation. The chief justice who tried the cause considered the business as concluded; that it was of no consequence when the decision was made; if the moment before the trial, it was enough, being by a court having the proper and the sole jurisdiction of the matter, and whose opinion must be decisive; and therefore, though the cause had been brought before any suit instituted in the Ecclesiastical ecclesiastical Court, though there was no doubt of the foundation for that cause, yet the sentence is permitted to have effect, and to non-suit that plaintiff who had been injured in the manner the case states.

My lords, there was too, at the same sittings, another case which is reported in the following page by sir John Strange, of Da Costa and Villa Real, which was an action upon a contract of marriage, per verba de futuro, brought by the gentleman against the lady, who pleaded the usual pica non assumpti. When the plaintiff had opened his case, the defendant offered in evidence a sentence of the Spiritual Court in a cause of contract, where the judge had pronounced against the suit for a solemnization in the face of the church, and declared Mrs. Villa Real free from all contract: and the chief justice held this to be proper and conclusive evidence; that it was a cause within their jurisdiction; that the nature of the contract was properly examinable by them; and therefore, as a point determined, he non-suited the plaintiff in that cause, though the plaintiff there opened, and was ready to have proved, the fact of the marriage before the court; but the sentence having interposed, the court conceived they were to pay that credit which every court before had done in Westminster-Hall, which all judges in every age had done to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction in cases within their jurisdiction; and finding himself concluded by that, defeated the plaintiff of the effect of this suit. My lords, it was in this case that the case of Hatfield and Hatfield was quoted as an authority.

My lords, these are cases upon the very points of marriage, and many of them your lordships find upon the effect and force and conclusion of a sentence similar to that now under consideration, that of a jactitation cause. My lords, this has been more recently and within our own memory understood to be law, recognized to the law, and decided accordingly. It is not long ago since an action was brought against the honourable Mr. Thomas Hervey, by a tradesman, to recover a debt for necessities found for his wife. On that trial the marriage was proved to the satisfaction of the jury, and the defendant found liable to pay for those necessities. Mr. Hervey instituted a suit, in the consistory court of the bishop of London, of jactitation, and he was declared free from all espousals and contracts of marriage with the lady. During the continuance of this sentence, though appealed from, another creditor brought an action against Mr. Hervey, and had to produce in evidence the same witnesses who had proved the case of the other creditor before any sentence had been obtained, and had succeeded; but the learned chief justice who tried that cause, conceived it was not then open to examination; that though, in the first instance, when the cause of the first creditor came to be discussed, there was no sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court, and of necessity the court of common law must decide upon the marriage; but there had then intervened a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court, which, whilst in force, was conclusive; and of course dismissed the plaintiff's claim; and the intent of that appeal was to suspend and reverse that sentence; yet while it stood unreversed it was conclusive, the fact of marriage was open to no examination in any court whatsoever. This is only an affirmation of the principles of the law, and the doctrine found in the determinations of a thousand cases which the books furnish.

My lords, it is not peculiar to the case of marriage; it is the same in other instances where the ecclesiastical courts have the jurisdiction; it is so in the probate of wills, it is so in the granting of letters of administration: if a will is forged, if a will is fraudulently obtained of a personal estate, of which the Ecclesiastical Court has the jurisdiction; if that court has granted a probate, it is not open to a court of common law, it is not open to a court of equity, to enter into the fraud made use of in obtaining the will, or to the forgery committed upon a testator. I shall refer your lordships to a case or two upon that head: that of Noel and Wells, in first Levinz's Reports 235, in the 19th of king Charles the second; it was an action brought by the executrix of the husband, and upon the trial the plaintiff produced the probate of the will in evidence. The defendant insisted the will was forged; and the chief justice before whom it was tried was of opinion, he could not give such evidence directly against the seal of the ordinary, in any things within his jurisdiction: upon which a case was made for the opinion of the court, and a verdict was for the plaintiff, and the court held that the chief justice at the trial had done right in rejecting the evidence of the forgery, that no such evidence ought to be given till the probate was repealed: they might indeed, by proving the seal of the ordinary forged, have relief; but if the seal of the ordinary was genuine, then whatever forgery or fraud was committed, it was not open to the examination of a common-law court.

My lords, the same doctrine is to be found in the case of Bransby and Kerriek and others, which was determined by the house of lords. It was stated in that case, that one Robert Bransby, the complainant's son, being intitled to the reversion of a freehold and copyhold estate expectant upon the death of the complainant, made his will, by which he gave all his real and personal estate to the defendant Kerriek, and made him his executor, who proved the will in the Ecclesiastical Court, in common form: afterwards, in a contest in the Ecclesiastical Court touching the validity of that will, a sentence was given in favour of the will in the year 1716. Bransby, the father, filed a bill in Chancery, to set aside the will for fraud and imposition. Witnesses were examined, and many acts and circumstances of imposition were proved upon the defendant. The cause came to be heard before lord Macclesfield, then chancellor, upon the 14th of November 1718, when his lordship, struck with the monstrous fraud and iniquity of the transaction, declared the executor should stand as a trustee for the next of kin. Upon appeal, the house of lords reversed the decree, upon the ground that it was not competent to a court of equity to examine into fraud and imposition in a will touching personal estate; that the court of ecclesiastical jurisdiction had decided that point; that it was no longer open to discussion.

My lords, the same rules obtain with respect to every court of competent jurisdiction, whether foreign or domestick: we give credit to the decisions of all foreign courts in points within their proper jurisdiction, and do not examine into the facts, but are concluded by the sentence. I will only refer your lordships to a case in Sir Thomas Raymond's Reports 473. In the war between the Dutch and the French in the time of Charles the second, a ship was seized by the French as a Dutch ship, and condemned. The ship being in truth English, the purchaser under the French condemnation, brought the ship into England, where the right owner seized her: upon this an action was brought by the purchaser under the condemnation. The defendant, the original owner, offered to prove his property, and that the ship was never a Dutch ship, nor was liable to be taken and condemned by the French: but what said the court? We must give credit to the condemnation of the court in France; we are forced to give credit to and believe that this ship was in the condition of a Dutch ship, and subject to a condemnation: and, upon the ground, that if a court of competent jurisdiction gives a sentence, all other courts must be bound by it; the Englishman was precluded from asserting his right: It was the same upon a case of an insurance, which will occur to some of your lordships, where the ship was warranted Swedish, and condemned in the war between England and France: the parties were concluded from insisting that the ship is any longer Swedish or a neutral, because a court of competent jurisdiction had decided the matter. The same law holds in respect to the courts of Admiralty: whether prize or not prize, belongs to the court of Admiralty; jurisdiction of that court decides upon the subject; though they have given a wrong decision, though the facts did not warrant it, though the judge has done it corruptly, yet it is a sentence which the common-law courts must be bound by, wherever it comes in litigation here: and I have known, in point of experience, in an action of trespass brought here for seizing a ship, where it has been before a court of Admiralty and received a decision, that the court of common law no longer entertains the cause, for the question of prize or not prize is peculiarly belonging to the admiralty jurisdiction, and you give faith and credit to that jurisdiction. I might refer your lordships too (but the cases are innumerable upon the subject) to that of Burroughs and Jamineau, in Strange, 233, which was upon a bill of exchange, where, by a peculiar local custom within Leghorn, it is competent to the acceptor of a bill, by a judgment of the court, to have his acceptance annulled, if the drawer becomes bankrupt before the bill be payable. There is no such law in this country; yet, giving credit to the sentence of that court, the court of Chancery here would not send it to a trial at law, but determined upon the point, that the sentence in that court was decisive upon the subject, it being a matter within their jurisdiction.

My lords, in almost every case where judgments or records of other courts have been the subject of discussion, the sentences of the Ecclesiastical Court have always been cited and argued from as conclusive upon the subject of dispute, and the courts have uniformly adopted those cases as law; but the attempt has ever been to distinguish cases immediately before the court from those determined by the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Your lordships will find much of that in the case of Philips and Burry, in Skinner, 468.

My lords, there was a very late case determined in the court of Common-Pleas, and which is now got into print, reported by Mr. Sergeant Wilson, which is Biddulph and Atherton. It arose upon a question of claim by the duke of Norfolk to all wreck within the cape of Bramber, rape. in Suffex, which was proved by many records: it was a question whether those records were admissible, or, if admissible, were conclusive evidence. The counsel who argued in favour of those records and the conclusion which was to arise from them, compared them to the case of ecclesiastical sentences, and would gladly have brought those records within that rule. The court in that case acknowledged the argument proper with respect to the ecclesiastical courts. The court admitted that the sentence of an ecclesiastical court, in a matter whereof they have the sole cognizance, is conclusive evidence, and parole evidence shall never be received. My lords, there is a manuscript note in being of what the judges particularly said; and I find it was cited, as one of the instances where the sentence was conclusive, by the learned chief justice who then presided in the court: he says, if there is a sentence in an ecclesiastical court declaring a marriage—for instance, if it could be proved by a hundred witnesses that the parties were never within 500 miles of each other, that evidence is not to be received, but the judgment of the Ecclesiastical Court is conclusive upon the point. In many of the cases I have cited to your lordships, the question came directly before the court, and received a solemn discussion: in some the doctrine has been recognized; in none, nor in any case that I know of, has it ever been doubted. My lords, though the cases respect civil suits, I trust that no real ground of distinction can be made between criminal and civil proceedings: in civil suits, courts go as far as possible to relieve claims founded in equity and justice; in criminal cases, the leaning is always to the defendants; and therefore I should conceive such evidence stronger, in a criminal prosecution, in favour of innocence.

My lords, I will take the liberty, however, of reminding your lordships of two or three cases in criminal law, where the same doctrine has been established, and the acts of the Ecclesiastical Court deemed conclusive upon the subject, until reversed by appeal. My lords, in the first volume of sir John Strange's Reports, 481, your lordships will find a case that happened at the Old-Bailey in the 8th of George the first; it was an indictment for forging a will of a personal estate. On the trial, the forgery was proved; but the defendant producing a probate, that was held to be conclusive evidence in support of the will, and the defendant was acquitted. This your lordships see was a prosecution for a very serious offence indeed; a prosecution for the forgery of a will: the forgery is stated to have been actually proved at the trial; but upon the production of a probate from the Ecclesiastical Court, whose decisions are final and conclusive upon such subjects, the defendant was acquitted, and the evidence of the forgery rejected. It ought not to have been received, if that circumstance of the probate had been discovered sooner to the court; but the defendant, perhaps conceiving that there could be no evidence to affect him with the guilt of forgery, withheld the probate; whatever might be the reason, it is immaterial, he produced it in time to save himself; for you must receive a probate in the Ecclesiastical Court against the testimony of ten thousand witnesses.

Your lordships will find the same doctrine in the same book, 1st fir John Strange's Reports, in the case of King and Roberts, where that defendant exhibited a will in Dollors-Commons, as executor, and demanded probate; after long contest, it was determined in favour of the plaintiff; and upon an appeal to the Delegates, this sentence was confirmed; after the sentence, the parties who had brought it about fell out amongst themselves, and discovered that the will which had been proved was a forgery. The manner of giving relief was to grant a commission of review; but the person who had been disappointed and injured by this forgery, also preferred a bill of indictment against the persons concerned in the act of forgery. The chief justice refused to try the cause whilst the sentence was in force, but insisted that it should stand off till the sentence was laid out of the case by the decision of the commissioners under that commission of review. My lords, in this your lordships find the doctrine recognized in the strongest manner.

The next case, which came before the court of King's Bench, is the King and Gardell. It was an indictment prosecuted by Mr. Crawford, a fellow-commoner of Queen's College, for assault upon him. At the trial of the indictment, the defendant, who had acted by the orders of the college, produced the acts of the college by which Mr. Crawford was expelled. He came into the garden of the college afterwards with an intent to take possession of his rooms, and the officer of the college took hold of him, and conducted him out of the limits of the college; and this was the assault in that indictment, and which was in point of law an assault; and unless the defendant had a defence, or an excuse for his acts, he must have been found guilty. The act of expulsion was given in evidence. An offer was made by Mr. Crawford to prove the invalidity of those acts, that by the constitution of this college more persons were necessary to concur in an act of expulsion than had been present at that time, and other objections were made to the validity of those acts. The learned judge, before whom that cause came to be tried, conceived himself concluded upon this subject; that as the college had the sole jurisdiction of the cause, their decision was conclusive upon him; and it did not signify upon what grounds they had gone, for the effect of their judgment was an excuse of the defendant, and so long as it remained unimpeached, and unreversed in the proper course, there could be no doubt but it furnished protection to the defendant, or, to speak more properly, a defence against this indictment. This doctrine not being satisfactory to the gentleman, he brought the business before the court of King's Bench; and that court were unanimously of opinion, that the court had done right at the trial of the cause to reject all evidence upon the ground of these acts of expulsion; that the acts themselves, being within the jurisdiction of the college, were sufficient for the defendant to avail himself of; and that it was not competent to the prosecutor of that indictment to shew to the court that these were not regularly or orderly done, or that they were invalid in any respect whatsoever. My lords, in that case the general doctrine was recognized, that in all courts of competent jurisdiction their acts, however wrong they are, yet while they remain in force, are conclusive upon every other court: the cases of ecclesiastical sentences, and many others, were then mentioned.

I might refer your lordships memory to the cases in Exchequer seizures, where condemnations are given constantly without a defence almost, and yet all other courts are concluded by them. It has been thought so extremely hard a doctrine, that judges have wished for the liberty of examining into the fact, and to have the matter fully discussed in the courts; yet when the matter came to be fully argued, the result has ever been, that the judgment has been found conclusive upon all other courts whatever.

My lords, under these authorities for a succession of ages, I confidently rest that your lordships will, in the present cause, conceive the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court now produced, in a case clearly within their jurisdiction, in a case in which they have the sole jurisdiction, to be conclusive; no courts whatever have a direct cognizance of marriage but the Ecclesiastical Court. Suppose a person without any grounds whatever claims a marriage; it may be highly injurious to the lady; she has no remedy but by resorting to an ecclesiastical court, because there is no other court that can bring the matter immediately and directly in question: if a woman separate from her lawful husband, what court is there to compel her to cohabit with him but the censure of the Ecclesiastical Court? It is that forum which the constitution of this country has intrusted with the decision of the legality of marriages.

As there are not to be found, in common-law or ecclesiastical courts, any decision contrary to those I have, with great deference, already submitted to your lordships consideration, I trust your lordships will give that determination upon the validity and effect of this sentence, which courts of law have ever done, when a sentence of the same kind has been a matter of discussion.

My lords, I am also to trouble your lordships in support of that sentence, which has been offered to you as conclusive upon the present occasion. The sentence having been read to your lordships, you are now apprized of the contents of it. The proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court of which the noble lady at the bar hopes to avail herself, begin, as your lordships have heard, by a complaint on her part, that Mr. Hervey did, before that suit was commenced, improperly and without ground lay claim to her as his wife; in other words, in the language used in that court, that he did jactitate that the lady was his wife. The suit being thus begun, the next proceeding in it is in the common way, where a person thus called upon means to insist upon a marriage. The defendant in the suit admits that he did claim the lady as his wife, and contends that he had a right to do so, because he was lawfully married to her. Such being his allegation, her ladyship's answer to it is, that there is no foundation for his claim; that she is not, that she never was his wife; and she states in the allegations made by her, which your lordships have heard, a great variety of particulars during a very long period of her life, in which in the most public manner, and upon the most important occasions, she was universally reputed, received, and acted as a single woman. After this allegation of hers, the next proceeding was to examine a great variety of witnesses, upon the result of whose testimony follows that which is the important part of the business, that is, the sentence of the ecclesiastical judge; which sentence pronounces in the same way in this as in all other suits, where two parties litigate a marriage claimed on one side and denied on the other—that these two parties were free from any matrimonial contract. If that sentence is to have the force which, as it is apprehended by those who sit on this side of the bar, by law it must have, it will of course follow, that this indictment must fall to the ground; because the sole foundation of the criminal charge is the supposed marriage with Mr. Hervey, which this sentence, if conclusive, must unanswerably prove never to have existed. It must, we submit to your lordships, follow as a consequence, that this is the proper place and point of time to stop: it would be to no purpose for your lordships to sit here to hear a long story, the object of which, when the sentence was conclusive, would only be to give pain to one whose sufferings no one would wish to encrease, and at last, after it had been heard, no possible good effect could follow from it. As evidence ought not to be heard, if this sentence is conclusive, because it would be hearing that which could have no intention, no weight, no consequence; so it would be nugatory to state it, and every body would wish to decline the hearing it for the reasons to which I alluded; and I am persuaded, not only for the sake of the noble lady at the bar, but for the sake of preserving that which every one will always think of great importance, that is, uniformity in legal decisions and judicatures, that this sentence must upon this occasion, as I believe on every one has been in which any such sentence has ever been produced in a court, be deemed decisive and unanswerable.

My lords, that it ought to be so upon this occasion, I will first endeavour to shew to your lordships by considering the nature of that act of parliament upon which the present prosecution is founded, and the state of the law before that act of parliament was made.

My lords, the act of parliament creates no new offence; it punishes nothing but what was punishable before, a second marriage while a former existed: taking a second husband or wife while there was a former in being, was undoubtedly an offence long before this statute of king James the first; indeed as long as the ecclesiastical constitution of this country has subsisted. This act of parliament makes no other alteration in the law, but as it subjects persons committing this offence to temporal prosecution and punishment; before this act, such an offence could only be the object of ecclesiastical censure and punishment: but, my lords, the makers of this statute never dreamt, that they were in any respect altering the ecclesiastical constitution of this kingdom; that they were in any instance invading or breaking in upon the rights of the ecclesiastical courts: no such thing is to be found in the statute; nothing is to be collected from that. Indeed, if you might collect from the preamble to the act of parliament, it will appear to every one who reads it, that it was not in the imagination of those who framed this law, that a second marriage could be made the object of punishment, where there had been a sentence which prevented a supposed former marriage being binding upon the parties. When I say that, I allude to the exceptions in the act, which make no part of your lordships present consideration. But besides that, the preamble of the act tells your lordships what it was that the makers of it had in view: the preamble tells your lordships, that divers evil-disposed persons being married, run out of one county into another, or into places where they are not known, and there become to be married, having another husband or wife living, to the great displeasure of God and utter undoing of divers honest mens children and others. Now it never was supposed by the makers of this act of parliament, that the persons described in the preamble of it would go through the form and ceremony of a trial and litigation, and obtain a decision in the Ecclesiastical Court, before such second marriage was to take effect, which was to be the object of this law: but it is enough that in this statute there is not any thing that tends to diminish or break in upon the dominion of the Ecclesiastical Court; but that the statute left those courts and the law relating to them just in the same situation as they were before. Now if this was an offence before the act, how was it punishable? What would have been the operation of such a sentence before this law? Unquestionably, a person taking a second husband or wife, the first being living, might have been made the subject of punishment in the ecclesiastical courts. Let me suppose a prosecution commenced for that purpose by the second husband or wife, the first husband or wife being living: those who stand near me, who are much better acquainted with the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Court than myself, will tell your lordships, that, so long as this sentence remains, the relation of husband and wife could not exist, which alone must be the foundation of a prosecution; for taking a second husband upon this statute, the act upon which the whole proceeding is founded, having made no alteration in the case, the law remains the same. It does not follow from thence, nor are your lordships to suppose it, that such a sentence as this would in the Ecclesiastical Court have made adultery lawful, or have made a marriage with a second husband or wife a good one: certainly not; but while the sentence subsisted, it would have proved, that there was no first marriage at any time by any parties interested. Such a sentence as this may be undone; it is a fundamental rule in all matrimonial causes in the ecclesiastical ecclesiastical courts, that, in their language, sententia contra matrimonium non transibit in rem judicatum. The issue or the kindred of persons intitled to estates may have a variety of reasons for impeaching marriages. As to the continuing in a second marriage, the continuing in adultery, the repeating it is only an increase and aggravation of sin where the first marriage ought to have prevented it. At any time there may be a suit to restore and set up a first marriage, which has been undone by a sentence by accident, by mistake, by collusion, or from any other reason not satisfactory. If all the evidence that could have been had respecting the marriage has not been laid before the spiritual judge, any party who has any interest may at any time again apply to that court, again institute a suit, offer new evidence, have that which has been already heard, heard again, that the marriage, if it did really exist, may be established by a sentence of that court: this is I believe clear law, and undoubted in that judicature. If it is, then your lordships are not to conclude, that by any sanction which you give this sentence, you either authorize adultery, or give effect to second marriages while first marriages subsist; no, at any time that first marriage may be established notwithstanding a sentence against it, when any person shall think fit in a legal way in such judicatures to impeach that sentence: but all that is contended for is, that while that sentence remains, the matter is concluded; the marriage cannot be proved to exist; the relation of husband and wife is destroyed.

My lords, if this which I have now submitted to your lordships be, as I apprehend it is, well founded in the known practice and law of these courts, the consequence I trust will be, that this sentence must now have the effect under a prosecution upon the present act of parliament, as it would have had in a prosecution in the Ecclesiastical Court for an adultery, or a crime against the first marriage. In that judicature, the only one which by the laws of this country has a regular jurisdiction to enquire into marriages, by a solemn judgment these two parties are declared not to be married; that would have been an answer to any prosecution before the statute. The statute leaves the power of the ecclesiastical courts exactly as it was before; leaving it so, a sentence pronounced by that court in a cause, in which it has clear jurisdiction, must I apprehend be decisive. But, my lords, it is undoubted. Various cases, which I shall not trouble your lordships with the repetition of, have been mentioned, which prove that to no purpose can this noble lady at the bar and Mr. Hervy be considered as man and wife, or proved to be man and wife while this sentence subsists. No conjugal duties can be exacted from one to the other; was a wife starving in the streets, she could not in any way oblige him to contribute to her support. Whilst such a sentence remains, the woman cannot be a wife for any beneficial purpose resulting from matrimony: and it will be, I believe, difficult to point out one for which she can be a wife, unless it be for the single purpose of subjecting her to be punished as a felon for marrying a second husband. I can hardly believe that any human creature can be found, who would wish that the noble lady at your bar should for this purpose alone, and in this single instance, be deemed a wife, when she can be in no other. But if there be any who wish it, I am satisfied your lordships wishes will go along with the law as I understand it to be, if the law be so: and that it will be very difficult to convince your lordships, that she, who was not a wife for any other purpose, should be deemed a wife in order to be subjected to criminal punishment for an open, an avowed, and by her thought an honourable marriage with a noble duke.

My lords, in every instance in which an issue in the temporal courts, in the courts of common law, is joined upon matrimony, where a marriage is insisted upon on one side and denied on the other; in every instance of that sort we know the temporal courts decide not; they send to the spiritual courts to have the matter enquired into and decided upon; nothing is more clear than that rule of law. So it is in cases of dower; where dower is claimed by a widow, where it is denied that she was ever lawfully married to her husband, the temporal court says, it has no power to enquire into the matter, it must refer it to the Spiritual Court; and the decision of the bishop is final upon the point. It is not only in the case of marriage, but in other cases, that the decision of the Ecclesiastical Court is the only competent one, and is final and conclusive to all purposes: so it is upon questions of legitimacy, where bastardy is alledged and denied; the common-law courts decide not the point; they send it to the Ecclesiastical Court: so it is with regard to the probate of wills; and no case can be stronger than that which was mentioned to your lordships, where even upon a criminal accusation, a charge of forgery, an accusation resembling the present, a decision of the Ecclesiastical Court in favour of a will was held to be conclusive evidence upon an indictment for forgery, and that no proof could be received of the fact of forgery in opposition to such a sentence. It is not only so in these instances of the Ecclesiastical Court; there are others with regard to captures; the decisions of the courts of Admiralty are in like manner conclusive: so the court of Exchequer, upon disputes concerning the revenue: there are many other instances which might be pointed out to your lordships, in which, after the sentences of courts having competent jurisdiction, all other courts are shut out from enquiry into the matter, however it might appear that such sentences are not founded in truth. This rule is so clear and so well known, that I will trouble your lordships with no particular cases or instances in which any such matter is determined: but there are some that have been already mentioned to your lordships, and one other which I shall add, to which I shall beg your lordships attention on account of another view, which it is necessary for him, who would contend for the full force of this sentence, to see this subject in.

My lords, it may be said, something of that has been hinted already; much we know has been talked out of doors, not all I believe warranted by the fact; but of that now we are not to judge or enquire: but it may be said, in answer to these arguments giving the utmost force to such sentences, let them be final and conclusive as they may, yet if a sentence can be shewn to be the effect of agreement and collusion, that it shall not be final, that it shall not have a binding force. If those, who are to argue against the effect of this sentence in the extent in which it is now endeavoured to be urged; should be at liberty to say, that they would attempt to shew that this sentence now in question before your lordships was the effect of what is called in the common-law courts, coven, or collusion; if there was any ground, as I do most firmly believe there is not, to impute this sentence to any such original; yet before your lordships I trust it will appear, that this is not the place in which any such collusion ought to be enquired into. Those courts, which the constitution has trusted with the investigation and decision of matters relating to marriage, are fully equal to the decision of any such collusion; they may undo their sentences where they appear to be collusive: and it is not to be presumed that any collusive sentences would be encouraged in those courts. Indeed there is one strong and cogent reason, why no such collusive sentences are to be feared in those courts; because, as I before observed to your lordships, a sentence there, though conclusive while it stands, may at any time be attacked or impeached by those who find an interest in so doing: and if it may, then it would be idle for persons to be collusively obtaining a sentence, when any relations that might be affected by issue of a second marriage, in short, any person who has an interest, might overturn and destroy it. This at least is very obvious upon the sentence that is now urged to your lordships, and the effect of it with regard to the present prosecution, that, if it was to stop the present prosecution, the utmost consequence that would follow from it would be this, that it could only prevent such prosecutions having effect in cases in which in truth the parties, who had to do in the cause in the Ecclesiastical Court, and who obtained the sentence, were so circumstanced, that it would not be the interest of any human creature to endeavour to undo their work: and that it is not one of that sort of marriages, such a second marriage, as it was the object of this temporal law, the statute of James the first, to make the subject of punishment. It was made on account of temporal mischiefs happening, as recited in the preamble. Although it is mentioned, and truly mentioned in that statute, that such second marriages are to the dishonour of God, and are undoubtedly high offences against religion, and the holy ceremony of marriage; yet if that had been the only evil that had been apprehended or found from such second marriages, it is not to be believed, but that the legislature of this country would have left such marriages to have been considered, enquired into, and punished in those courts, in which all other offences against religion are very properly only cognizable and punishable. It was the temporal mischief that produced that law; and your lordships may easily judge, what apprehensions of any temporal mischief would arise from such weight being given to this sentence, as is contended for from prosecutions being stopped by such sentences, when it is clear that sentence cannot do mischief to any human creature, who does not chuse to sit down and acquiesce under it; for the remotest issue, at the greatest distance, that can be hurt, may commence a suit in the Spiritual Court, and may therefore get rid of this sentence. Give it therefore its utmost force, let it weigh as much as is desired in the scale in favour of this lady, it would only go to prevent a prosecution, where the marriage undone was of such a sort, that no human creature would have an interest to support it. This I observe to your lordships, supposing that it may be urged against this sentence, that it will be attempted to be proved to be produced by agreement and collusion.

My lords, there are cases, one of which has been already mentioned to your lordships, that in terms prove that that collusion is not the subject of temporal enquiry, that it ought to be confined to the spiritual courts. There are other cases, which seem to me in effect to prove the same thing.

The case of Kenn has already been mentioned to your lordships: in that case it was an attempt by the issue of that marriage, where there had been a divorce between the parents of that issue, to establish the marriage. In the divorce the sentence had proceeded upon the parties not having been of marriageable age, that is, the man of fourteen, the woman of twelve; that they had never cohabited together, or consented to the marriage after they had attained to marriageable years, to the years of consent, as they are called. But who is it attempts to undo that marriage?—The child who was born of those parents, cohabiting together long after they had attained the age of consent. And yet that issue was not heard: no, the sentence was held to be conclusive; a sentence proceeding clearly upon a ground which must be false; stating that the parties were not of the age of consent; stating that they had never consented after they had attained that age; when it was an undoubted fact, indeed the existence of that issue, which litigated it, proved that they must have consented to the marriage after the age of consent.

The next case that I would suggest to your lordships is one that has not been mentioned, but which appears to me to be extremely strong to the present purpose. It is the case of Morris and Webber, in Moore's Reports, 225. The case, in short, was this: two persons, one of the name of Berry and the other of Wilmot Gifford, had been married; they had been married some years; they had no offspring; a suit was commenced in the Spiritual Court for a divorce; a sentence was pronounced, which in the words of the book are propter vitium perpetuum et impotentiam generationis in the husband. The sentence having so proceeded, not long afterwards both these parties married again, and each by the second marriage had several children: some years afterwards a cause arose, in which it became a question, whether the issue by the second marriage of the husband thus divorced could be legitimate? It was contended, that those subsequent children by that husband had proved, and irrefragably proved, that the foundation of the divorce was false; that there could not be that vitium perpetuum which was made the ground of the divorce. The common-law court, before whom this question came, clearly held, that that was necessarily proved by the subsequent children which that husband had had; but still clear as it was, that this sentence was founded in an apparent falsehood, yet it must stand: it is the sentence of that court to which the constitution of the country has entrusted the decision of such matters; it is not for our courts to enquire into it; we should usurp a jurisdiction which does not belong to us; and upon that ground it was determined, that till that sentence of divorce was undone in the Ecclesiastical Court, it must be binding and conclusive, and the issue of the second marriage must be deemed legitimate.

My lords, no cases can well be imagined stronger than these to shew, that even sentences founded in agreement, founded on what may be called collusion of the parties, are yet binding, till they are rescinded in that court to which alone the law of England has intrusted and confined the consideration of such matters.

Another case, which has already been mentioned to your lordships, is the case of Hatfield and Hatfield, which seems to me also to decide this point, and to decide in terms. The case has been already fully stated to your lordships; I need therefore only point out one or two particulars of it. There was a dispute between the heir of one Hatfield and a woman, who claimed to be the widow of the father of that heir. He insisted upon it, that she was not the wife of Hatfield his father, because she had been married to one Porter. The marriage with Porter was proved. Porter, who was a party to the suit in the court of equity, admitted it upon his oath. A release was obtained by the heir from that Porter. In order to get rid of this release, and though the fact of marriage was proved in the clearest terms, the woman commenced a suit for jactitation of marriage against Porter in the Spiritual Court. A sentence upon his not appearing was pronounced in that court against him, and that was held in the house of lords to be conclusive. Those who went before your lordships, then sitting in judicature, said, this was a sentence by a court which had the alone jurisdiction of the matter, and, while it stood, it must decide. The books that take notice of this case expressly say, that the sentence was considered—indeed, after the case stated to your lordships it could not but be so considered,—as collusive, I think is one of the words to be found in the books; and yet though appearing to be a feigned and collusive sentence, the answer was, that collusion is to be judged of alone in the court where the original matter arises, which has alone jurisdiction upon the subject; no other court can consider it.

My lords, I am aware that it may be said in answer to this case, that this was in a court of equity, which had no jurisdiction to enquire into questions concerning marriage in the Ecclesiastical Court. My lords, that is no answer; for wherever a sentence founded in agreement between parties is used to the prejudice of a third person, in whatever court it is, unless the subject be of such a nature that it is exclusively confined to the particular court in which it arises, wherever such a sentence is attempted to be used against a third person, that third person may avail himself of the collusion upon which it is founded: for how is it, that in all common cases, where questions arise about collusive sentences, that the party against whom they are used gets rid of them? In order to do that, no proceeding is requisite in the court in which the sentence is: no; the person against whom it is urged says, However that sentence may be between you two, who are parties to it, however it may bind you, it is founded in agreement between you two, and it is nothing to me; as against me it is void. Thus in the common case of executors, a creditor has a right to be paid out of the effects left by a dead person, who is debtor: the executor intending to cheat the creditor by an agreement with another person, who is no real creditor, prevails upon him to commence a suit, and suffers judgment to pass at the instance of such a friend; by which he is made the original creditor, and the executor, as representative, debtor to the person so suing by agreement. The real creditor cannot pursue any steps to undo the judgment: no; he says, by way of answer, That judgment is void against me; you two persons agreeing and colluding together shall not turn the forms of law to my prejudice: and as this may be done in one case, why not in every other, where a judgment or a sentence founded upon collusion is used against a third person, who has no way to answer it but by saying at once, It is void against me, however it may stand good between you?

This, my lords, is the way in which all judgments by collusion or by covin, in my knowledge are answered and got rid of. But in the case of Hatfield and Hatfield, which I last alluded to, it is answered, that the court of equity, and the house of lords judging as a court of equity, had no authority to enquire at all into a matter depending in the Ecclesiastical Court relating to marriage, because that court hath an exclusive jurisdiction upon the subject; and yet in that case and in this there could be no reason, I submit to your lordships, why, if an agreement of the parties could be a ground for impeaching a judgment, it might not be as well done in that judicature as in this?

My lords, when I am speaking of any arguments that one may suppose to be urged from an attempt to prove collusion, there are differences between any such judgments as are got rid of by a third person, because prejudicial to him, and founded upon an agreement between two parties to a suit with which he has nothing to do: is that the present case? No third person, that has an interest, attempts now to set aside this judgment: the object here is to annul the judgment as between the parties to that suit. In all the cases that can be referred to, where questions arise upon judgments passing by agreement, intended to be levelled against a third person; in all such cases, as between the parties, the judgment stands good. The object of those, who in such respects impeach the judgment, is merely to prevent its having effect against those who are strangers to it: but here this judgment, this sentence must, as between the parties, be totally undone and annihilated, or else it decides the question; because unless it is undone, if it stands good between those two parties till properly impeached in the Ecclesiastical Court, why then they are not husband and wife: and this consideration materially distinguishes such a judgment, so impeached as the present is, from the common case in which judgments are to be affected; not so as to be avoided between the parties, between whom they stand good, but as being laid aside more properly than being avoided, so as not to be turned to the prejudice of a third person, who is not a party to them.

My lords, another distinction which I have before suggested to your lordships, which I remind your lordships of, as upon the present head of the arguments I am suggesting to your lordships, there is this difference between all the cases that can be brought before your lordships upon the head of collusion or agreement; in all those cases, in such as I have alluded to, and a hundred others might be put which fall within the same rule as a judgment set on foot by an executor to defraud an honest creditor; in such cases the parties have no way themselves to commence a suit to set aside this judgment; their mode of doing it is, when the judgment is used against them, answering; Whatever the judgment may be as between you two, as to me it is void: but there is no regular process of law, no suit to be commenced, by which any such judgment can be set aside by a third person; there is no suit. If it could be done at all, it must be done in a manner which furnishes argument in support of the present sentence, because it could only be done by an application to that court in which such a judgment is given. Another court may say, where it is attempted to be used, that if it be proved to be founded in agreement by those who are parties to it, it shall not be turned against a third person; but no other court but that in which the judgment is given can set it aside and annul it.

My lords, these distinctions clearly appear, as I submit to your lordships, in such cases where such judgments are attempted to be got rid of by third persons as detrimental to their interests: but I believe I can produce to your lordships a legislative instance, that a collusive judgment in the Spiritual Court cannot be set aside after once given; that it is final and conclusive. I have already mentioned it to your lordships as one of those points arising in courts of justice, upon which all consideration is confined to the ecclesiastical courts: none is more important than a question concerning bastardy or legitimacy. The way, your lordships know, in which that question is sent to be tried by the Ecclesiastical Court, is this: in actions of various sorts, where a person claims a title by descent, the legitimacy of his birth becomes material. If the party against whom he claims says that he is a bastard, and upon that an issue is joined, the common-law courts in which the question arises send the matter to the Ecclesiastical Court to be enquired of and decided. In answer to a writ for that purpose going from the common-law court the ecclesiastical judge makes a certificate, and he certifies that the party is a bastard, or is legitimate: that certificate is conclusive; it is not only conclusive between the parties to the suit, it is conclusive to all the world; it never can be touched or moved again; that certificate once received, that record in the common-law courts is final for ever.

My lords, to prevent the mischiefs that might arise from such transactions happening by agreement, and a false certificate obtained by collusion, depriving persons of their legal rights, various forms are now requisite by an act of parliament, which I will state to your lordships, that originally were not so. Various proclamations are necessary in the court of Chancery, and likewise in the court of common-law, in which such question arises, in order to give universal notice to all persons who may by possibility be interested, that such a question is to be sent to the Ecclesiastical Court: but before that act of parliament no such proclamations were necessary. The act of parliament will shew your lordships what then was the effect of a collusive sentence in the Spiritual Court upon the subject of bastardy; and the sentence of that court was conclusive, and could not be touched by any temporal judicature.

My lords, the act of parliament was made in the 9th of king Henry the VIth, chapter the 11th: the title of the act is, 'proclamations before a writ be awarded to a bishop to certify bastardy.'

My lords, the preamble of the act before it comes to the enacting part is very long. I need not read the whole of it to your lordships: it is in substance this: 'that several persons, who are named as petitioning in the law, who claim, some as sisters, and others as claiming under sisters, to be heirs of Edmond earl of Kent, were apprehensive of the effect of a collusive certificate that would be obtained by Eleanor the wife of James lord Audley, who pretended herself to be the daughter of that Edmond earl of Kent; and the meaning of the act was to prevent the effect of such a collusive certificate, which was apprehended would be obtained by this Eleanor wife of James lord Audley; and stating that there was no foundation for any such pretence. That she was not the daughter of the said Edmond, the act goes on to say; nevertheless the said Eleanor, the wife of James, upon great subtilty, process imagined, privy labour, and other means and coloured ways, to the intent that she ought to be certified mulier by some ordinary, in case that bastardy should be alledged in her person, hath brought, as it is said, in examination before certain judges in the Spiritual Court, knowing nothing of these contrivances, certain suborned proofs and persons of her assent and covin, deposing for her, that she was begotten within marriage had and solemnized between the said Edmond and Constance, late wife of Thomas lord Despenser; so that it is very likely that the same ordinary would certify the said Eleanor the wife of James mulier; which certificate so had and made ought, by the law of England, to disinherit the said duchess, duke of York, earl of Salisbury, earl of Westmorland, John earl of Tyrroff, Alice, Joyce, and Henry, and their issue for ever, of the whole inheritance aforesaid.' Thus your lordships see it is stated that such a certificate, so obtained by the most flagrant covin and collusion, which is stated here in this preamble of the act, is said to have such effect, that it ought by the law of England to disinherit the heirs and their issue for ever, though a certificate most palpably obtained upon the grossest fraud and collusion. Then it goes on to provide, 'whereupon the premises tenderly considered, and to eschew such subtle disherisons, as well in the said case as in other cases like in time to come, by the advice and assent of the lords, and at the request of the said commons, it is ordained, that if Eleanor the wife of James be certified mulier, that no manner of certificate shall in anywise put to prejudice, bind, endamage, or conclude any person, but him or his heirs that was a party to the plea.' Thus it provides a remedy in that particular case. Then it goes on to enact, that in future all proceedings of this sort shall be attended with different proclamations that are ordered by that act, that it may in future be known when such certificate will be applied for to the spiritual courts, and that all parties interested may have notice to make their objections. Now, my lords, what will be said of the effect, the weight, the authority of ecclesiastical sentences in this part of the law after the act of parliament? Does it not appear by this law, that the certificate ificate, in other words the decision, of the Ecclesiastical Court in a case of bastardy, even though founded upon collusion, was decisive, when once it was formally received from the ecclesiastical judge? And if it was so, will it be at all a stretch of the authority of that judicature now to say, that a sentence in a cause of marriage, which is as peculiarly to be confined to their jurisdiction, ought to have the same force? And if it is not to have the same force, will it not be breaking in upon or evading that jurisdiction, in a way which your lordships predecessors have never done, if you should now suffer this sentence in another place to be impeached and overturned?

My lords, your lordships will remark, that in those cases which your lordships have been referred to, there is one, the case of forgery, which is the case of Farr, that is more exactly like the present, and where a decision of the Spiritual Court upon a will is held to be decisive against the clearest proof of forgery. But with respect to the other cases, your lordships will observe, that they are all civil cases: and if this deference and respect is to be paid to sentences by the ecclesiastical judicature in civil causes, I am sure I need not observe to your lordships that in criminal causes, where the noble lady at your lordships bar is to be entitled to every indulgence, to every favour, these decisions do from that consideration acquire double force.

My lords, it may be said, what did this act of parliament of James the first mean? That when there had been such a sentence as this, though those who were parties to it knew that they were in truth man and wife, that after such a sentence either of the parties, so knowing that they were man and wife, should be at liberty to marry again without incurring the penalties of this statute? In answer to that it may be replied, that whilst this sentence stands, if there be any weight in the arguments urged in support of it, it is not to be presumed that it was so, or could be so, known to the parties; because that was to impeach the sentence. But another answer occurs from the act itself; for the act did not mean in all cases to punish a second marriage, where the former husband and wife were found to be living; because there is an exception in the act, an exception which permits, I mean so as not to make it punishable, permits a marriage with a second husband or wife, even though the former be living, and be known to be living. Let but the sea be placed between the husband and wife for seven years, though they know each other to be living, the law takes not place; they are not the subjects of punishment: that I take to be extremely clear. The circumstance of knowledge does not necessarily import, that a person marrying a second husband or wife must be subject to the penalties of this law on account of that knowledge of the first husband or wife being living. As to the immorality of the case, as to the effect against religion, against the eternal sacred obligation of marriage, it remains exactly the same, whether the husband is on this side the channel or the other. But the law has said in that case, though the ceremony of marriage would be thus offended against, though the obligation would be so far violated, that a husband or wife, knowing that the other husband or wife were living, should take a second; yet that knowledge is not sufficient within the act in that instance to subject the party to punishment. It is not therefore in every case that the taking a second husband or wife, even with knowledge that there is a former subsisting, will subject a party to punishment: that the act says. It is not a part of the present question before your lordships. To suppose that after this sentence, the noble lady at your bar could be so well acquainted with the ecclesiastical law, as to know that this sentence would not be binding; that is too absurd to suppose. If a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court is to have that weight, which it has had from the earliest times; if the same rule is to take place in criminal courts of judicature, and in favour of the criminal, which has been again and again established in civil causes; then this sentence is conclusive; there will be an end of the present prosecution. And your lordships will not forget what I did before take the liberty to suggest to your lordships, that giving the utmost sanction to this sentence, you never bastardize issue, you never disturb families, you never deprive individuals of their right; because every human creature, who is at all interested to dispute a sentence against a marriage, who wishes to set up or support it, may at any time apply to the Ecclesiastical Court, and there have the marriage set up again and established. No cause therefore can ever pass, in which a marriage will remain undone by such a sentence, except where there is no human creature who thinks it worth their while to endeavour to support it. And this temporal law may surely very well go unenforced while a sentence stands, and on account of that sentence, which with the utmost weight and credit given to it can produce no temporal mischief. If it be wrong, if the parties to it in procuring it did wrong, it may at any time be undone in the Ecclesiastical Court; and as to the offence against the right of marriage, against the religious constitution of the kingdom, that court may at any time effectually punish those who have been guilty of any such offence, who have improperly married a second husband or wife, who have improperly attempted to get rid of a marriage that was legally established.

And therefore upon the whole I submit to your lordships, that upon the authorities of law there is no ground to impeach or attack this sentence; that it is final, it is conclusive, of course no other evidence ought to be received impeaching this marriage; that the indictment therefore must fall; and that as no evidence can be received, it would be idle, impertinent, and of no use to state it.

Doctor Calvert.

My lords,

It is my duty likewise to trespass a little upon your lordships patience on the same side with the gentlemen who have gone before me, though this question has been by them considered in the widest extent of view that I believe it is capable of.

My lords, the motion now made by the noble lady at your lordships bar is this, that having that species of evidence which she apprehends is conclusive in her favour, and precludes the prosecutor from going into any evidence on his part, it may be received by your lordships as the only matter proper to take into consideration.

My lords, that evidence which her grace offers, is a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court, pronounced in a due suit thereupon; in a direct line of marriage; the purport of which was, that there was no marriage subsisting between the honourable Mr. Augustus Hervey and the noble lady at the bar, as the indictment lays there was, at the time she married the late duke of Kingston, that marriage being the sole foundation of this accusation; for if that fails, the marriage with the duke of Kingston was perfectly innocent. If this is a proof, such a one as your lordships by law ought to abide by, that there was no such marriage subsisting between them, to go into evidence of any sort must be totally nugatory.

My lords, it is well known, that by the constitution of this kingdom there are different courts appointed for the litigation of different questions. These courts are, as the constitution supposes, well adapted to the purposes, and exercise that jurisdiction which can take up the point originally, and determine it directly; and it is contended, that while that determination subsists, it ought to have its effect in all other places, and in all other courts where there shall be occasion to make use of it.

My lords, this is not asserted only of one species of courts, I mean the ecclesiastical courts, but it applies, I apprehend, to sentences of all others whatever, that when a judgment has been given by any court having original and direct jurisdiction, though that may incidentally come before another court, yet they don't go into that question which has by a competent judicature been before determined.

My lords, it is true, it is impossible for any courts to continue to exercise their jurisdiction for any considerable time without many questions incidentally arising, which are not really and originally within their jurisdiction, many of ecclesiastical cognizance; and for the purpose of determining that cause, if the incidental point has not already had a decision in an ecclesiastical court, they must be gone into; because if they were not, there would be no end of the interruption of justice. Many questions arise in the ecclesiastical courts, which are originally of common-law jurisdiction, yet the Ecclesiastical Court must go so far into that consideration, as to see whether the pretence be true: for the purpose only of determining the cause then before that court, they could not have originally determined this question. Suppose, for instance, a legatee claiming a legacy in an ecclesiastical court, the executor may plead a release; now the validity or invalidity of that release is originally cognizable by the common-law courts and no other, yet the ecclesiastical judge must so far take that plea into consideration, as to see whether there is prima facie a release or no: but it was pleaded in reply, that there had been a question upon that release at common law, that it had been there put in issue, and that there was a verdict against that release. I apprehend, that no ecclesiastical judge then would think himself at liberty to enter into the question, whether it was a good release or no; but the verdict must be taken as true, because the court, though incidentally it was obliged to take notice of it, has not a jurisdiction to determine the original question.

My lords, this may be applied to the question that is now before your lordships: marriage causes are peculiarly by the constitution given to the ecclesiastical courts; they alone can determine an original and direct question of marriage as between the parties; and if determinations of courts, having original and direct jurisdiction, are to receive weight, and meet with credit from all other, then the determinations of ecclesiastical courts upon marriage ought, wherever they come in question in any other court, likewise to be received as conclusive. The obvious reason of this strikes me to be, because though every court can determine in some measure a question merely as applied to what is then before them, yet they cannot determine it generally, they cannot determine the very question as applicable to other purposes. As for instance, suppose any temporal right under a marriage is to be considered in a common-law court, and it may be necessary for that purpose to enquire whether there be such a marriage; the general question, whether such persons are to all intents and purposes man and wife, whether they are bound by the obligations of duty arising from that state, is certainly not to be determined but in a court of ecclesiastical jurisdiction: and when that court has been in possession of the original and general question, and has determined it, for the common-law court to enter into it, might be in effect to alter and undo a judgment, as far as the consideration then is before the court, which certainly that court has no jurisdiction to do. That this is to be received as a general position, I apprehend, is supportable upon this ground; upon the great incongruity of sentences which otherwise must arise. Now suppose there be a sentence in a court that has the original jurisdiction to determine marriages between man and wife; to determine upon the state of those persons, whether they are in fact in that relationship; all determinations upon that question in any other court may be directly contradictory to that sentence, which still must remain; for the parties will and must remain man and wife, or the contrary not man and wife, according as the sentence was, if that question has been directly determined in an ecclesiastical court; and any determination that would be given by another court, may be contrary to that obligation and that connection which the court, having a power, has determined was between them. On these considerations, therefore, I apprehend it is, that whenever a question of matrimony has arisen in any common-law court, if there has been no determination in the Ecclesiastical Court, the question may be open; but if that question has ever come directly in point before the court, having direct jurisdiction to determine it, I apprehend to this time there always has been such credit given to the sentence, that it is taken to be conclusive and be determined between the parties.

My lords, this distinction was made, I conceive, upon the best grounds, so long ago as that case alluded to by the learned gentlemen who have gone before me: I mean Kenn's case, reported by Mr. Edward Coke; that was in the reign of king James I. In that case there is cited the case of Corbett, Corbett, which was as early as Edward IV. Taking the doctrine laid down upon these two caſes together, the poſition there eſtabliſhed, and I truſt adhered to ever ſince, is this, that when there has been a queſtion of marriage litigated by the parties themſelves in a proper court, and the queſtion has been determined upon the marriage, the ſentence will always hold good, till it is reverſed by that court. So much was determined in the caſe of Kenn. In the caſe of Corbett it was determined, that where one of the parties is dead, and no ſuch ſentence was had between the parties while living, a perſon cannot commence proceedings in the Eccleſiaſtical Court relative to that marriage. The reaſon is, that then the object of ſuch a ſuit muſt be temporal conſiderations only; it muſt be to baſtardize iſſue, or it muſt be for ſome purpoſes which the Eccleſiaſtical Court has not original juriſdiction of. But the mere queſtion of marriage, of connection between man and wife, can never come into queſtion, nor ought it to be litigated after the death of the parties: therefore, the Eccleſiaſtical Court, after the death of the parties, does not entertain that ſuit, nor can it be legally commenced.

My lords, there are a variety of caſes which have been determined that have been quoted already to your lordſhips, and which I ſhould be very ſorry to take up your time in repeating; but it ſeems to me on thoſe authorities to have been eſtabliſhed, that as often as theſe ſentences have been pleaded they have been allowed, whether they were ſentences in caſes of nullity, of marriage, or in jactitation of marriage.

My lords, if danger is to be apprehended from too much credit being given to ſuch ſentences, leſt for improper purpoſes they might be unduly obtained, there ſeems to be leſs danger in queſtions that ariſe upon marriage than in any other; for this reaſon, that there can be no determination againſt a marriage but what is open to future litigation. We all know, that in a queſtion of marriage any perſon that has an intereſt may intervene before ſentence given; and any perſon having an intereſt, though they have neglected to intervene in that caſe, might appeal within the proper time: nay, I will go ſo far as to ſay, that if any perſon having an intereſt ſhould have ſo far neglected it as to omit availing himſelf of an intervention or appeal, yet he might ſtill come before the court, ſhew his intereſt, and be heard. A marriage caſe goes farther ſtill; for I believe in moſt other caſes a determination would be for ever binding, at leaſt to the parties; but in theſe queſtions, I conceive it is not: for if there was to be a queſtion between a huſband and wife in a caſe of jactitation, and, as in this caſe, it was determined that there was no marriage; yet the party againſt whom that ſentence was obtained, I apprehend, might appear afterwards, he might produce any new proof that he did not know of at that time, or, even if he had not produced what proof he had, he might be heard upon it. The reaſon of that indulgence I take to be this: by the canon-law a marriage was held to be indiſſoluble, and for that reaſon a ſentence againſt it never could be final; ſententia contra matrimonium nunquam tranſiit in rem judicatam. The canon-law, it is well known, has been received in this country with reſpect to marriage, particularly as to that poſition of its being indiſſoluble. In moſt other queſtions, as of property, a perſon might be bound by time, bound by not making ſo good a caſe as he ſhould have done; but as a perſon cannot reſeal himſelf from the obligations of marriage by any laſe of time, or any neglect in ſtating his caſe, the queſtion is ever open; therefore theſe caſes are certainly the leaſt dangerous, becauſe if any body appears who apprehends himſelf injured in this matter, and has an intereſt to ſhew that this judgment was not duly obtained, he may be heard; but while ſuch a ſentence remains unimpeached, I apprehend it is concluſive. The ſentence now before your lordſhips is a ſentence in a caſe of jactitation. It has been ſuppoſed upon the authorities, many of which have been cited to your lordſhips to-day, that when a ſentence determining upon this point has been offered in any court coming in incidentally, it has been conſtantly received: but, my lords, it has been received with this reſtriction, as it is laid down expreſſly in Blackham's caſe, which has been already quoted, it muſt be where the marriage has been directly in iſſue; for if it be an incidental point only, it would not then be ſatisfactory. In Blackham's caſe, where the queſtion aroſe upon the grant of an adminiſtration, it was argued, that the Eccleſiaſtical Court having determined upon that adminiſtration, they had virtually determined the marriage, and therefore it was binding upon all parties: but it was ſaid, No, the queſtion muſt be originally and directly upon the marriage, or it ſhall not have effect; and the diſtinction ſeems to be exceedingly good.

My lords, in order to bring the preſent caſe therefore within this principle, it is neceſſary to ſhew, that the ſentence now under your lordſhips conſideration is a direct determination upon a marriage; becauſe if it be not, it would be liable to the objection which I have now ſtated.

My lords, the proceeding is that of a caſe of jactitation, which is begun by a man or woman: in this caſe it was the woman calling upon the perſon who claims to be the huſband, for having boaſted and affirmed that lady to be his wife, to abſtain from ſuch affirmations for the future.

My lords, here the queſtion originally ſeems to be, whether the perſon called upon had ever really claimed the lady. In that ſtage of the caſe, if the claim had not gone as far as a juſtification, ſome of the books affirm that this proceeding to a caſe of defamation, ſuppoſing it to be a caſe of words only; and when upon a marriage being pleaded to juſtify the claim, the queſtion turns upon that marriage, it may perhaps be argued, that it is not a direct caſe of marriage, but an incidental one only: it may not therefore be improper to conſider it in this caſe, leſt ſuch an obſervation ſhould be made. I take it, that when in a caſe of jactitation the defendant gives in a plea ſtating a marriage, and that marriage is contradicted by the plaintiff, though it is intended indeed as a defence to the accuſation for which he is called upon to answer, that of having claimed the lady, yet the queſtion then alters its nature; the plea is not only intended to entitle the defendant to his admiſſion, but the court is then in poſſeſſion of the queſtion, whether there was a marriage between the parties, and the determination is direct upon a marriage. If the marriage be proved, there is the ſame ſentence paſſed as in a matrimonial caſe; there is a ſentence directly pronouncing there was a marriage, the parties are pronounced to be man and wife, and they might be admoniſhed to reſtore to each other conjugal rites. If, on the contrary, the defendant ſhould fail in proof, the determination is this, that the party has failed in his juſtification; and the ſentence in this caſe goes, that the judge has found that he has failed in the proof of the marriage alledged to have been had between them, he is declared to be free from all matrimonial contracts, and enjoined not to boaſt in future; it would be therefore a fallacy to argue, that this is not a direct determination of the queſtion of marriage: it is indeed ingrafted upon the original caſe of jactitation, but that is agreeable and conſonant to practice in other inſtances.

My lords, it is not a monſtrous thing to affirm, that a caſe may change its nature from its original inſtitution.

[At a motion of one of the peers, part of the ſentence read.]

Doctor Calvert. Unacquainted as I am with the proceedings of this high and auguſt court, which I never had the honour to appear in before, I conceive it is my duty to take immediate notice of thoſe words which have been read, as I ſuppoſe they were called for, becauſe I ought to confine my obſervations to them before I go any farther. The lady, who is the object of that enquiry, is pronounced to be a ſpinſter as far as yet appears.

My lords, theſe words are inſerted in this ſentence, and I apprehend are in every ſentence of this nature; the purport of which, I truſt, means this, that the caſe is open to future diſquiſition upon the principles that have been already ſtated; that though the judge determines upon the evidence that is then before him, yet the parties having an intereſt to bring that queſtion on again, may be heard. As far as yet appears to us, ſays the judge, the lady is free from all matrimonial contracts; and as long as that ſentence remains, I mean to argue that it is a concluſive ſentence. I don't mean that the court is precluded from another enquiry; I have ſtated, that no parties are precluded from another enquiry; and I conceive the meaning of thoſe words are to expreſs, that according to the light which then appears to the court, the court pronounces the ſentence. But a ſentence of that ſort is not from thence to be argued to be nugatory, and that the court determines nothing: the court determines upon what it has heard; and as long as that ſentence remains, that is the way in which I meant to put it, it is deciſive and concluſive.

My lords, I have ſaid, that though the caſe began originally upon the one party calling on the other to juſtify his claim as huſband in a caſe of jactitation, it is nothing monſtrous to ſuppoſe it has ſo far changed its nature as to become a marriage caſe; and I will mention other caſes in which the eccleſiaſtical courts, as is well known to the practitioners in thoſe courts, adopt and admit of a ſimilar practice. Suppoſe, for inſtance, a man was to bring a ſuit againſt his wife for the reſtitution of conjugal rites; in bar of that reſtitution, the woman may plead adultery or cruelty in the huſband, which is certainly a reaſon againſt admoniſhing her to return home to her huſband. But, my lords, this is not all that the court would do in ſuch a caſe; for ſhe having pleaded adultery, that plea becomes in fact a libel in the caſe, and it will become a caſe of adultery; and I have known within my memory, and ſince my attendance at the bar, inſtances of that ſort. In a caſe of Mathews and Mathews, determined in 1770, in the Conſiſtory of London, the wife pleaded adultery in bar to reſtitution; the caſe went on in that ſuit, and there was a ſentence of divorce: would any body contend, that it was not as direct a ſentence of divorce, as if it had been ſo originally inſtituted? and in caſe either of thoſe parties had married again during that divorce, and an indictment had been preferred for polygamy, can it be contended that this ſentence of divorce would not be a defence under the proviſo in the body of the act?

My lords, another inſtance: ſuppoſe a man brings a ſuit for ſeparation by reaſon of adultery againſt his wife; the wife may recriminate, and may give in an allegation pleading adultery in the huſband. The prayer indeed on each ſide would be for a ſeparation; but there is a very conſiderable difference between a ſentence for ſeparation formed upon a crime being in the man or in the woman, whether it is at the ſuit of one or the other: but if the party that is defendant in the original ſuit ſhould go on and prove that adultery, and the plaintiff ſhould not, the defendant would be intitled not only to a diſmiſſion from the ſuit the plaintiff originally brought, but to a ſeparation upon account of the adultery pleaded by the defendant.

I mention theſe caſes to ſhew, that it is not enormous to ſuppoſe, that though the original queſtion might begin in a caſe of jactitation, yet the marriage being pleaded, the ſentence either one way or the other is and muſt be as determinate as if the queſtion had originally been upon marriage. There is a caſe that was litigated in the Eccleſiaſtical Court not long ago, and which at the time was much talked of, and is well known; I mean the caſe of Mr. Thomas Hervey, who brought a ſuit of jactitation of marriage in the Conſiſtory Court of London againſt Mrs. Hervey. In that court a marriage was pleaded; the ſentence was againſt that marriage; the ſame was affirmed in the court of Arches; but when it was appealed to the court of Delegates, they reverſed this judgment, and pronounced for the marriage; pronounced not only that Mrs. Hervey was juſtified in her jactitation, but pronounced expreſſly and directly for the marriage; and I believe nobody will doubt, but that marriage was as concluſively determined between them as if it had been originally a marriage caſe, or a ſuit of nullity of marriage. That theſe ſentences have been held to be concluſive in the courts of common law where they have been offered, thoſe many inſtances that have been mentioned ſeem to me to put it out of all doubt.

It will not be improper to conſider what effect a ſentence of this ſort would have in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; and I ſhall contend, that while ſentence of this ſort is exiſting, a wife could not be heard to have any claim upon her huſband; ſhe could not claim the reſtitution of conjugal rites; there is no light in which ſhe would be underſtood to be the wife until the marriage be again brought into queſtion. There is a caſe in in print that ſeems to me to go exactly to the point I am now contending for; it is in the caſe of Clews and Bathurſt, which has been mentioned already to your lordſhips, as reported in Strange 968. But, my lords, that caſe is reported likewiſe in another book, a book lately publiſhed, which I am told is good authority, and the caſes well and correctly taken; it is called, Cafes in the time of Lord Hardwicke, and it is to be found in page 11. There the caſe is ſtated a little more at large; and a caſe is ſaid to be quoted by Dr. Lee, of Melliſent and Melliſent in the year 1718. In that caſe a woman had claimed to be the wife of a Mr. Melliſent. Melliſent libelled her in the Eccleſiaſtical Court in a jactitation of marriage. She pleaded a marriage, but failed in the proof; and there was a ſentence, I apprehend, of the ſame fort as in this caſe. After the death of her husband the woman would have made out her right to the adminiſtration, and for that purpoſe ſhe pleaded her marriage; that muſt have originally began in the inferior court, and from the nature of the ſuit, I ſuppoſe, came from the Prerogative; but however, the determination I am alluding to was in the court of Delegates: it was determined, as there remained in force a ſentence which was a bar to her, ſhe could not be heard to make out her caſe as a widow to the deceased. Your lordſhips very well know, that though the Prerogative is an eccleſiaſtical court, yet the jurisdiction of that court is confined merely to probates and adminiſtrations, and it does not entertain cauſes of marriage. Mrs. Melliſent there claiming as the widow of the deceased in that court where the ſentence of the marriage could not be ſet aſide, it was held, there being a ſentence in a cauſe of jactitation, in which the marriage was pronounced againſt, ſhe could not claim as widow. In that caſe the Prerogative Court held the ſame, as we are contending your lordſhips will upon this occaſion.

There was another caſe in the Prerogative Court in the year 1771, lady Mayo againſt Brown. The queſtion aroſe upon an adminiſtration to Gertrude Brown, who died inteſtate. Adminiſtration had been granted to Stephen Brown as her husband, he having married her in the year 1720. Afterwards that adminiſtration was called in by lady Mayo, a daughter by a former husband; and he contended that Brown had no right to that adminiſtration, inasmuch as at the time he married Gertrude he was already the husband of one Eleanor Cutts. In answer to that it was pleaded, that there had been a ſuit of jactitation of marriage brought by Brown againſt Cutts, in which the marriage was pronounced againſt, and he was pronounced to be free from all matrimonial contracts with Eleanor. In answer to that, another plea was given, ſtating that it was a colluſive ſuit; that they could ſhew fraud and colluſion. The admifſion of this allegation came on to be debated before the judge of the Prerogative; and thus far the judge ſaid: There being a ſentence now in another court (this was in the Prerogative that had not jurisdiction of marriage, there being a Conſiſtory of London) by which it is pronounced that this perſon was free from matrimonial contract, this court cannot admit this allegation: and all proceedings in that court were ſtopped, that is, that allegation was not admitted, till the party, if ſhe thought proper, might go to the proper court to reverse it. Nothing has been done in that cauſe ſince; and I conceive in all probability never will: I apprehend therefore that this ſentence, which is now under your lordſhips conſideration, muſt, as long as it remains in force, be held to be concluſive, for this reaſon; becauſe though it can be enquired into, yet it is not now even in a way of litigation; nothing has been done to repeal it, nor are there any ſteps towards it, but it remains in its full force.

My lords, the learned gentlemen who have gone before me have thought proper, in order to obviate any objections that may ariſe, to conſider what would be the caſe, ſuppoſing it ſhould be urged by the counſel on the other ſide, that the proſecutor would undertake to ſhew that this was a fraudulent ſentence, and obtained by colluſion. My lords, the reaſon of our mentioning that is, not on ſuppoſition or belief that there would come out any ſuch practices in the preſent caſe, but that, taking it up as we do as a previous queſtion, it is our duty to conſider it even in the moſt diſadvantageous view, and to maintain, that in no caſe which they can ſuppoſe ought evidence to be received againſt the ſentence: and upon that head I apprehend that every argument which can be adduced to ſhew that the conſideration of truth or the want of truth in ſuch a ſentence ought not to be gone into by this court, may with equal propriety be applied againſt going into the queſtion of colluſion, becauſe that court which gave the ſentence is open to that enquiry, and, I apprehend, alone proper and competent to the purpoſe. How vague and unsatisfactory muſt be the enquiry of different courts proceeding upon different matter, different principles, even the terms made uſe of quite different! Should they enquire into the queſtion, whether the proceedings were fair or not, it may be productive of error. Suppoſe it ſhould be ſhewn in ſome particular that there was evidence ſupplied, how would it appear the judgment did depend upon that ground? Their entering into the proof of colluſion would be as ſtrongly exceptionable as their enquiring into the right or propriety of the ſentence, whether it was duly and rightfully pronounced by the judge, which is an exerciſe of jurisdiction which no independent court has over the ſentences or judgments of another. Your lordſhips are well acquainted, that there is no appellate jurisdiction in a criminal court over an eccleſiaſtical court; the queſtion can only be, whether that ſentence ſhall be received as final and concluſive: but the method in which it was obtained, whether it was rightly and duly pronounced, are very good queſtions for a court of appeal, which can reverse that ſentence; but an enquiry into the method of obtaining it is improper, as long as the ſentence remains. If then a ſentence of this ſort will be held to be concluſive and ſatisfactory in all civil queſtions, and I conceive the authorities which have been quoted will be ſufficient to eſtabliſh that principle, ſurely it will much more ſtrongly apply to all criminal caſes; becauſe your lordſhips will ſee it to be the ſtrangeſt propoſition to maintain, that when a man or woman are not to be conſidered as husband and wife to any civil purpoſe, yet they ſhall be ſo only for the purpoſe of puniſhment: this ſurely would be the greateſt abſurdity. Yet ſuppoſing the ſentence not repealed, which imports the man and woman are not husband and wife; and ſuppoſe that be the general ſentence that ought to apply to them in every ſituation whatever; though the criminal jurisdiction ſhould go on to paſs cenſure upon the perſon accuſed (for that is all the criminal jurisdiction can do) that will not deſtroy the ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, and they will remain not husband and wife, though the criminal court ſhould puniſh one of them for what is ſuppoſed a ſecond marriage.

My lords, I ſuppoſe it will not be contended, that a determination before a criminal judicature ought to have the effect of a determination directly upon the marriage: I apprehend, that in point of law it cannot be ſuppoſed it ſhould be ſo argued. Your lordſhips will ſee the injuſtice of ſuch a proceeding then would be prodigious, becauſe then a criminal jurisdiction muſt determine upon the rights of many perſons who have not a poſſibility of being heard. Keep their queſtion in the civil court, adhere to the determination of that court that has an original jurisdiction, there all parties might have been heard, and they may in future, if they can ſet up any intereſt; but a determination in a criminal court that might apply in the moſt remote degree to determiné civil cauſes, would be the moſt maniſeſt injuſtice, becauſe no perſons could be heard for their intereſt.

The queſtion for your lordſhips determination, if it ſhould be ever gone into, will be upon the marriage ſaid to be had with Mr. Harvey. Any determination here that may affect that right, may affect not only the perſons that were immediately the parties to that ſuit; but your lordſhips ſee many connections ariſe upon marriage, many relationships and new claims that may be precluded by ſuch a ſentence as this. Suppoſe the duke of Kingſton had had children by his marriage, it would be as much their intereſt to eſtabliſh this ſentence, as it would be of intereſt of any other to impeach it; and that ſuch rights as theſe ſhould be determined in a criminal jurisdiction where the parties cannot be heard, I apprehend, is a poſition that never was yet maintained.

Upon theſe principles I hope your lordſhips will be of opinion, that the rule ought to be applied as well to queſtions that can ariſe in criminal jurisdictions as in civil ones. That criminal courts have determined upon theſe principles, there are caſes which have been alluded to, and which are, I apprehend, extremely pertinent. One is the caſe of the king againſt Vincent, Strange 481, mentioned to be an indictment for forgery in having forged a will. The reporter ſays, forgery was proved, but the defendant produced a probate under the ſeal of the ordinary; and it was held, that that was ſatisfactory proof of the validity of the will. That is a very ſtrong caſe; but that there is no right to determine upon civil matters in ſuch a way as this, or even to prejudice civil matters, is very clear in that Report.

My lords, there is another caſe reported by the ſame author ſir John Strange 703, the king againſt Rhodes, that came before the King's Bench, when ſir Robert Raymond was the chief juſtice. That was upon an indictment likewiſe upon a forgery for having forged a will. That will had been proved in the eccleſiaſtical courts. My lords, it appears by this Report, that it was not only a probate in the common form, it was when there had been a long litigation in the eccleſiaſtical courts, and when by a decree of the court of Delegates the will was pronounced for. Upon application to the King's Bench for a Habeas Corpus ad teſtificandum, the court there decreed not to iſſue the writ for this reaſon, becauſe it appeared that there was then exiſting a direct ſentence for the will; and that ſentence, if it had been pleaded in bar to going into the queſtion of forgery, I apprehend, would have been allowed to be concluſive evidence: for the court ſaid, it was not fitting to determine the property on an indictment. It likewiſe appeared, that though there had been a ſentence of the court of Delegates pronouncing for the will, that yet there had been an application for a commiſſion of review; ſo that it was within the knowledge of the court that the cauſe was in a means of having a reviſion. But it was underſtood that the ſentence ſtill remained perfectly in force; for your lordſhips know perfectly well the difference between an appeal and an application for a commiſſion of review: in caſe of an appeal, the ſentence is ſuſpended, but not ſo on an application for a commiſſion of review. By the ſtatute of Henry VIII. it is provided, that the ſentence of the Delegates ſhall be final, and no appeal ſhall be had from them; but it is now indiſputable law that the king may by his royal prerogative, upon a perſonal application, and a ſpecial caſe laid, direct a commiſſion for reviewing the ſentence: but there is no appeal; the ſentence remains the ſame, unleſs the reviewers in their judgment ſhall think proper to reverse it. In this caſe it appears, that there was then exiſting a full and direct ſentence upon the validity of that will. It was underſtood then that this right had been pleaded by the defendant, and the chief juſtice ſtopped the proceeding, and did not even grant that motion which was then ſent. Theſe two caſes, I am told, have been recognized again in that court in a very late caſe of a man who was executed for a forgery, one Perry; and I am told the judge at that trial offered to the priſoner to put off his trial, if he had a mind to make uſe of that plea: but I am told, it was not accepted by the priſoner, and the trial went on. But this I am ſure, no uſe can be made of that caſe to ſhew, that the former determinations were at all impeached by it; becauſe at leaſt, if the probate was not inſiſted on by the defendant, conſequently not over-ruled by the court, theſe caſes then remain in their full force. And I will aſk, in what manner they may be ſaid not to be applicable to the principle we are contending for, that in a criminal court caſes of this ſort ought not to be gone into? Will it be ſaid, that this being a proſecution under a ſpecial act of parliament, the crime conſiſts in having married two perſons, that the marriage muſt neceſſarily come under the conſideration of that court which is to determine? and they cannot by the act of parliament itſelf acquire an original jurisdiction to enquire into the right of marriage. Does not it apply exactly as ſtrong to the caſe I have now alluded to of forging a will? for it is by expreſs act of parliament made a felony of death to forge a will; and it may as well be argued from hence, that every criminal court has by that act acquired an original jurisdiction as to wills. It cannot be argued a moment, that a criminal court has original jurisdiction of marriage. I do not ſay, when it has not been determined determined before, but that the court muſt neceſſarily enquire into the fact; but that it cannot originally entertain ſuch a queſtion. Now there cannot be a caſe ſtated wherein a queſtion was between the parties upon the validity of their marriage and upon their ſtate of man and wife, to ſhew that it can be determined by a criminal court. If it cannot, I conceive clearly, it cannot be ſaid to have original juriſdiction upon the point, the fraud and colluſion; which, for the reaſon that has been given, it was thought proper to mention, left it ſhould be made uſe of upon the other ſide. It will be ſaid perhaps, that there are many inſtances where parties trying to avail themſelves of a judgment, or the ſentence of another court, of the adverſe parties being allowed to ſhew that thoſe ſentences were obtained colluſively: this diſtinction I conceive has been made. If any court ever is permitted to enquire into the queſtion, it muſt be a court having concurrent juriſdiction; and then your lordſhips will ſee the queſtion upon very different grounds; becauſe a court having concurrent juriſdiction has alſo the opportunities, all the methods of enquiring into the original queſtion. They being competent to determine the original point, it makes no conſiderable difference whether it comes before them at firſt, or whether it has before been determined by another court. It will not be contended, I conceive, that a criminal court has any concurrent juriſdiction with the Eccleſiaſtical Court. It clearly cannot be ſo; it can never entertain the abſtract queſtion between parties, whether they are man and wife or no. The only way it can be taken up is incidentally; and if the authorities are good to ſhew, that where an incidental queſtion ariſes, if it has been determined by a court having original juriſdiction, it ought to be concluſive, that will apply to the caſe now before the court. For theſe reaſons, and for thoſe that have been more weightily argued by the gentlemen who have gone before me, I hope your lordſhips will not think proper to recede from the eſtabliſhed and legal principles, or make a precedent on this occaſion. But if whatever has been, was upon the ſtrength of former determinations; and if there is good ground in law to ſay that this ſentence ought to be concluſive to the point to which it is now offered; I truſt your lordſhips will be of opinion that the proſecution ought not to be permitted to go into any evidence.

Doct^r Wynne.

Notwithſtanding there has been ſo much and ſo ably ſaid upon this queſtion, I hope that the duty I owe to the noble perſon at your lordſhips bar, will plead my excuſe for offering a few words upon the ſame ſide, in ſupport of the ſentence of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, of the effect with a view to which it is now produced before your lordſhips.

My lords, the duchefs of Kingſton is now upon her trial, upon an indictment found againſt her grounded on ſtatute 1 Jac. cap. 11, for that being the wife of Auguſtus John Hervey, ſhe married the duke of Kingſton, the ſaid Auguſtus John Hervey, her former husband, being then alive. The foundation of this whole proceeding therefore is a marriage alledged in the indictment to have been had between the duchefs of Kingſton, at that time Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh, and Mr. Auguſtus Hervey.

That marriage, my lords, is the only fact that can make any criminality in the preſent caſe; and if it ſhall appear to your lordſhips a fact, which has been already enquired into and decided upon; that it has been put in iſſue in that court which alone could properly take cognizance of it; that that court has pronounced its ſentence againſt the marriage then put in iſſue, or any matrimonial contract between Mr. Hervey and Mrs. Chudleigh, who were the parties to that ſuit; and that this ſentence ſtill remains in force; it is ſubmitted to your lordſhips to be impoſſible that thoſe who are proſecuting this indictment againſt her grace, can be allowed to go into an examination of witneſſes upon that marriage; it being a fact now decided by the legal ſentence of a proper court, and conſequently not the ſubject of that kind of evidence which the proſecutors are, we preſume, endeavouring to offer to your lordſhips upon it, as if it had been a queſtion upon which no ſentence had ever been given.

My lords, the ſentence, upon which we rely, was paſſed in the month of February 1769, and it recites all the proceedings had in that cauſe prior to the ſentence, and which are ſufficient, as we apprehend, to ſound that effect which we contend it ought to have before your lordſhips. The ſentence recites, that a ſuit had been brought by the duchefs of Kingſton againſt Mr. Hervey for boaiſting that he was her husband; that Mr. Hervey appeared in that cauſe; that he admitted and juſtified the jactitation; and alledged, that he was well warranted in making ſuch jactitation, for that he was actually married to the lady: by that means they were at iſſue upon the fact. The ſentence goes on to ſay, that he had entirely failed in the proof of the marriage which he had pleaded and propounded; in conſequence of which the court pronounces Mrs. Chudleigh to be entirely free from all matrimonial contract, and particularly with the ſaid Mr. Hervey, ſo far as to us as yet appears; and upon that goes on to admoniſh him to ceaſe from farther jactitating in that behalf. The queſtion now for your lordſhips conſideration therefore is, what is the effect of that ſentence? And I contend, that in the way in which this cauſe was proceeded in, it is as deciſive, as abſolute a ſentence againſt the marriage, as the Eccleſiaſtical Court has power to give.

If the party who is accuſed in ſuch a ſuit does not juſtify the jactitation by pleading a marriage, it is otherwiſe; for in that caſe, whether the fact of jactitation is admitted or denied, the ſentence is only upon the jactitation, not upon the marriage. If the jactitation is admitted, and is not juſtified, the party is admoniſhed to do ſo no more: if the jactitation is denied, the only queſtion before the court is, did the party jactitate or not? and if the jactitation is proved, the ſentence is the ſame, viz. a monition to ceaſe from doing ſo for the future. But if the party cited confeſſes the jactitation; and juſtifies it by pleading that he or ſhe was and is actually and lawfully married to the other party who has brought the ſuit, it is no longer a cauſe of jactitation, it is as much and as directly a marriage cauſe as a cauſe of nullity of marriage, or a cauſe for reſtitution of conjugal rights. It is as abſolute and deciſive proof of this, in my humble apprehenſion, that if the party cited in a cauſe of jactitation pleads and proves a marriage, the court does not in that caſe diſmiſs, and ſay, The party it is true jactitated, and had a ground for jactitating, therefore we diſmiſs: no, the court pronounces for the marriage. And I take it to be moſt clear, that ſuch a ſentence having been pronounced in any eccleſiaſtical court, if the party cited ſhould immediately pray reſtitution of conjugal rights, the court will grant its monition grounded upon that ſentence, that the parties who were proved to have been lawfully married, ſhould cohabit and perform the duties of their marriage. It will not I preſume be contended, that any court can deal ſo very unequal a meaſure of juſtice between parties, as to ſay, If a marriage is proved, we will pronounce for it; and yet in a cauſe of exactly the ſame nature, if a party pleads a marriage, and fails in the proof of it, we will not pronounce againſt it. The ſuppoſition is abſurd and ſhocking to common ſenſe; and it is impoſſible that ſuch a cauſe as a cauſe of jactitation could ever have been in uſe, if the party who brought it might loſe his cauſe, and be engaged in a marriage he was deſirous to avoid, but could never obtain any ſentence againſt the party jactitating, that would have any legal effect. It is impoſſible, with great deference to your lordſhips, that ſuch doctrine ſhould ever have obtained; but the truth is directly the reverſe, and in all courts where theſe ſentences againſt a marriage in a cauſe of jactitation have been produced, they have been allowed to be as deciſive as any ſentence in an eccleſiaſtical court in a marriage cauſe could be. In the caſe of Jones and Bow, reported in Cartwright, it is expreſſly ſaid, that it was a cauſe of jactitation. In the caſe of Clews and Bathurſt, which has been mentioned to your lordſhips, it was a cauſe of jactitation; and I rather rely upon that caſe, becauſe it appears by the report of it in the book intitled Caſes in lord Hardwicke's time, p. 11. Hil. 7. Geo. II. that it was attended by as able a civilian as any of his time, doct^r Lee, afterwards dean of the Archdeacon: he argued in that caſe, that a ſentence againſt a marriage in a cauſe of jactitation is an abſolute and deciſive ſentence. And it appears from the Report, that he quoted another caſe, which was that of Mellifant and Mellifant; in which it had been ſo held in the court of Delegates, which your lordſhips know is a court of appeal in eccleſiaſtical cauſes, in which there are both judges of the common law and civilians. The caſe which was laſt alluded to, and which was in the Prerogative Court, your lordſhips will allow me to ſtate a little more fully, becauſe it will ſhew the opinion of the great judge who now preſides in that court. It was upon the right of adminiſtration to one Mrs. Gertrude Brown. The queſtion was between Stephen Brown, who alledged himſelf to be the husband, and the lady viſcounteſs Mayo, the daughter of the deceased by a former husband. The marriage between Brown and Mrs. Aylemore, which was the deceased's former name, was not denied; but lady Mayo inſiſted, that at the time of the marriage with Mrs. Aylemore, Mr. Brown had another wife at that time living, whoſe name was Eleanor Cutts. Mr. Brown to that replied, that he had brought a cauſe of jactitation in the Conſistory Court of London againſt Mrs. Eleanor Cutts, and that ſentence had been pronounced exactly as in the preſent caſe, and that he was free of all matrimonial contracts with ſaid Elizabeth Cutts. Lady Mayo then offered an allegation, in which ſhe pleaded, that the ſentence in ſuch cauſe of jactitation had been obtained by colluſion; and annexed to that allegation ſhe exhibited many letters between Stephen Brown and Elizabeth Cutts, by which it appeared, that after the date of the ſentence they had correſponded together; that he had acknowledged himſelf to be her husband in ſeveral of theſe letters, but told her it would be exceedingly inconvenient to his affairs, and entirely deſtroy his claim to the adminiſtration of Mrs. Aylemore, which was of ſome conſiderable value to him, if his marriage with Mrs. Cutts was known, and therefore deſired her to be ſilent, and not give him any further trouble: that was the effect of lady Mayo's allegation. The moment that allegation was brought into court, the proctor for Brown deſired that the proctor for lady Mayo might be asked, whether he confeſſed or denied the ſubſcription of the officer who authenticated the copy of the ſentence given in the cauſe of jactitation? which being confeſſed, and the ſentence by that means regularly proved, the judge ſaid he could go no farther; he could not enquire upon what grounds that ſentence was given, but would give a time to the party, if ſhe thought it for her intereſt to apply to the Conſistory Court of London, and ſee whether that ſentence could be reverſed; but it was held, that ſo long as it remained in force, it was deciſive upon the queſtion of the marriage, and abſolutely binding upon the judge of the Prerogative Court.

This being the caſe then, the queſtion for your lordſhips conſideration now is; what effect the ſentence given in the Conſistory Court of London in 1769, in the cauſe of jactitation of marriage brought by the duchefs of Kingſton, then Mrs. Elizabeth Chudleigh, againſt Mr. Hervey, ſhould have in the preſent cauſe before your lordſhips? My lords, it would be a very unpardonable waſte of your lordſhips time, at this hour of the day, for me to take up a moment of it in arguing, that marriage is by the law and conſtitution of this country of eccleſiaſtical cognizance. There cannot be a doubt, that if there be any impediment to the marriage of two people living together as man and wife, that if one of the parties denies either the fact or validity of the marriage, that if one of the parties reſuſes to perform the duties of it by cohabitation, that if one of the parties treats the other with intolerable ſeverity, that if a perſon boaiſts of a marriage which he cannot juſtify, or if ſome kind of contract or ſolemnity paſſed between parties which may occaſion a doubt whether it amounts to a lawful marriage or not; in every one of theſe caſes the Eccleſiaſtical Court has cognizance to decide upon the queſtions that ariſe; and it is a denial of juſtice to reſuſe it, and would be a juſt ground of appeal to a ſuperior court.

It is true, that in some cases where a marriage is brought not directly, but collaterally and consequentially in question, as where it is a question of legitimacy in order to make a title to an inheritance, it may originally commence in the temporal courts, and sometimes is finally determined there; as in the case of what is by common law called special bastardy, that is, where there is no doubt about the marriage, but about the priority or posteriority of the birth of the party who is claiming the inheritance to that marriage; there, it being a mere matter of fact, whether the person was born before marriage or after, it is proper for the jury to determine; and there is no need of the interposition of the Ecclesiastical Court at all. So in other cases, where the matter begins as a question upon an inheritance. A person makes a claim to an inheritance as being the lawful son of A. and B. If the parties to the marriage or one of them be dead, the application must be made originally in this case to the temporal courts, and they will proceed in it, and will either determine it finally, or direct a case to the ordinary to certify upon the marriage, according as they find it necessary to do, and according as any question arises upon the legality of the marriage or not. But even in this case, which is merely a question upon a right to an inheritance, and not between parties to a marriage, but between parties claiming under a marriage, if one of them produces a sentence formerly given upon the marriage by the Ecclesiastical Court in the life-time of the parties to such marriage, the moment that sentence is produced, the court of common law is elopped; and notwithstanding the original parties to that sentence are dead, the parties to the suit upon the inheritance must still have recourse to the Ecclesiastical Court to repeal the sentence formerly given upon the marriage, before the temporal court can proceed a step further: and if this sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court is not set aside, the judgment of the temporal court must be agreeable to that sentence. The cases of Bunting and Leppingwell, and Kenn's case, reported by lord Coke, are decisive upon this point: and it would, I should conceive, in framing your opinion upon the credit due to the doctrine laid down in these cases, be worth one moment's consideration at what time the latest of them was determined. Kenn's case was in the fifth of king James the first. Your lordships know extremely well, that was a time when the different jurisdictions of the temporal and ecclesiastical courts were not so completely settled, or at least that settlement was not so completely acquiesced in, on the part of the ecclesiastical courts then, as it has been since: they did frequently desire to arrogate to themselves more jurisdiction than the temporal courts were willing to allow; and the consequence of that was, they were very frequently withstood. This produced a complaint to the privy-council in the 3d of king James I. when archbishop Bancroft, in the name of the whole clergy, exhibited a set of articles against the judges of the realm (as lord Coke expresses it, 2d Inst. 60r.) intitled, 'certain articles of abuses which are desired to be reformed in granting prohibitions.' These articles were delivered to the judges, who in the 4th of king James made their reply to them; in which they justified the proceedings objected to by the archbishop in every particular, and that not without some considerable degree of warmth and resentment. Now, with great deference to your lordships, I should conceive, that a resolution solemnly and unanimously made by the two chief justices and five other judges of the common law in the very next year after such a dispute as this had been carried on between the two jurisdictions, cannot well be suspected of partiality to the Ecclesiastical Court: and lord chief justice Coke, who was one of the court, was not a judge that would at any time have stood up for their encroachments; and therefore there is not the least room to apprehend, that there was any undue or improper degree of authority attributed by that resolution of the judges to sentences of the ecclesiastical courts.

My lords, this case of Kenn, which is reported 7 Coke, 43, has been already opened to your lordships: but it being in my apprehension extremely material in this cause, containing the whole learning that is to be met with in the book upon the subject, and going the whole length, as I humbly submit to your lordships it does, that it is our business to contend for in behalf of the noble person at the bar, your lordships will not perhaps think it mispent time in me to state it more particularly. It was a case in the court of Wards, in which Thomas Robertson and Elizabeth his wife were plaintiffs, and Florence lady Stallenge defendant. The case was, that Christopher Kenn de facto took to wife Elizabeth Stowell, and had issue by her Martha; soon after this, there appears to have been a suit brought in the court of Audience, in which the judgment given was in these words: præsum contractum et matrimonium inter Chr. Kenn et Eliz. Stowel in minore ætate eorum aut eorum alterius habitum fuisse: eisdemque Chr. et Eliz. tam tempore solemnizationis dicti matrimonii quam etiam continuo postea, eidem matrimonio dissensisse, ac eo prætextu hujusmodi matrimonium irritum et invalidum fuisse: necnon antedictos Chr. Kenn et Eliz. Stowel ab dicto matrimonio separandos et divorciandos fore pronunciamus, eosque separamus et divorciamus, iisdemque Chr. et Eliz. libertatem ad alia vota convolvendi concedimus per hanc sententiam nostram definitivam.

My lords, after this Kenn married another wife, Elizabeth Beckwith; and after this it appears that Elizabeth Beckwith brought a suit before the commissioners ecclesiastical to enquire again into the validity of the marriage between Christopher Kenn and Elizabeth Stowell: there that marriage was again pronounced against, and the marriage of Christopher Kenn with Elizabeth Beckwith was affirmed. Then Elizabeth Beckwith died, and Christopher Kenn married Florence, by whom he had issue Elizabeth, and then died. At last the question came on between the issue of Christopher Kenn by Florence, and Martha the issue of said Christopher Kenn by his first wife Elizabeth Stowell, who desired she might be permitted to aver against the sentence formerly given against the marriage between Christopher Kenn and Elizabeth Stowell, declaring that she could prove, that the whole was founded on an absolute falsehood; and that those parties, who are declared by the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court to have been married in their minority, and to have dissented to the marriage in the moment it was solemnized, and ever after, had cohabited as husband and wife for ten years, and had issue Martha, the party before the court. This the said party averred, and undertook to prove in the court of Wards, in order to avoid the effect of the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court against the marriage between her father and mother. But it was resolved by all the justices and barons, that the said sentence should conclude as long as it remained in force. And in answer to the averment that the sentence was founded upon false facts, they said, that though the ecclesiastical judge sheweth the cause of his sentence, yet forasmuch as he is judge of the original matter, the loyalty of matrimony, we shall never examine the cause, whether it were true or not: for of things the cognizance whereof belongeth to the Ecclesiastical Court, we must give credit to their sentences, as they give to the judgments in our courts. In that same case it was, that lord Coke quoted the case of Corbett, and there there had been no sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court: that originally began upon the question of a right to an inheritance; and the party who claimed the inheritance was advised to bring a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court then against a woman who jactitated, as he said, of an undue marriage with his elder brother. The party against whom this suit was brought in the Ecclesiastical Court applied for a prohibition, and the temporal court granted it; for they said, There is no sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court in this case for you to reverse, no sentence has been given; therefore we will enquire, as far as we see we can do without interfering in matters of mere ecclesiastical cognizance, respecting the loyalty of the marriage; and we may direct the ordinary to certify hereafter, if there is a necessity for it; but there is no need to apply to the Ecclesiastical Court in the present state of the case.

In exact conformity to this principle, it was resolved by the judges of the common law in the case of Bunting and Leppingwell, 4th Coke, 29. Forasmuch as the cognizance of the right of marriage doth belong to the Ecclesiastical Court, and the same court hath given sentence in this case, the judges of our law ought (although it be against the reason of our law) to give faith and credit to their proceedings and sentences, and so always have the judges of our law done: and so it was resolved, that the plaintiff was legitimate and no bastard.

This is the light in which the sentences of the ecclesiastical courts, given in matters properly within their cognizance, were considered in the courts of common law at the time when the cases I have just referred to were determined; and there is such a train of cases exactly conformable to them down to very modern times, which have been already quoted, and therefore I will not trouble your lordships with repeating them, that I cannot help thinking it must be looked upon as a point absolutely settled and at rest.

But, my lords, not to rest the matter merely upon authority, however strong, if your lordships consider the grounds upon which these determinations were made, I apprehend they will be founded, not only in justice, but in absolute necessity; and that the confusion would have been so infinitely great, if, admitting different courts to take cognizance of different matters, their sentences should not be allowed to take effect when they were given, but the matter might be examined over again, and a different sentence given in another court, the former sentence remaining unrepealed, that there would be no possibility of enduring such a practice. Consider for a moment what effect it would have. Suppose a man to have brought a suit for jactitation of marriage against a woman in the proper ecclesiastical court; that she should plead her marriage by way of justification, and obtain a sentence for it: the man dies intestate after that, and she applies to the Prerogative Court for an administration as the widow: the next of kin of the deceased appears there, and denies her to be the lawful widow; in proof of which she produces the sentence: is the Prerogative Court to give credit to this sentence or not? If it is to give credit to it, (as it does daily) the reason is, because it binds universally as long as it is in force; for, though they are both ecclesiastical courts, there is no more privacy between the Prerogative Court and the Consistory Court of any diocese, than between the Prerogative and the court of King's Bench. The Prerogative Court has the mere cognizance over probate and administration; and therefore if universal credit is not due to the sentence of the court which pronounced for the validity of the marriage, the Prerogative Court must in the case supposed go into the question over again, whether the party deceased and the party claiming to be his widow were married or not married. The Prerogative Court is an ecclesiastical court, and proceeds upon the same rules, so far as they are applicable; it proceeds in the same manner by allegation and by written evidence; the judge is a person bred in the same profession; and the practicers are the same with those that practise in the Consistory Court of London; and therefore there is a probability that the Prerogative Court in this case might agree with the judge of the Consistory in opinion that the marriage was a good one, and consequently decree the administration to the party praying it as the widow. What would be the consequence of that? Why, the party would have had two law-suits instead of one, and have got by them two pieces of paper called sentences for her marriage, and letters of administration, but she would not be a bit the nearer getting possession of the deceased's effects. For these she must apply to a court of common law; and there, according to this doctrine, the first person she is obliged to bring an action against will be at liberty to say, Who are you?—The administratrix and widow.—No, I deny that: it is true, you have obtained a sentence for your marriage and an administration from the Prerogative Court as the widow; but those sentences were founded upon false facts: therefore I object to them, and desire there may be a third suit, to have it inquired into in this court, whether there was a real marriage or not. Now, supposing that in this third suit a jury should be of a different opinion from the two former courts, what would be the consequence? Why, that the party who brought a suit for a debt would be non-suited: so that here would be a legal administration subsisting (unless the court in which the action was brought could repeal it and grant a new one, a power which I believe no temporal court has ever yet exercised) but the hands of the administrator would be absolutely tied up, the effects could never be administered, the debts of the testator could never be called in, the estate could never be distributed. Your lordships see plainly that the confusion would be so extreme, if this doctrine was to prevail, that no error in a sentence, however apparent, nor any inconvenience arising from it to particular persons, however great, can be a sufficient cause for any court to examine into the merits of a sentence given in a matter of which itself has no legal cognizance; and that there is the utmost wisdom in those resolutions which declare, that there is an implicit credit due from all other courts to the sentences of courts having the proper jurisdiction over the matter in which the sentence has been pronounced.

My lords, the cases that I have hitherto mentioned and alluded to have been all in civil causes. Will it be said, that the question now before your lordships, being in a criminal cause, that varies the case? and, that although a sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court would be binding and conclusive evidence in a civil cause, yet in a criminal cause it would not have the same effect? My lords, the same effect I can very readily agree that, according to my poor notions of law and justice, it would not have; but I should think it would have ten times greater: and I cannot conceive it possible, that it can be held in any case, or in any country in the world, that a sentence, which would be held to be conclusive evidence to avoid a civil demand against a person, would not be held to be conclusive evidence and defence against a criminal prosecution: I cannot conceive that to be possible. In penalibus causis benignius interpretandum est, is a maxim of universal law. Undoubtedly it is the business of all criminal judicatures to enquire strictly into crimes; to punish those acts which the law has made criminal, and which are legally proved; but courts of law do not strain points in order to make crimes, and inflict punishments; it never was so contended: and I do conceive that many instances might be enumerated by those who are conversant in the practice of the criminal law, which I am not in the least, in which parties prosecuted are indulged with peculiar privileges. I believe that they are not bound by their first plea. If a party has been ill-advised in his plea, he is bound down by that in a civil cause; but in criminal prosecutions the prisoner may plead over and over again, and is allowed to avail himself of every nicety in the law to avoid conviction.

Upon these grounds therefore I hope it will appear to your lordships to be most clear, that the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court always has been esteemed and must be allowed to be final, to be the only evidence that can be received concerning the fact upon which it has been pronounced, and that the fact is no longer the legal object of enquiry by any other court. I do apprehend this to be so clearly and fully established, that I can scarce conceive that the gentlemen will deny it; but I apprehend and do expect that they will endeavour to find a distinction. And they will say, Though we should admit your rule, that the sentence of an ecclesiastical court is binding so long as it subsists in general, yet if that sentence was obtained by collusion and fraud, it is otherwise; and if it can be proved to have been so obtained, it will immediately lose its effect. I expect we shall be so told; and I do admit, that to maintain our present point, which is, that the sentence is conclusive evidence, we must say that it is a rule without any exception; we must say, that collusion in obtaining the sentence would not give your lordships any jurisdiction to enquire into the fact: and I do, with great submission, contend before your lordships, that no court which has not an absolute and an entire jurisdiction over a fact, as much as the former court had, can take cognizance of a matter that has been already decided upon in that former court, upon a suggestion or even proof that collusion was used in obtaining the former sentence. I may, and I am afraid I shall, talk very ignorantly respecting those cases in which the courts of common law take cognizance of matters which have been already decided upon by other courts, upon proof that the decision was obtained by fraud and collusion of the parties at that time before the court. I own I am by no means master of that subject; but I apprehend they are only in such cases where each court, suppose the court of King's Bench and Common Pleas, or any other, has an entire concurrence of jurisdiction; where there was an option in the parties to commence the suit originally either in one court or the other, and where the effect of the sentence of the two courts would be perfectly equal. In such a case, if after sentence given in one of those courts application should be made to the other to rehear the matter, on proof that the former decision was not fairly obtained, this might be a just ground for the court to which proof of the fraud is offered, to say, We will hear the matter over again, which we had a right to have heard as well as the other court had, had it not been that the cause was commenced with them: but I apprehend no court can do this, the sentence of which, when it is given, will not have the same legal effect to the full as the sentence of the former court. Nor can it be said that this court, high and august as it is, or any other court of criminal jurisdiction, can give a sentence upon a marriage, which will have all the effects that the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court will have. Strip the question of its circumstances, and let it be asked simply, Has the house of lords a power to try the validity of a marriage? Every body will say at once, It has not. Allow me to consider what would be the consequence if your lordships were to take cognizance of this matter, and were, notwithstanding the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court, upon the suggestion of collusion, or any other suggestion, to say, We are not barred by it, we will go into it; and that the party tried under such circumstances should be convicted of polygamy: what would be the consequence of that? Would it set aside the second marriage? I take it most clearly it would not. Suppose that after the wife had been convicted of polygamy for marrying B. in the life-time of A. her former husband (a sentence against her marriage with A. having first been obtained in the Ecclesiastical Court) she should by any means become entitled to a fortune, by legitimacy or otherwise, would not B. have a right to demand the legacy, or any other effects that came to the woman subsequent to the conviction? I submit to your lordships, he certainly would. Suppose B. to die intestate, might not the wife, notwithstanding such a conviction as this, pray the administration to his effects? and if her interest as widow was denied, as having been the wife of A. at the time she married B. and she in reply to this should produce the sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court against her marriage with

A. bearing date prior to her marriage with B. the court could not refuse to grant administration to her. Suppose that after the conviction the parties to the second marriage should continue to cohabit, and should have children, would not they be entitled to the inheritance as the legitimate issue of the second marriage? I take it, that under the authority of the cases of Bunting and Leppingwell, Kenn, and the rest that have been since determined conformably to those cases, there cannot be a doubt that they would, if a question should arise upon the right to the inheritance in a court of common law, so long as the ecclesiastical sentence against the first marriage remained in force: in short, the conviction would have no operation at all upon any civil effect of the second marriage. The consequence therefore of proceeding to convict for polygamy for a second marriage, in a case where there had been a sentence of the proper ecclesiastical court against the first, would be, that a woman who had been convicted of felony for marrying, might under that criminal act (as it would then be pronounced to be) derive to herself all the privileges and advantages that accrue to a wife in the fortune of her husband by a lawful marriage, and convey a title to her issue to the greatest honours and estate in the kingdom. These are such glaring contradictions and absurdities, as I should with great deference apprehend that neither your lordships, nor any other court of justice, would give occasion to, without the utmost reluctance. There is a case or two which have not yet been mentioned, and which appear to me to be extremely material, to shew the extraordinary and unusual steps that have been sometimes taken by courts, and in cases extremely similar to the present, to avoid a contrariety of sentences of courts having different and distinct jurisdiction. In the case of Boyle and Boyle, in the King's Bench in 1687, reported 3d Mod. 164. a libel was admitted in the Spiritual Court against a woman causa jactitationis maritagi. The woman prayed a prohibition to the Ecclesiastical Court; and the suggestion was, that this person, who now libelled against her in a cause of jactitation, had been indicted at the sessions in the Old-Bailey for marrying her, he having a wife then living; that he was thereupon convicted, and had judgment to be burnt in the hand; that therefore they had no right to proceed, and therefore a prohibition was prayed. Serjeant Levent in that case moved for a consultation, because no court but the Ecclesiastical Court can examine the marriage. Upon the contrary it was said, that if a prohibition should not go, then the authority of these two courts would interfere, which might be a thing of ill consequence: that if the lawfulness of this marriage had been first tried in the court christian, the other court at the Old-Bailey would have given credit to their sentence, and upon this ground and this principle merely, that there might be a contrariety of sentences, which would be mischievous. The court went certainly a great way, for it prohibited the Ecclesiastical Court from proceeding in a marriage cause inter vivos, of which it has the clearest and most uncontroverted jurisdiction.

My lords, another case was that of Furman and Furman, which began in the Consistory Court of Exeter: it was a cause of restitution of conjugal rights brought by the woman. The libel was admitted; and then there was an appeal to the court of Archies. The judge pronounced for the appeal, and was proceeding upon the merits of the cause; but upon the 4th of November 1727, he was served with a prohibition. And the ground for obtaining this prohibition was, that Sarah Furman, pretending to be the lawful wife of the said Furman, had indicted him for bigamy in marrying another wife, and failed in proof of her own marriage; whereupon the said Furman was acquitted; and therefore it was said the Ecclesiastical Court should not proceed. Now, my lords, if a prior judgment given by a court, in a matter in which it can have only an incidental partial jurisdiction, is a sufficient cause for stopping all subsequent proceeding in the same case, even in the court which has the entire ordinary jurisdiction over the question, on account of the ill consequence that would ensue from the interference of the authority of the two courts; surely, by all parity of reasoning, in a case where it appears that the court, which the law and constitution have entrusted with the entire jurisdiction over the matter in question, has already taken cognizance of it and pronounced its sentence, the court of incidental jurisdiction will give credit to such sentence, and conform its own sentence to it.

If the ill consequences arising from clashing and contradictory judgments of different courts may be allowed to have any influence upon your lordships judgment in this matter, there is no need to rack the invention for circumstances that might happen: the case before your lordships need but be plainly stated, to shew those inconveniencies in the strongest light. The sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court pronouncing and declaring the noble prisoner to be free from all matrimonial contracts with Mr. Harvey, was given in February 1769: soon after, she married the duke of Kingston under the dispensation that is usually granted for the marriage of persons of that rank. Under this marriage the duke and duchess cohabited between four and five years as husband and wife; at the expiration of which the duke of Kingston died, having first made his will, by which he gave the most affectionate and most honourable testimony of his considering her as his wife. At last, in July 1775, comes a bill of indictment, which is to set the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court entirely at nought, and to brand this open and solemn marriage, confirmed by a cohabitation and reputation of so many years, with the name of a felony.

My lords, if this indictment should be proceeded upon, and the fact of the first marriage found differently from what appeared to the chancellor of London at the time of pronouncing his sentence upon it, the confusion, the scandal (I think I may venture to call it) that would arise from the contrariety of the two sentences that would then be pronounced, and both still in force, would be such, that I cannot conceive that any court of justice would hazard it, upon any suggestion or apprehension of error in the former sentence, or fraud in obtaining it; and which was irremediable by any other means, or any other the most striking or plausible argument that could be urged to induce them to it. But the plea of the necessity of doing an extraordinary act to set aside an improper sentence, or the effect of such a sentence, is certainly less applicable to the Ecclesiastical Court, than to any other court known in this kingdom; and least of all is it applicable pleable to their proceedings in marriage causes. There is a course of appeal in the ecclesiastical courts, a deliberation in their proceedings, that is unknown to any court in this kingdom; from the archidiaconal court (if the cause be originally instituted there) to the consistory of the diocese; from thence to the metropolitan court, which is the court of Archies; from thence to the king in his court of Chancery; from which a commission of Delegates, to hear appeals, issues ex debito iustitiæ: in every one of these courts the parties are not bound down to what has been given in evidence in the court below: it is not merely error in law, but error in fact likewise may be corrected upon appeal in the Ecclesiastical Court; and if there are any facts material to the point in issue, that have not been pleaded and examined to in the inferior court, they may be pleaded and given in evidence in the Court of Appeal; and so down to the last court. Besides this, in every one of these courts it is not a matter confined to the two parties that institute the suit, and therefore may carry it on collusively; for in any period of the cause a third person, that has any interest in the matter in question, if he sees that the two original parties are colluding, or that one of them is negligent, or if he has any other reason to be dissatisfied with the manner in which the business is conducted, he may intervene for his interest, and the court must ex debito iustitiæ admit him to do so; he may give in a plea, if he intervenes before the cause is concluded; he may examine his own witnesses, and act in all respects as a party in the cause. What possible human means of providing against collusion and surprize is omitted out of this method of proceeding! But, my lords, even this is not all; for when the cause has run this great length, application may be made to his majesty in council, who, if he is advised that there is a ground for it, has a power ex gratia to grant a commission to review the whole matter over again. From this view of the method of proceeding in ecclesiastical courts, I apprehend it will appear to your lordships, that they are not so ill provided with means either to avoid, or to reform errors in their judgments, as to stand in need of the extraordinary interposition of other courts, in any matters that are properly within their jurisdiction; but least of all is this necessary in a marriage cause, for a marriage cause is never at an end: let the cause have been argued ever so often, let it have been sifted with the most scrupulous exactness and attention, let there have been one or more appeals, let every step have been taken that can be taken to give a final and conclusive judgment, still the same party may come before the court, and say, The court has been imposed upon; I desire this matter may be examined over again. The court, upon such application, would and must take cognizance of it.

I will trouble your lordships with quoting but one authority for this, which is that of Sanchez in his treatise de Matrimonio, lib. 7. disp. 100. c. 1. who lays it down in these positive and explicit terms: 'Id in matrimonio speciale est, ut sententia in conjugali causa lata, quacunque circumstantione præmissa, sive bis ab ea provocatum fuerit confirmataque sit, sive lapsus terminus ad appellandum sit, nunquam transeat in rem judicatam, ac proinde non ita efficacem auctoritatem sortitur, quin retractanda sit, quoties commotum fuerit eam errore quodam latam fuisse.' And the reason assigned for making this material and singular distinction between marriage causes and all other causes is, that in general the consent of the party who does not appeal from a sentence which is given against him, gives force and authority to the sentence, though there might otherwise be a ground for him to complain of it. But, says the author before quoted, 'sententia per errorem lata in causa conjugali, transiens in rem judicatam, soveret peccatum, separando veros conjuges, vel uniendo eos qui tales esse nequeunt: at nullum vinculum quantumcumque multiplicatum, potest firmare actum, ex quo peccatum consurgit.'

The same doctrine is laid down in a multitude of other writers upon the canon law, of which there are waggon loads; but they are unanimous in establishing the maxim, 'sententiam in causa matrimoniali nunquam trahit in rem judicatam;' which I am sure your lordships will not hear denied or disputed by the other side.

From hence it will appear to your lordships, how little ground there is for that notion which seems to have got abroad, that the proceedings of the ecclesiastical courts in causes of jactitation, or any other causes, are such as tend to loosen the bonds of matrimony (which both in a civil and a religious light without doubt is the most essential bond of society) and give parties an opportunity of dissolving it at their pleasure. The court in these, as in all other cases, must determine secundum allegata et probata, according to the evidence before it: but where is the encouragement given to parties to collude, or what security can they have under a sentence obtained by fraud, when that fraud may at any future time be detected, by bringing forward that evidence which was before withheld, and, upon proof that the former sentence was erroneous, another of a direct contrary tendency will be given?

My lords, the marriage, which is the only fact in dispute in the present case, has many years ago been put in issue in the proper manner in the proper court, and a sentence given against it as decisive as any that court can give in a marriage cause: upon trust and confidence in that sentence it was, that the act was done for which the noble prisoner is now accused before your lordships; the sentence is produced, remaining in full force; and, for the reasons that have been urged, we humbly hope your lordships will be of opinion, that it is the only legal evidence that can now be given respecting the fact upon which the accusation is founded, and that your lordships will therefore receive it in bar of any other.

Then the lord high steward returned back to the chair.

Lord President of the Council. My lords, I move your lordships to adjourn to the chamber of parliament.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. This house is adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

The lords and others returned to the chamber of parliament in the same order they came down, except the lord high steward, who walked after his royal highness the duke of Cumberland; and, the house being thus resumed, resolved to proceed further in the trial of Elizabeth duchess-dowager of Kingston, in Westminster-hall, to-morrow at ten of the clock in the morning.

Tuesday, April 16. The Second Day.

THE lords and others came from the chamber of parliament in the same order as on Monday, except the lord high steward, who walked after his royal highness the duke of Cumberland, and the peers were there seated, and the lord high steward in his chair.

Lord High Steward. My lords, the house is resumed. Is it your lordships pleasure that the judges may be covered?

Lords. Ay, Ay.

Then the serjeant at arms made proclamation for silence as usual; and the duchess of Kingston being conducted to the bar,

Lord High Steward. Mr. Attorney-General, you may proceed.

Mr. Attorney-General.

My lords, I find myself engaged in a very singular debate; upon a point perfectly new in experience, analogous to no known rule of proceeding in similar cases, founded on no principle, none at least which has been stated.

The prisoner, being arraigned upon an indictment for felony, pleaded not guilty; upon which, issue was joined. In this state of the business she hath moved your lordships, that no evidence shall be given or stated to prove that guilt upon her, which she hath denied and put in issue.

The only case cited in support of so extraordinary a motion, that of Jones and Bow, Carth. 225, bears no relation or proportion to it. In the trial of an ejectment, the defendant, admitting the plaintiff's title to be otherwise clear, avoided it by a sentence against the pretended matrimony of his mother with Sir Robert Carr; after which both parties married with other persons; a sentence, unimpeached in form or substance, against his own mother, from whom he was to derive title to his state; decisive consequently as a fine with non-claim or any other perfect bar, and submitted to accordingly; for the plaintiff was called, and did not appear. Here, if the sentence should ever come properly under examination, it will appear to differ in all those respects.

In the mean time, instead of defending, this motion is only putting questions to your lordships, hypothetically, for opinion and advice how to order the defence. If this sentence be, as they argue it, a definitive and preclusive objection to all enquiry, the prisoner ought to have pleaded it in bar, and to have put the prosecutor upon dealing with her plea as he should be advised; or she may still rely upon it in evidence of not guilty. But without placing any such confidence in it themselves, they call upon your lordships to make it the foundation of an order to stop the trial.

My lords, to say that this is wholly unprecedented, goes a great way to conclude against it. To say that such a rule would be inconsistent with the plea, and repugnant to the record as it now stands, seems decisive. After putting herself for trial upon God and your lordships, she beseeches you not to hear her tried. But I shall not content myself with this answer; because, as your lordships have thought proper to hear counsel in support of this extraordinary motion, I am bound to suppose it a fit subject for argument, and to lay before your lordships my thoughts upon it as they occur.

Before I go into particular topics, I cannot help observing with some astonishment, the general ground which is given us to debate upon. Every species and colour of guilt, within the compass of the indictment, is necessarily admitted. So much more prudent it is thought to leave the worst to be imagined, than even to hear the actual state of her offence. Your lordships will therefore take the crime to be proved in the broadest extent of it, with every base and hateful aggravation it may admit; the first marriage solemnly celebrated, perfectly consummated; the second wickedly brought about by practising a concerted fraud upon a court of justice, to obtain a collusive sentence against the first; a circumstance of great aggravation. When Farr and Chadwick defended a burglarious breaking and entering, under a pretence of an execution, upon a judgment fraudulently obtained against the casual ejector, it was thought to aggravate their crime, and they suffered accordingly. I allude to the case in Kelyng, 43.

My lords, I take the ground so given me with this reserve, not that I wish to have her crime implied, from the conduct she is advised to hold here, to all purposes and conclusions; but that the necessity of the argument obliges me to assume it, as plainly and distinctly confessed, while this sentence is urged as an irrefragable bar to the trial, whatever may be the degree of her guilt, however such a sentence may have been obtained, and whether it tends to aggravate that guilt, or to extenuate it. The proposition looks so enormous, that it requires great abilities to give it any countenance, and the most irrefragable argument to force the conclusion.

I must also remind your lordships again, that the sentence has been read in this stage of the proceeding, by the consent of the prosecutor, and under the express reservation of his right to object to the competence of it, as evidence on the issue joined, unless he should think fit to make it part of his own cause; at present it stands admitted merely as the ground of this previous motion. The sentence being collusive, is a nullity. If fair, it could not be admitted against the king, who was no party to the suit. If admitted, it could not conclude in this sort of suit, which puts both marriages in issue. The objections arise from the general nature of the sentence propounded, which is never final; from the parties, who could not, by their act, bind any but themselves, or those who are represented by them, or at most those who might have intervened in the suit; from the nature of the present indictment, which puts the marriage directly in issue; from the circumstances peculiar to this sentence, which prove it to be collusive.

Without adverting much to those particulars, the learned counsel for the prisoner affected to lay down an universal proposition, that all sentences of peculiar jurisdictions are not only admissible, but conclusive evidence; and referred to many cases, of which I shall controvert nothing but the application.

The caſe of Burroughs and Jamineau, 2 Str. 733, is nothing to this purpoſe. That was a ſuppoſed contract by accepting a bill of exchange at Leghorn; which acceptance was void by the peculiar laws of that country, becauſe the drawer had failed without aſſets in the hands of the acceptor; and was pronounced to be ſo by a competent court in Leghorn. The plaintiff inſiſted upon it, becauſe, if the acceptance had been made here, it would have bound; but, according to the law of the place where it was made, the acceptance did not conſtitute a contract. The plaintiff might, if he had been adviſed otherwiſe, have defended that ſuit; he acquieſced in the deciſion.

Courts of Admiralty ſit between nation and nation. They proceed in rem, and they bind the property, not only againſt the apparent poſſeſſor, but all the world; or elſe the very exiſtence of the court would be ſubverted. Any body may claim; and proper monitions iſſue for that purpoſe: therefore, in the caſe of Hughes and Cornelius, the plaintiff failed in his action of trover; although the verdict found his property, and conſequently the ſentence of the French Admiralty erroneous; becauſe the court had no ſuch juriſdiction over that ſentence. For the ſame reaſon, in Green and Waller, the ſentence of the Admiralty could not be gainſaid. There is no appeal but to the ſword.

The ſame principle governs as to ſeizures in the Exchequer; where any perſon may come in and claim; which if they neglect, they tacitly aſſent to the condemnation. So of ſeizures tried before the commiſſioners of Excize.

So in the caſe of Moody and Thurſton, 1 Str. 481, where an act of parliament gave an action (on a certificate of commiſſioners that money was due from an agent to officers of the army) the agent could not defend, by controverting the truth of the certificate. It was contrary to the act, and he might have been heard before the commiſſioners.

Where a ſoldier had complained of his major for undue correction to a court-martial, which diſmiſſed his petition, he could not maintain an action, for he had been heard in a court competent and final to that purpoſe.

No temporal remedy lies to recover poſſeſſion of a benefice forfeited by deprivation, while the ſentence of a court competent to declare the forfeiture remains in force.

The ſame rule holds as to derivative claims. Therefore the judgment of ouſter againſt a mayor is good evidence againſt the corporator, who claims under him.

Thoſe who enter into collegiate eſtabliſhments agree to ſubmit themſelves to the laws and magiſtrates appointed by the founder; and conſequently cannot reclaim againſt them. This was all which was determined in the King and New-College, and many other caſes which might have been referred to under the ſame head. In moſt, if not all the caſes cited, the parties had actually been heard before the proper tribunal.

The office of granting probate and committing adminiſtration is a ſpecial authority committed to the eccleſiaſtical courts, where all, who claim intereſt, may be heard; ſo there can be no defect of juſtice. Therefore, in a vaſt abundance of caſes from Noel and Wells ſoon after the Reſtoration, to Barnſley and Powell in lord Hardwick's time, the temporal courts have reſuſed to take cognizance of the right of perſonal repreſentation. All the caſes under this head prove no more.

Caſes were alſo cited to prove, that iſſues joined upon the lawfulness of marriage, profeſſion, general baſtardy, and ſo forth, muſt be tried by the biſhop, and to infer that his juriſdiction is excluſive; and the ſtatute of 9 H. VI. c. 11, was cited to prove, that it is final not only to parties and privies, but to ſtrangers. The effect of that ſtatute is rather to prove, that all the world are, or may be, parties or privies. The only public object of it is to provide ſufficient notoriety to make them privy in fact, as well as in law. It provides a great variety of proclamations, to the end 'that all perſons, pretending any intereſt to object againſt the party which pretendeth himſelf to be mulier, may ſue to the ordinary, to whom the writ of certificate is or ſhall be directed, to make their allegations and objections againſt the party which pretendeth him to be mulier, as the law of boſy church requirith.' For the reſt, the ſtatute ſeems to have been an act of violence and fraud, by the powerful pretenders againſt lady Audley. The miſchief, they affected to dread, could not happen. A certificate is utterly void, unleſs made upon proceſs, at the inſtance of the parties. The certificate of mulier binds the parties to the ſuit (as in all reaſon it ought, while ſuch a trial is tolerated) but nobody elſe: and ſo it had been often decided before; and yet the ſtatute provided that every ſuch writ and certificate at the ſuit of lady Audley ſhould be void. On the other hand, no ſuch iſſue as profeſſion, baſtardy, or lawful matrimony, could be tried by the biſhop between ſtrangers; and when tried by the country, it bound only thoſe who were parties to the trial and attain. Nor was an infant bound to answer a plea of general baſtardy. But whether the concluſion was too extenſive or not in theſe caſes, ſtill it was only in reſpect to a civil right, and tried by a competent juriſdiction, fitting for the expreſs purpoſe of deciding upon it, the juriſdiction being created and eſtabliſhed by the writ.

Sentences, which are given by the biſhop or his official of his own mere authority in matrimonial cauſes, have the leaſt pretence of all others to bind or influence any queſtion which may ariſe afterwards in judicature. Such cauſes puniſh no crime, try no right, proceed to no civil effect. They proceed pro ſalute animæ rei, to reform ſome enormity or neglect in religious life; in qua (ſays Covarruvias in his epitome of the fourth book of the Decretals, par. 2. c. 8. f. 12. n. 1.) de maximo ſacramento agendum eſt. The proceſs is, ſimpliciter, de plano, ſine ſtreptu et figura judicii. Clement, lib. 2. c. 1. f. 2. From the very nature of ſuch a cauſe, it muſt follow, that the judgment cannot be final. No conſent of parties, or omiſſion to appeal, or repeated affirmation of the ſame judgment, gives it any force. Quia ſententia illa tranſiens in rem judicatam ſequetur peccatum, ſeparando virum conjugem, vel uniendo eos qui tales eſſe nequeunt. At nullum vinculum, quantumcumque multiplicatum, poteſt firmare eſſum, ex quo peccatum conſurgit. Sanch. de Matrim. lib. 9. diſputat. 100. In the ſame diſputation Sanchus ſays, poteſt aliam judex, ex officio, parte invitâ, procedere ad retractandum hujusmodi ſententiam; imo ad id teneri judicem prebet textus; quia ſui intereſt peccata auferre. Hinc deducitur, certâ regulâ præſcribi minime poſſe, quoties audiendus ſit volens prædictam ſententiam impugnare. He illuſtrates the doctrine, by obſerving, that in coſti, which is a civil intereſt, a matrimonial ſentence is binding. Ratio eſt aperta: ſententia enim matrimonii ideo non tranſit in rem judicatam, ne ſequeretur peccatum, ſuſtinendo matrimonium irritum, aut diſſolvendo validum; quæ ratio in expenſarum condemnatione ceſſat; et ideo ſcribitur naturam aliarum ſententiarum, quæ in rem judicatam tranſeunt. Gail, in his Obſervat. 107, and Obſ. 112, holds exactly the ſame language.

The ſame rule obtains, for the ſame reaſons, in all ſentences pro ſalute animæ. A ſentence is inconcluſive (ſays Vultei in his treatiſe de Judiciis, lib. 3. c. 12. f. 38.) ex qualitate cauſæ; puta, quod eſt matrimonialis, vel alia quæcumque, in qua animæ periculum verſatur. Seaccia, a very authoritative writer on the effect of ſentences, in his book de Sententia, gloſſ. 14. queſt. 2. n. 44, obſerves as a general rule, ſententia, in qua vertitur animæ periculum, nunquam tranſit in rem judicatam. The ſum of their maxims is given by Oughton, tit. 205. which is taken almoſt literally from Conſett, and by him extracted from the books of practice. — 'Altho', generally, witneſſes are not admitted after publication, yet in a matrimonial cauſe they are, even without oath, that they are come to the knowledge of the parties after publication. And, ſuppoſing that ſentence has paſſed againſt the plaintiff, that he has failed in proof of his libel, and the defendant is acquitted; yet the plaintiff may either in the ſame cauſe, or in another, raiſe a new ſuit againſt the ſame perſon, not only on a new or ſecond contract, but on the former, and produce proofs known or unknown to him before: and he is not bound by the exceptio rei judicatæ, or that the former ſentence has paſſed in rem judicatam; becauſe a ſentence given in a matrimonial cauſe never paſſes in rem judicatam, and has many privileges. When the church is deceived in promulging ſentence againſt matrimony, the ſentence may be revoked by new proofs, and even by the ſame; and the reaſon is, to eſchew ſin and danger to the ſoul, if a wrong ſentence ſhould prevail.'

So far as it appears to us is therefore no idle form of words, but an expreſs reſervation of a neceſſary power to alter the ſentence whenever it ſhall appear to the biſhop that a different rule of life is neceſſary pro ſalute animæ rei.

The miſtake ſeems to have ariſen from conſidering the biſhop as a court of civil judicature, and his ſentence as pronounced upon the trial of a civil right. In this perverſe view, thoſe maxims are abſurd, and thoſe rules merely vexatious, which, tried by the real nature and end of a matrimonial ſuit, are founded in piety and zeal for the diſcipline of religion. In all civil cauſes the maxim is univerſal, expedit reipublicæ, ut finis aliquis ſit litium. In proceedings pro ſalute animæ, the reaſon of the thing is altogether on the other ſide.

Even in the moment of ſtating theſe ſentences to be concluſive, one of the learned counſel could not forbear to give your lordſhips a lively repreſentation of the frivolouſneſs of their proceedings and the vanity of their decrees. The doctors have been at the pains to write (ſays my learned friend) ſome waggon-loads of volumes to prove, that theſe matrimonial cauſes proceed to no end, and terminate in nothing. All parties, all privies to the ſuit, all who have intereſt in the matter of it, may prevent its effect by intervention, by citation to hear the decree reverſed by original libel. The ſketch was drawn with a great deal of humour, bordering upon ridicule: a vivacity natural enough within the walls of their own college. Vetus illud Catonis admodum ſcitum eſt; qui mirari ſe aiebat, quod non rideret Haruſpex, Haruſpicem cum vidiffet. Yet it ſeemed rather aſtoniſhing, that ſo very judicious an advocate ſhould think this picture of futility the beſt recommendation of the ſentence to your lordſhips as an abſolute concluſion upon all your proceedings. Here all the world ſhall be bound by that judgment, which the court, who pronounced it, hold for no judgment, and will ſuffer to bind nobody. But ſuch was the neceſſity of the argument: to give it any effect, they were forced to aſſume, that this ſort of ſentence is the judgment of a civil judicature upon a civil ſubject, which is not true; and to give it effect, againſt others than parties, they were forced to admit, that ſuch others may ſet it aſide; which is true, only becauſe it is no ſuch judgment.

In ſupport of this looſe propoſition, they cited from our own books ſeveral caſes, in which the temporal courts ſuffered themſelves to be concluded by ſuch ſentences.

If it were neceſſary or allowable at this day to reaſon againſt ſo many authorities, I ſhould incline to think, that thoſe caſes proceeded upon the miſtake I mentioned before, namely, that the Eccleſiaſtical Court try and pronounce upon the civil right of marriage, or ever mean to do ſo, except when authorized by writ of the king's courts. But for the purpoſe of the argument, I will ſuppoſe that they do; even then the effect of all the caſes will amount to no more than this. Firſt, the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction has (excluſively) conſuſance of the right of marriage. Secondly, the Secular Juriſdiction has conſuſance of the temporal intereſts which are incident to marriage, and, in order to decide upon them, muſt try the fact of marriage as part of the queſtion. Thirdly, but the judgment of the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction on the principal, viz. the right of marriage, wherever it occurs, is final upon the trial of the incident. Fourthly, this concluſion extends to all who were parties or privies, or who, in notion of law, have committed laches in not intervening or reclaiming. This I take to be the utmoſt extent of the caſes cited.

The earlieſt caſe referred to was Corbett's, Fitz. tit. Conſultation, pl. 5. Sir Robert Corbett had iſſue Roger by his wife Matilda; in whole life he married Letitia, and had iſſue Robert. Roger ſued in the court chriſtian to avoid the ſecond marriage, but was prohibited, for that court had no original juriſdiction. 'Otherwiſe,' ſays Cateſby's Juſtice, 'if my father and mother were divorced, married to others, had iſſue, and died, then I grant well, that I ſhall have my ſuit originally in the court chriſtian, becauſe I cannot have my action in the temporal law, as heir, during the divorce; and alſo the divorce is a ſpiritual judgment, which ſhall be reformed in the Spiritual Courts.' So it was doubted, whether 'the brother of a monk, who abandoned his habit and vows, could, as heir, libel to try his brother's profeſſion, and hold him to obedience' obedience; for he might have his action by the temporal law, and object his profession.' But it was agreed, 'that if the monk had been deraigned for false or unjust cause, the brother might have citation to revoke his deraignment.' If this proves the effect which a spiritual sentence upon the principal matter, the right of marriage, or profession, has in cases where these come incidentally into question, it also confines the extent of that effect to those persons who may rescind the principal sentence; and proves the reason of it, namely, that they are not wronged by the conclusion, because they may always be heard against it.

The next case was Bunting and Leppingwell, 4 Co. 29. a. and Moor 169; which was thus found by special verdict. Thomas Twede married, de facto, Agnes Adinghall, but under the impediment of a pre-contract between her and John Bunting. Bunting sued in the court christian on this pre-contract, obtained sentence for celebration in facie ecclesie, married her, and had issue two sons, Charles and Robert. Richard the father of John, gave lands to Robert, for life only. Robert, mistaking his title, settled them on Emma his wife, and died. Charles brought an ejectment, as heir to Richard, his grandfather. It was objected that Twede had been no party to the suit in the court christian. But Twede might have intervened, or reclaimed, all his life long. So might Emma, if it could have availed her to prove her husband illegitimate, which would have destroyed her title. But Twede had abandoned his pretensions. The sentence was submitted to by Agnes. The marriage was solemnly celebrated, and remained uninterrupted during life. The question was between two issues. It required little argument to sustain the legitimacy.

The next was Kenn's case, 7 Co. 63. Cro. Ja. 186. An English bill was brought in the court of Wards, praying leave to traverse an office, whereby Elizabeth was found the infant heir of Christopher Kenn, and whereupon the wardship had been granted to Florence, the mother of the infant. Christopher Kenn had married Elizabeth Stowell, by whom he had issue Martha, who left issue Elizabeth the plaintiff, his heir at law, if the marriage had stood; but in the first and second of Philip and Mary, the court of Audience pronounced the marriage void for want of age, and gave sentence of divorce. Christopher Kenn married Elizabeth Beckwith, in the 5th of Elizabeth. She libelled him for jactitation before the commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, alledging his former marriage. Elizabeth Stowell intervened for her interest. The first marriage was a second time pronounced void, and sentence followed ad exequenda conjugalia obsequia. After the death of Elizabeth Beckwith, Christopher married Florence, by whom he had the ward. This matter was referred to all the judges, who pronounced the sentence conclusive, so long as it should remain in force. And lord Coke relied upon Corbett's case, the doctrine of which has been explained before. The point had been twice tried with Elizabeth Stowell, the grandmother of the plaintiff, and the sentences remained open to litigation, but submitted to.

The case of Jones and Bow, Carth. 225, it has been observed before, was of exactly the same sort. The plaintiff claimed under the issue of Robert Carr by Isabella Jones, between whom a sentence had obtained against the pretence of marriage, which then stood unlitigated.

In Jessum and Collins, 2 Salk. 437, there was a sentence against the plaintiff in the Spiritual Court, at the suit of the defendant, on that very contract for which he brought his action on the case, without disputing the sentence.

The case of Hatfield and Hatfield was also cited; a judgment of your lordships in the year 1725. No authority is more conclusive than the judgment of such a court, when the point decided is well understood: but nothing is more uncertain than the state of a point drawn from the printed cases, where each party takes care to state, at least, a probable case; and in the multitude of the reasons, good perhaps in law, if they were true in fact, it is difficult to divine what the house went upon. If this judgment depended, as the counsel for the prisoner contended, upon the goodness of the marriage, it carries the matter no further than abundance of other cases; namely, that the sentence of a court christian, while nobody contests it, binds the right of marriage between parties disputing elsewhere an incidental interest under it. There was an attempt to make it prove a collusive sentence available, which I shall have occasion to examine hereafter.

In Cleave and Bathurst, 2 Str. 960, and Annaly 11, the sentence was against the very plaintiff in the cause, and remained uncontroverted.

So Da Costa and Villa Real, 2 Str. 961; or Mendez and Villa Real, Annaly 18, was a sentence uncontroverted between the same parties.

The like observation occurs upon Mr. Hervey's case.

In Blackham's case, 1 Salk. 290, the sentence was not held to be conclusive; and as to lord Holt's doctrine, that must suppose the marriage put in issue between the same parties; for otherwise the sentence would not have concluded; the court, which grants administration, having no direct jurisdiction in matrimony.

In Millesent and Millesent, cited by Dr. Lee in lord Annaly 11, which I take to have been an appeal from the Prerogative Court, a sentence of the Consistory Court against a marriage was, while it remained unlitigated, a bar to the woman, who had been party to that sentence, from claiming administration as wife.

Upon all these cases I shall repeat but one observation; namely, that they bound only those who had been parties to the former sentence, or who derived under such parties. If they had extended to such as might have become parties by intervention or citation, the same principle would equally have borne them out. The general peace and happiness require, that there should be some resort to hear and determine upon rights; the same peace and happiness require, that litigation should have some end. The line seems to be fairly drawn, where every claim to every right has had the full opportunity of being heard. But, among all the cases cited or referred to, I believe none is to be found, where a sentence has been taken for conclusive against persons, who neither had, nor could possibly have agitated it.

It is not enough therefore to establish the proposition, that such sentences bind all who have or could have interposed, unless it had been shewn that the king could have interposed, for the publick good, in order to see that no fraud should be practised, which might tend to defeat the execution of his laws or police: but it is not pretended that the king can interpose in such causes.

It is not enough that a court of exclusive civil jurisdiction, pronouncing upon the principal right, binds all the derivative or incidental interests. It should be shewn, that such a court binds also to criminal conclusions: now this I take to be impossible, because, on the very state of the proposition, the court has no criminal jurisdiction.

It has often been attempted in argument to shew, that their courts have no more than a censorial jurisdiction in their proceedings pro salute animæ, et reformatione morum; and to infer from thence that their judgments ought not to bind in questions touching civil rights; as in Mendez and Villa Real in Annaly: but our courts have taken the fact to be otherwise, and considered their sentence as a judgment upon the civil right, which is the reason why it binds all incidental interests in other courts of civil jurisdiction. The true reason why such judgments have no effect in a criminal court, seems to be this: that there is nothing in common between the jurisdictions, so that they can never clash. A judgment in a civil suit will bind to all its consequences, although every fact, upon which it proceeded, should be evidently false; and though a criminal court should have found a crime upon an opposite state of the case. An action and an indictment for a trespass may have contrary issues, and yet both must stand: so it would be if the crime were assigned in the very falsehoods by which the civil court was deceived; as in indictments for perjury or forgery. A judgment upon a deed, after verdict on non est factum pleaded, is no bar to an indictment for forging or publishing, or swearing to the deed. The case would be the same in respect to a will of lands established by verdict, or to a will of personality after probate.

It was in this last instance they attempted to shew, that the authority of the Ecclesiastical Court had been interposed between publick justice and the crime of forgery. For this purpose they have cited the case of the King and Vincent, 1 Str. 481. It is very short: 'indictment for forging a will relating to personal estate; and on the trial the forgery was proved; but the defendant producing a probate, that was held conclusive evidence in support of the will.' Now the support of the will was not in question. It was proved in common form, which is not binding, even in the Spiritual Court. 1 Ro. Rep. 21. More particulars of this case may probably be known to some of your lordships; but I cannot find any. Stated thus, it certainly requires a great deal of consideration, before it be admitted as law. Here the question was, not whether the sentence shall have credit in respect of the understanding which the spiritual judges have in the rules and course of their own law, but whether a probate, granted of course, on the oath of the very party charged with the forgery, shall be a full and conclusive bar to the prosecution. This is too monstrous to be left upon the authority of a short and single case, without condescending to explain what consistency with publick justice, what respect to common sense, will allow the crime of forgery or perjury to be defended by the allegation of that very fraud which the indictment meant to punish; not stating any trial or judgment upon it, but merely that it had been practised. If the pretended executor had repelled the objection of forgery, even in that court, it would have borne some countenance at least; but the fraud passed without examination, where, in the nature of the proceeding, none could be had.

The other case, in 1 Str. 703. of the King and Rhodes, proves nothing, for it was merely a question of direction, whether the court would proceed to try the forgery of an instrument, while the property to be affected by it remained sub judice.

This is a matter of great consequence to publick justice; at the same time, it is the sort of case which must happen frequently. The fraud was commonly practised in the late war upon the sailors; and, if this rule had existed, could never have been punished: but it was frequently punished; and although, where no point of law arose, it is difficult to recover cases at the Old-Bailey or on circuits; yet an accidental publication of cases in the Old-Bailey, without any apparent selection, has produced three or four instances. One Stirling was convicted and hanged for forging a will; and, so little were either prosecutor or court apprised of this notion of law, the probate made part of the evidence against him. He had registered it (as it was necessary) in the South-Sea-House. I am not anxious to state these cases with more particularity; because I cannot bring myself to imagine it will be entertained as a serious opinion, that the mere perpetration of a crime may be pleaded in bar to a prosecution for it. This is certainly not for the interest of justice, nor for the honour of the Spiritual Court; because it would take away from that jurisdiction one guard against falsehood and fraud, of which every other is possessed.

Thus much concerning the general proposition, that sentences in the ecclesiastical courts, upon civil rights within their consueance, have conclusive force upon publick prosecutions for crimes; although it be confessed withal, that the publick has no means to intervene or review those sentences, and although the civil effect of such sentences is not touched by the event of such publick prosecutions. If this ground fails, there is an end of the present motion: but there is another view, in which it has been urged upon your lordships, which seems to turn out more decisively against it.

Whatever may be said in the instances of forgery, perjury, and other frauds upon the spiritual court, where the criminal court may seem to impeach the foundation of their sentences, without assuming any jurisdiction in the matter of them; in this case it is impossible to alledge, that the criminal court is not fully competent to decide upon the whole matter of the indictment; particularly on both the marriages there stated as constituting the crime.

The learned gentleman who spoke second for the prisoner, informed your lordships, that this crime was formerly punished by the canon law, and in the Ecclesiastical Court; and insisted, that transferring the punishment ment of it from the ecclesiastical to the temporal jurisdiction should not prejudice any defence which the party might have set up in the first court.

In order to make that observation bear, some proof should have been added, that this sentence would have barred such a suit, however promoted, exceptione rei judicate. Then, supposing this jurisdiction no better than concurrent, this court might have been barred, pari ratione. But your lordships have already had the trouble of hearing it established, but too much at length, from their books, that no such exception would lie in their law.

The same thing is no less true in our law, where the court can, by any means, take cognisance of the right of marriage. Thus in dower, where the Common-Pleas, by writing to the bishop, can well try the lawfulness of the marriage, a sentence is no plea. This was ruled in the case of Robins and Crutchley, 2 Wilson 118, 127. The demandant counted as of the endowment of Robins: the tenants pleaded, that she was not accoupled to Robins in lawful matrimony. The demandant replied, that on the 12th February 1754, sir William Wolsley libelled her as his wife, in the Bishop's Court of Litchfield, for adultery with Robins; that she pleaded a marriage with Robins: that the cause was removed into the Archbishop; that Robins died; and that afterwards sentence passed for the marriage with Robins, which then remained in force. The tenants demurred; and had judgment. The demandant cited many of the cases your lordships have now heard, to prove, that a sentence, by a court of direct jurisdiction, ought to conclude another, which has but incidental cognisance of the same matter. But these were not thought sufficient to avoid another trial of the same marriage in a court, which, by writing to the bishop, might well decide upon the lawfulness of it. It is clear, that the sentence would not have concluded in the trial before the bishop.

Nay, the very statute, on which the indictment is framed, proves the same thing. It excepts the cases where the former marriage is dissolved, or declared void by sentence, or was contracted under age of consent; all which would otherwise have been triable under an indictment for felony.

In order to prove, that any sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court would bar an indictment upon the same matter, the case of Boyle and Boyle was cited. It is reported in 3 Mod. 164, and in Comberbatch 72. In that case a prohibition was awarded to stop the trial, in the Ecclesiastical Court, of a marriage there claimed by a woman, in answer to a suit of jactitation; which marriage had been found bad on an indictment for polygamy, for which the man was convicted and burnt in the hand. The reason assigned, here, for this judgment was, for fear the spiritual court should not take notice of the judgment pronounced in the temporal court. But this would have been extremely irregular; particularly if by the course of the Spiritual Court such a judgment would have been conclusive. Prohibition never goes upon an apprehension, that the Spiritual Court will do wrong; but where their rules of trial are contrary to the common law, as in prescription, or requiring two witnesses to a release; or when they exceed their jurisdiction, by holding plea of temporal matters, as debts, freehold, or temporal offences. The reason for granting this prohibition was, because the court christian could not take any cognisance of a matter adjudged in the temporal court; which thereupon became temporal. So in the case of Webb and Cook, Cro. James, 535, 625; prohibition went to the court christian at Norwich, for entertaining a libel for defamation, in saying, that one had a bastard, who was adjudged the putative father: 'for that judgment, being under the authority of the statute law, shall not be impeached in the Spiritual Court, or elsewhere; and all are concluded to say the contrary.' Upon the authority of this case, the same point was ruled again in Thornton and Pickering, 3 Keb. 200. The Ecclesiastical Court has no cognisance of crimes. In the case immediately before that of Boyle and Boyle, prohibition went to stop a suit there for writing a libel; because an indictment will lie for it. In Serle and Williams, Hob. 288; this matter is fully treated. The ordinary has no power, even over clergymen, in a crime or offence touching the crown. Purgation itself was by permission, and could not be administered, if the temporal court delivered absque purgatione faciendâ; nor between the conviction and sentence; nor before it. In all these cases prohibition would lie. And in every other case, if after trial of a felon they prove or disprove anything against a verdict, prohibition lies. So in Higgon and Coppinger, sir William Jones, 320, prohibition went to stop a libel for calling one a sodomite. For, as they cannot find the principal offence, it not being saved to them by the statute, they shall not hold plea of the defamation. And, where any thing determinable by the Ecclesiastical Court is made felony, or treason, and the power of the Ecclesiastical Court is not saved to it, there they shall not meddle with the offence, or the defamation, which arises out of it. The true reason therefore, why they were prohibited in the principal case, was, because the plea depending before them was out of their cognisance.

Another case was cited, where prohibition went to the Consistorial Court of Exeter, after acquittal upon an indictment for polygamy: but I have not been able to find it.

More perverse inferences were never extorted from any cases, than from these. A court of oyer and terminer is to determine without hearing, for this special reason, that it will be final. A court of direct, complete, and exclusive jurisdiction, is to be bound and governed by one of no jurisdiction, either direct or indirect, on the matter. A court, which decides once for ever, is to be bound by one which never decides. The sentence remains open for further examination; let it therefore be adopted without examination, in order that it may never be examined.

But, to confess the truth, all which I have hitherto said seems to have been unnecessary. This might have been pertinent argument, if there had really been a sentence to combat: but there is none. It has been virtually, if not expressly admitted, that, for the purpose of deciding upon the present motion, your lordships must take it for granted, that the sentence is collusive and fraudulent in every view, and to every degree, which imagination can represent: for your lordships will not put us, in this stage of the business, to take separate issues upon every suggestion which may be made for the prisoner. In truth, her counsel have argued it so; expressly contending, that a collusive sentence shall bind the judgment of the house.

But what kind of case has been made, or attempted? What authority has been cited, that a collusive sentence shall prejudice others, than the parties to it? In every book I have seen, it is treated as a mere nullity. The only difference between no sentence, and a collusive one, is, that in the first case, you plead null tiel record, generally; in the last, you plead, that it was obtained by covin; consequently it is waste paper. If the court was informed of the covin, it would commit the parties for the contempt, and cancel the record. This could only be done upon the idea of the whole proceeding being a nullity.

In the 44 E. 3. 45. b. in assize of novel disseisin, by a dowress, the tenant admitted her title to dower; but disputed her assize, because she had been endowed by one, who abated upon his possession by covin with her. She argued, that the abator gained a fee-simple, whereby he might lawfully endow her; that recovery of dower against an abator is sufficient, and that endowment in pais, to one who has right, is equal to recovery. The tenant replied, that such endowment was but disseisin; therefore his entry was congeable; and that the recovery would have been in the same plight. All the judges held clearly, that 'if one has action to certain lands, and by his assent and covin the tenant is ousted, and he, who has the action, brings it against the disseisor, he, who is ousted, shall have assize; and the possession of him, who recovered, shall be adjudged by abatement, and not by recovery; because he was a disseisor. Et hoc adjudicabatur coram Knivet.'

The same point is laid down in many books; and in 3 Co. 78, it is taken as a general rule, 'that the common law so abhors fraud and covin, that all acts, as well judicial as others, and which of themselves are just and lawful, still, being mixed with fraud and deceit, are in judgment of law tortious and illegal.' Nay, it takes away the privilege of coverture and infancy; for the act is merely void. In the case in Coke, the fine (a judicial act) was held for none, by reason of the covin. So Earr and Chadwick were both hanged for burglary, though they entered by an habere facias possessionem; because it issued upon a fraudulent judgment. This was thought to heighten the offence.

The principle of the rule applies equally to the judgments of the Ecclesiastical Court; and so the rule was applied in Dyer 339, where a revocation of letters of administration was held void for covin. Thus too in Garvan and Roach, 1 Ves. 157. Lord Hardwick says of sentences in the Ecclesiastical Court, that collusion will overturn the whole.

It would be idle affectation to cite all the cases on this head, which indexes would furnish. The books are full of them, from the annals of Edward the second to the Reports of sir James Burrow. Indeed there never was a period of time, in which this maxim was so continually in the mouth of the court, as the last. Bright and Eynon, and abundance of cases more might be cited to prove this. The court seems to have thought it the principal and most capital part of its duty, the nobile officium judicis, to suppress and extinguish every species of fraud.

My lords, the language of the civilians and canonists is exactly the same. Scaccia, in his book de Sententiâ, Gloss. 14, Quest. 12, states this position, ex vulgata regulâ, rem inter alios actam aliis non nocere. Upon this he makes many limitations; upon all of which he adds, amongst others, this sublimitation; quando sententia esset lata per collusionem: fraus enim, et dolus nemini patrocinari debent, in alterius præjudicium; et ideo sententia, lata per collusionem, habetur pro non sententia; et aliis non nocet; quavis, sublatâ collusione, noceret. The same thing is laid down by Covarruvias, in his Practical Questions, cap. 15. n. 2. He quotes this text of the Digest. Si hereditatis iudex contra heredem pronuntiaverit non agentem causam, vel collusionem agentem, nihil hoc nocet legatariis. In Heraldus de re judicata, lib. 1. cap. 2. n. 1, the same rule is given upon the same authority.

Nay, their courts will receive an allegation against a judgment at common law, that it was by covin; and rightly too; for it is a nullity; and the authority of the court, in which fraud is practised, is never in question. In Lloyd and Maddox, Mor. 917. One sued in the court christian for a legacy. The executor pleaded recovery in debt, which exhausted assets. The legatee replied, that the recovery was by covin. This allegation was admitted; and the King's Bench refused to award prohibition. Here both courts agreed, that to alledge a fraudulent judgment was to alledge nothing; and the inferior jurisdiction was expressly permitted to try this sort of nullity in the judgment of the superior.

There is a great abundance of cases more, which I shall have occasion to cite to your lordships, if the actual fraud of the present sentence should ever be disputed; cases, in which much weaker grounds of imputation, than those which occur here, have been thought sufficient to avoid a judgment.

But, my lords, what arguments have been used on the other side upon this part of the case?

First, it has been insinuated, that certain statutes, made against covin, account for the many judgments to be found in our books; and prove, that, without such statutes, they could not have obtained. But many of the cases were before the statutes referred to. The principle, avowed by the judges, is independent of them. They all provide either additional sanctions against fraud, or new precautions against the opportunity of practising it. And it would be a very mischievous construction, if a statute against a particular fraud were to protect every other.

Secondly, the fraudulent sentence must be sent back to the court where the fraud was practised, in order to be corrected. Why so? If the thing alledged against a sentence were error, mis-judging either the law or the fact, it must be reversed in the same jurisdiction, original, or appellate. But the court, in which the sentence is pleaded, must determine on the reality and application of that plea, just as it would on any other matter pleaded. Fraud is a fact. The conclusion is, that it puts a total end to the cause. The court, in which such cause depends, depends, must be as competent and perfect a judge of that fact, as the court in which the fraud was perpetrated. I say as competent and perfect; because the court, where the fraud has been practised, which has overlooked such circumstances as appear on the very face of these proceedings, does not seem to me the very place to which one would send a question of collusion to be tried. All the authorities referred to before, and the numerous instances of replying fraud to pleas of judgment by other courts, on which it was practised, contradict this notion. But cases are cited on the other side. Kenn's case, it was said, proves, upon the state of it, that the sentence was fraudulent. The bill in the court of Wards stated, that the sentence was false, and with a deal of aggravation. But who ever referred to an English bill for the true state of any case? The question, referred to the judges, says nothing of the collusion. The case of Morris and Webber, in Moor 225, was also cited to prove, that collusion apparent in an ecclesiastical sentence did not hinder it from concluding in a court of common law. A man, divorced propter impotentiam, married another woman, and had children. The last circumstance, it was said, disproved the cause of the divorce; and therefore the judgment was apparently collusive. But that circumstance did not even prove the judgment false: for one may be habilis quoad hanc. The law presumes the children of a marriage legitimate: but that does not prove the fact of generation to any other purpose. If the ground of the sentence was false, it would not follow that it was collusive. Collusion was not even alledged in the case; and consequently makes no part of the judgment. In the same manner they referred to the appellant's printed case, in this house, in Hatfield and Hatfield, for an averment, that the sentence was fraudulent. But there, as it happens, the state of the case disproves the collusion: for Porter, the defendant in the Ecclesiastical Court, was in the appellant's power. They cited also the case of Prudham and Phillips, from a most inaccurate note in the margin of Strange, 661; who certainly knew nothing of the case he referred to. The case in truth was this: Prudham brought assumpsit against Constantia Phillips. She gave evidence of her marriage with Muilman. Prudham produced a sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court, annulling that marriage, because she was already married to Delafield, who was then alive. She said, that sentence was fraudulent. But the court, admitting that the objection would have been good in the mouth of a stranger, would not suffer her to alledge fraud in herself, for her own avail. The learned doctors also cited a case of a lady Mayo and a Mr. Brown, in the Prerogative Court. There, a sentence in a matrimonial cause being pleaded, the adverse party alledged, that it had been obtained by collusion. One learned gentleman said the allegation was repelled; the other, that it was not admitted. I am informed the last is nearest to accurate; for nothing was done in that matter. The cause is still depending. The first argument promised all that length of erudition, which your lordships were favoured with yesterday: in view to which the judge asked, whether they had not better agitate the question of fraud where it was committed; an issue more natural for the judge to wish, than proper for the court to award. The most loose and unconsidered notion, escaping in any manner from that able and excellent judge, should be received with respect; and certainly will. But it is unfair to him to call this his judgment. If the question were my own, with the choice of my court, I should refer it to his decision.

Thirdly, among other reasons against holding plea of the collusion before your lordships, they insisted, that it was not worth while; their sentences are so open to repeal at the suit of any body, that whoever finds them objected, has nothing to complain of but his own remissness. Their proceedings are so frivolous and ineffectual, their judgments so inconclusive and harmless, that nullity, however established, makes no material difference in them.

Such were their particular arguments. In a more general way, they pressed upon your lordships, with much earnestness, the consideration of the unhappy case, to which they said we would drive the prisoner. The sentence has deprived her of all conjugal claims upon Mr. Hervey; and we acknowledge it to be conclusive upon her, while we insist that it is merely void against all the rest of the world. She is, therefore, according to us, a wife, only for the purpose of being punished as a felon. This strange apology was not insinuated in mitigation of the punishment, or to the compassion of your lordships; but directly and confidently addressed to your justice. Do not proceed to try the crime, because the purpose of committing it is totally frustrated; and many other inconveniencies have ensued. In other words, the crime has been detected. These disappointments, these inconvenient consequences of guilt, are the bars which God, and the order of nature, have set against it: but they have not been found sufficient. It demands the interposition of public authority, with severer checks, to restrain it. Why is she thus hampered with the sentence she fabricated? Because she fabricated it; because justice will not permit her to alledge her own fraud, for her own behoof, nor hear her complain of a wrong done by herself.

In short, my lords, the motion is wholly inadmissible. It is inconsistent with all order and method of trial for us to debate imaginary topics of defence, before hearing the charge, and for the court to resolve abstract questions upon hypothetical grounds. Is a sentence pronounced between two certain persons admissible evidence against others? Is this species of sentence so? Is either admissible against the king—in any public prosecution—in this particular sort of prosecution? Is such evidence probable only, or conclusive—against the parties to it—against strangers—against the king—and in what cases? What, if it were obtained by collusion? What, if by her collusion? Will it serve her? May she offer it safely? How much will it prove against her? What evidence will do to prove the collusion?—There is no end of such questions. At the same time, I was not solicitous to prevent any part of the argument. Were it possible for your lordships to stop this prosecution here, I have no desire to wound the mind of any person unnecessarily, or if so painful a duty may be dispensed with. But I have rather wondered to hear such hopes as these thus far encouraged, or even entertained, on the part of the prisoner, with confidence enough to make it worth her while to avow, in this stage of the business, that she had rather have every thing presumed against her, than hear any thing proved; and to disclose to your lordships, not an anxiety to clear her injured innocence, but a dread of the enquiry; a wish to submit, in silence, to the charge. Was this her solicitude to bring the question here? Of what avail would it be to any body, in any condition, to appear in any court, and defend thus? But, in such a court, before so venerable an audience, to hear nothing pleaded against a charge of infamy, but a frivolous objection to entering upon the enquiry!—unless topics stronger, more pertinent, and pointed could have been urged, I am exceedingly sorry, upon every account, that the time of your lordships has been thus taken up, and that we did not go directly into the examination of the matter before you.

Mr. Solicitor-General.

My lords,

There are two questions at present before your lordships: the one turns upon the effect of a sentence obtained from the Ecclesiastical Court in a case of jactitation of marriage, which the counsel for the prisoner have maintained to be a conclusive bar to the inquiry now instituted in a court of criminal justice: the other is, whether that argument ought to be admitted in this period of the proceeding.

My duty requires me, in the first place, to submit to your lordships some objections to admitting that sentence in anticipation of the charge, after a plea of not guilty to the indictment.

The plea, which is the defence upon the record, denies the charge; but the argument contends, that the charge ought neither to be stated nor proved. To proceed first to consider the merits of a defence without a charge established either by proof or admission of the party, is at least a very great novelty in a criminal proceeding, and a very wide deviation from the ancient course of trials; and it is a presumption of some weight, that a mode of trial, which has prevailed for ages, is not founded in folly nor injustice.

In the regular and ordinary course, a prisoner who has any special matter to alledge, which ought to bar the enquiry into the crime, must state it in the form of a plea of the indictment. Upon the plea of the party every court of criminal jurisdiction must form a judicial determination: a pardon, a former acquittal for the same charge, are defences which preclude an inquiry into the crime; but the party can only insist upon such defences by pleading them, the court can only take cognizance of them when pleaded.

The present proceeding would oblige the court to try the validity of the charge, by first hearing the defence; in the course of that hearing, not only the state of the charge is supposed, but a reply to the defence by new facts is also taken by supposition; and, should such a method be permitted, your lordships would be placed in a situation very different from the exercise of judicial authority: for courts of justice are not instituted to decide a disputation upon a thesis of law; their province is to decide upon real fact, not upon general or hypothetical propositions; nor can they pronounce the law, till the facts, from whence that law arises, are first established.

The counsel for the prisoner are obliged to state their argument thus: suppose, say they, the first marriage to have been solemnized, but a suit to have been instituted to impeach that marriage; in that suit, a sentence pronounced against the marriage; suppose that suit and sentence to have been fraudulent, yet even such a sentence ought to be conclusive, and to bar all inquiry into the crime of a second marriage. The only answer, which I submit to your lordships such an argument at present demands, is, that a court of justice cannot suppose the fact of the marriage, nor the suit to impeach the legality of it; no supposition can be formed, whether the proceeding in that suit was fraudulent or was fair, the sentence real or colourable; the parties must agree upon the facts before the court can be asked to decide the law; if they do not admit the facts upon record, it remains for both parties to prove what they think material; then, and not till then, it is the duty of the court to pronounce the law.

No precedent has been quoted to shew, that a similar proceeding was ever admitted in a court of criminal jurisdiction. One case only was faintly alluded to, by the learned gentleman who spoke first yesterday. The case of Jones and Bow, cited from Carthew; where the reporter says, that, 'by way of anticipation to the evidence that the plaintiff was about to give, the defendant produced a sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court in a cause of jactitation; a debate arose upon the effect of that sentence, and the court being of opinion that the sentence was conclusive, the cause between the parties ended.'

That cause was an action of ejectment to try the title to an estate. A proceeding by ejectment is well known to be entirely fictitious. In a suit founded upon a legal fiction to try a question of right, where the judgment is not conclusive on either party, there may be no mischief in pressing forward to the conclusion without an exact attention to forms. The case therefore does not prove, that in a civil action, where judgment is given upon the mere right, such proceeding could have been allowed: but a criminal proceeding requires still more precision than a civil suit, and a deviation from the forms would very seldom be favourable to the accused. If the prisoner is not confined to the defence pleaded, neither would the prosecutor be confined to the matter of the charge; the judge and the jury would mutually encroach upon each other: nor could there be a more dangerous source of error and confusion, than to permit a mixed consideration of law and of fact, of hypothesis and of argument, to be introduced into criminal trials. The only plea to the present indictment is, not guilty: the argument your lordships have heard supposes, that such a plea ought not to have been been put in; that there is a more prudent and cautious method of defence which you are desired to hear upon suppositions, without the form or substance of a plea.

The counsel for the prosecution are bound to oppose this experiment. It would ill become them, acting in the character of a public accuser, to advance any doctrine which they did not believe to be founded in law, or to suppress an objection to a proceeding which, as it is novel, cannot pass into a precedent without great danger and mischief. Should that objection prove, that the argument, which in this stage of the business the counsel in defence have been permitted to urge, is inadmissible, your lordships will however have no reason to regret the delay it has occasioned, nor to deem that time mis-spent, which has been employed in the present enquiry, since the object of it, though fruitless, has been directed to the relief of a party accused. Supposing then the debate upon the effect of the sentence urged in bar of the trial to be proper at this time, I shall proceed to the consideration of the argument.—The proposition advanced is this; that in an indictment upon the statute of Jam. I. for marrying a second husband, living the first, a sentence of an ecclesiastical court, in a cause of justification of marriage, pronouncing, that it does not as yet appear to that court that there hath been a first marriage, is a conclusive evidence that no such marriage ever was had.

In order to make out this proposition, the counsel contend, first, that it is an universal rule, that the decrees of courts, having competent jurisdiction, bind all persons, and conclude in all cases, in any manner touching the matter decided: secondly, they maintain, that the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court in question is a decision: they urge in the third place, that the rule first laid down admits of no exceptions, but applies with more force to criminal, than to civil cases. In the last place they insist, that supposing this sentence to be the effect of fraud, collusion, and agreement between the parties to the supposed suit in the Spiritual Court, it is notwithstanding conclusive upon all other courts, and the fraud can only be examined in that court whose justice has been thus ensnared.

My lords, I have stated fairly the argument on the other side, which rests on these four propositions; and, were I only engaged in a disputation with the learned gentlemen upon a mere thesis in law, I should be inclined by a denial to insist upon better proofs than have been offered in support of these propositions. I feel myself however under a very different impression of duty, as one of the counsel for the prosecution. The prisoner may take every advantage that the law will allow; from us your lordships have a right to expect every concession that justice requires. I shall therefore admit (as far as in my conscience I think them admissible) the several propositions urged by the opposite side, state with as much fidelity as I can the true limitations of the doctrines advanced, and assert no point but what I hold to be clear law, supported by undoubted authority.

It is contended, in the first place, to be a universal rule, that sentences of courts of competent jurisdiction are binding upon all other judicatures, in which any inquiry arises into the matter determined: that proposition I conceive to be much too largely stated. The rules and principles that I have learnt upon that subject, I will very briefly submit to your lordships, not meaning to argue, but only to state them.

It is a general maxim of law, that the sentence of a competent court binds the parties, and all persons deriving any right under them; as to third persons, it neither prejudices nor benefits them.

Another maxim, equally true, is, that a sentence of a court having competent jurisdiction, if it comes collaterally before another court in another suit, shall be presumed just till the contrary appears. One court has no authority to direct the judgment of another; but it is a fair presumption, that what hath been decided, hath been justly decided; it is, however, but a presumption, and in most cases it obtains only till the contrary is proved.

I admit at the same time, that there are cases, in which that presumption may amount to a conclusion. Where the sentence has been pronounced in rem, by a judicature having a peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the cause, the effect of such a decision is not to be controverted in any other civil suit. These propositions are founded in the consent of all lawyers, who have treated of general law, and are proved by a series of judicial authorities: to quote them would lead into an unnecessary detail upon a part of the argument, which does not immediately apply to the decision of the point in question.

The cases cited on the other side agree with the distinction I have mentioned. A sentence of a court of Admiralty upon the forfeiture of a ship; the judgment of the court of Exchequer condemning goods as forfeited; are each of them conclusive upon this principle, that the sentence is in rem, the court has pronounced upon the property itself. The cases quoted of sentences of an ecclesiastical court, are all in matters of which that Court has the peculiar and exclusive cognizance. The Ecclesiastical court has the sole jurisdiction of causes testamentary, and of causes matrimonial, to a certain effect; if therefore a question arises, who is intitled to the personal estate of a man deceased with or without a testament, the probate of the will, or a grant of administration, gives the title to the property in question; the effect of it cannot be contested in other courts collaterally and incidentally, because no other court has power to controvert the act, no other authority can confer the title to the thing in dispute. Such sentences are in rem.

The case is very different, where the decision is upon a personal contract, or any matter arising out of the various civil relations of persons, in which the original cognizance of the cause might have come before the court. Where that decision is offered as an evidence of right, there the judgment of the foreign court can only have effect so far as it is just; no authority belongs to it but from its internal justice; for the court in which it is produced owes no obedience to the court which pronounced it, and is equally competent to give the law to the parties. The effect of the sentence is beneficial, however, for the party who has obtained it; because the justice of it is presumed, the truth of the facts on which it proceeded is admitted without proof, and the adverse party is obliged to demonstrate the falsehood or iniquity of it.

In support of this distinction, I will only mention to your lordships one authority of a late date, which I select from a multitude of cases, not merely because it is a determination in the last resort, but because the rule of law is stated in the judgment. The case I allude to was decided by your lordships on the 4th of March 1771, upon appeal from the court of Session in Scotland, by Sinclair against Frazer. The question there was, what should be the effect of a judgment obtained by the appellant in Jamaica? The person, against whom that judgment was directed, was sued upon it in Scotland. It happened, that the court of Session refused to give any effect to it, and held the party bound to prove the ground, the nature, the extent of his demand. From that determination an appeal was taken to your lordships, the judgment of the court of Session was reversed, and the words of the order of reversal were, 'that the judgment complained of be reversed;' and declare 'that the judgment of the court of Jamaica ought to be received as evidence prima facie of the debt, and that it lies on the defendant to impeach the justice of it, or to shew that it was irregularly and unduly obtained.'

My lords, the authority that I quote to your lordships will have considerable effect in a subsequent part of the argument: at present, I only urge it as a proof, that though in cases where the sentence is in rem, where the court has a peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction to determine the title to the thing in question, the presumption in favour of the judgment is admitted to be conclusive; yet where the judgment is applied to personal rights, to matters of which other courts have equal cognizance, the party against whom it is urged is at liberty to impeach it, to shew that it is not just, or that it has been irregularly and unduly obtained.

This being the distinction in civil cases, the question arises, how far these rules are applicable to criminal suits? what effect ought the sentence of any civil court to have as a bar to the justice of the state in the trial and punishment of crimes?

The counsel for the prisoner argue, that if the civil right is destroyed by the sentence of a competent court, to examine into the crime is an absurd inquiry; where there is no relation, there is no duty, and there can be no breach of it. Is this so? Is it then competent to a party by any act, destructive of the civil relation, to abolish the duties of that relation? Persons may deprive themselves of the benefit of any civil right, may dispense with the advantages of any relation of life, may be intitled to claim neither as wife, mother, nor child; but can they absolve themselves from the duties that belong to the natural relation? Can they, by their own act, absolve themselves from the sacred duties of those civil relations which, in a state of society, are natural relations?

My lords, the proposition I contend for is so far from absurd, that the contrary of that proposition would involve in it the most manifest absurdity: the civil interest is important only to the parties themselves. Whether an estate belongs to one person or another, whether a party is intitled to rank and distinction, to whom related, whose wife she is? the question is of great indifference to society: but if the estate, the relation, the rank, is obtained by criminal means; if the situation which a person chuses to relinquish is attended with duties, the advantage, but not the duties, may be waived; the peace and order of society must be maintained, and no violation of them can pass with impunity.

If there is an universal proposition of law, I take this to be so, that no determination between party and party can preclude public justice from inquiring into the criminal tendency of their actions. Daily experience proves this in the most trivial instances. An action is brought for an assault, the party fails in it, there is a verdict against him; it does not prevent a prosecution by indictment, upon the very same fact, against the very same party. In such an indictment was it ever pleaded, that an action had been brought against the party for that alleged trespass and beating, and that he had been acquitted upon that action? The learned and reverend judges will inform your lordships, that there is not a fitting or an assize without some instance of this sort. A question may arise in an action upon property, to which of two persons a thing, an horse for example, belongs. It is decided to belong to A. and not to B.: would that decision bar an indictment against A. for stealing the horse? It is no answer to public justice, that he has acquired that property, when the object of the criminal inquiry is, whether he has committed a crime in acquiring it.

The proposition advanced on the other side, that a sentence in a civil suit is conclusive in a criminal proceeding, was not so much pressed upon any deduction of argument, as asserted on the authority of a case cited from Strange's Reports; in which it was said to have been determined, that the grant of the probate of a will by the Ecclesiastical Court was a bar to an indictment for felony in forging that will.

In the first place, your lordships will give me leave to ask, does it enter into the imagination of any lawyer, that the same rule would take place with regard to a will of real estate? Had such a will been produced in judgment, the witnesses to it examined, the validity of it canvassed, a judgment in favour of it, even a decree of the court of Chancery establishing it, I do presume it will not be maintained, that all those proceedings would prevent a prosecution for the forgery of that will. The same thing might happen in the case of a deed; a deed may have been established by a decree; the property of an estate settled by it, irretrievably perhaps; would there be no punishment for the crime, if it should be discovered afterwards, that that deed was a manifest forgery? The estate might be held indefeasibly by the party who had obtained it; but I do not conceive that his having got possession of that estate, having obtained an advantage of which human laws could not deprive him, would be an answer to human justice why he should not be punished for the crime by which he had gained that advantage.

It is supposed, however, that there has been a decision, that a probate of a will of personal estate bars an indictment for forging that will. Is the grant of a probate then an act of so high a nature, requiring so much judicial accuracy, that it is not to be questioned? A probate in common form is not even a judicial act, it is merely official; there is no litigation, no inquiry; the conscience of the judge is not engaged in it. What is the purpose of forging a will of personal estate? To obtain a probate; for without without it there might be a criminal intention; but no prejudice could arise to any person from that intention: shall it be said then, that the accomplishment of the crime is to afford protection for itself? The authority relied on is a note in Sir John Strange's Reports, under the name of the King and Vincent; that a person being indicted for forging of a will, upon producing a probate, a probate in the common form was held a bar to the proof of the forgery, and he was by the judge acquitted. This is the whole note. It is a great misfortune that notes, very often taken upon loose information, are given to the world under respectable names. The collections of a lawyer, made only for his own use, must abound with errors; in publishing such collections many of these will escape; and this is not the only instance of mistake in that collection. I conceive it to be impossible at any period, at any time of the day, by the negligence of any judge who might happen to be present at the Old-Bailey, that a prisoner could have been acquitted of a charge of forgery upon such a defence. I say this with confidence; because, in the inquiry that hath been made into the cases determined, many have been found, where parties have been tried and convicted for forging a will of personal estate, and the evidence to prove the publication of the forged will has been the probate, produced by the officer of the court, and his testimony that the prisoner was the person who obtained the probate.

Mr. Attorney-General quoted to your lordships the case of the King and Murphy. The prisoner there had the double villainy to turn the charge upon his prosecutor. The trial was attended by counsel who do not usually go to the Old-Bailey; it is stated very fully by a short-hand writer at the end of the State-Trials. The case of the King and Sterling was also mentioned; it is very manifest that that unfortunate person was unjustly hanged, if the case in Strange is law. Sterling's case was this: he was indicted for having forged a will, of which will he had obtained a probate, and under that title had transferred some stock. The person whose will he said it was, was alive, and produced as the witness against him, and of course to impeach the probate of her own will. Absurd as it may seem to doubt whether that evidence was competent, if the case of the King and Vincent was law, undoubtedly that witness ought not to have been permitted to prove her own existence; she was dead by irrefragable legal argument; but the event was different, and Mr. Sterling, notwithstanding the probate, suffered for his crime.

Besides these cases, there was another in no very remote period, in which a party was tried for the forgery of a will, in September sessions 1765, at the Old-Bailey. One Richardson and one Carr were indicted for having forged a receipt for the payment of money, with intent to defraud a particular person, who was a seaman, intitled to wages: the common cases of forgery of wills have been in the case of seamen. Upon the trial it appeared, that the receipt was given in the name of Jane Steward, who was the supposed executrix of a will of this seaman, which had been proved by the defendant Carr, upon the oath of the other defendant Richardson. The learned judge, Mr. Baron Perrot, who tried them, was of opinion, that the prisoners ought to be acquitted of the charge of forging a receipt for the money; but, being satisfied from the evidence that Richardson had forged the will, notwithstanding it had appeared in the trial before him that a probate had been granted of that will, he remanded Richardson to gaol to take his trial for the forgery of the will. Richardson was accordingly tried in October sessions 1765, for forging the will of John Steward, a mariner: the officer of the Prerogative Court proved upon that trial, that the will was brought to his office by Richardson, and a probate of that will granted; and upon that proof he was convicted, and executed. The first learned judge had remanded him to prison to take his trial at the ensuing sessions for the forgery of a will, the probate of which was then in court; and upon the second indictment, which was tried by the noble lord who presides in the court of King's Bench, the prisoner was convicted notwithstanding the will had been proved. Other cases have been mentioned to your lordships to the same effect with these, which sufficiently refute that singular case of the King and Vincent, the only authority to support the argument, that the sentence of an ecclesiastical court is a bar to an indictment.

Having thus removed the only obstacle to the proposition I meant to rely upon, that in a criminal matter a sentence of a civil court ought not to be conclusive against a publick accusation, I now proceed to a more limited and close enquiry, what effect the sentence of jactitation ought to have in this proceeding, an indictment for bigamy?

It is of no importance to the present enquiry to investigate, by what means the cognizance of causes matrimonial and testamentary belongs not to the sovereign of the state, but is given to an order of men dedicated to the service of religion. The fact is, that in the jurisprudence of this country, causes matrimonial and testamentary are of ecclesiastical cognizance. The right to try them is not derived from the king as the fountain of justice, nor exercised by the king's court; but wherever the royal authority interposes, it is not as sovereign of the state, but as supreme head of the church. The law did not even interfere to punish the violation of the matrimonial rights, and adultery, which in most countries of Europe is treated as a crime, but was not considered in England as an offence punishable by the magistrate, but left to the correction of ecclesiastical censure. At length however the violation of conjugal duty, accompanied with the circumstance of an open attack upon the order of society, by a second marriage, was, by special statute, made a crime: when I say made a crime, I do not mean it was made more immoral; but it was made a subject of criminal cognizance by the magistrate. The learned counsel who spoke second yesterday contended, that this statute gave no jurisdiction to the temporal courts to pronounce upon the legality of the marriage; but that the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court, as to the trial of the marriage, remained still absolute. It was necessary for his cause to attempt this argument; but to maintain this proposition is a very difficult task. The legislature, fifty years after the Reformation, has declared that the crime of bigamy shall be punishable as a felony by the magistrate. To convict a person of that crime, must not the magistrate try him? Has he not the power to acquit or condemn him? Has he only an authority to inflict the punishment, as in old times, when the church delivered over the offender to the secular arm? and is the sentence of the spiritual court to guide the conscience of the judge and jury in the criminal court? The sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court in the present case is said to be against the first marriage, and therefore it is urged the prisoner ought to be protected by it; but, if the argument is just, it must hold equally where the sentence is for the marriage: it sounds less harsh to contend that a party, declared not to be married in the first instance by the Spiritual Court, shall not be questioned for the second marriage. But by the same rule we must conclude, that if the Spiritual Court had determined for the marriage in the first instance, and the fact of a second marriage had been proved, it would not have been competent for the prisoner in an indictment for bigamy, so circumstanced, to have made any defence: he is concluded by the sentence, the judge and jury are bound to believe it, and, upon that sentence, without examination, to convict and to punish.

The effect of the statute I take to be very different: it has created a new offence, and for the trial of that offence the cognizance of the lawfulness of marriage is given to the temporal courts. As to all criminal consequences, that court has cognizance to determine, as well as the Ecclesiastical Court, what is and what is not a legal marriage between the parties. That it has so, the case of Boyle and Boyle, quoted to your lordships for another purpose, is a clear proof: that was a prohibition issued to the Ecclesiastical Court to enter into an examination into that cause of marriage, which the court, in trying the indictment, had determined. The other case mentioned by the learned doctor is to the same effect. The two cases differ only in this, that in one the party was convicted, in the other acquitted; but the court was of opinion in both, that the Ecclesiastical Court could not interfere.

It is unnecessary however to have recourse to authorities, for the statute itself has decided this question. The legislature seems to have had it in view, that a jurisdiction being newly given to the temporal courts in the trial of marriage, questions might arise, as between concurrent jurisdictions, what should be the effect of sentences pronounced by the Ecclesiastical Court. It was a wise foresight in those who compiled the statute, to define in what cases the sentences of the ecclesiastical courts ought to preclude any enquiry for the crime; and it is defined in the words of the exception, that this act shall not extend to any persons divorced by the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court, nor to any persons where the former marriage has been by the Ecclesiastical Court declared void and null. There are two cases then put by the statute, in which the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court protects the party against a criminal inquiry; sentence of divorce, and sentence of nullity of marriage: if therefore the Ecclesiastical Court, having competent jurisdiction, has either divorced the parties, or if it has pronounced sentence of nullity of marriage, the sentence in these two instances is conclusive: but the statute has no exception in favour of a sentence in a cause of jactitation. There is no pretence to argue, that a sentence in a cause of jactitation is either a sentence of divorce, or that sentence which makes the marriage void and of no effect: no lawyer, no civilian can make that mistake. What then does the exception prove? Two sentences of the Ecclesiastical Court are recited in it, the third is omitted; and it is a general rule of law, that wherever a statute excepts particular cases, the exception of those cases extends the statute to all cases not excepted. That proposition is too clear to require authorities to be cited in support of it. The law therefore, which says the trial of polygamy shall proceed in all cases, except where a sentence of divorce, and except where a sentence of nullity of marriage, has intervened, does virtually say, that a sentence in a cause of jactitation of marriage, which is neither of divorce nor of nullity, shall not bar the trial. I conceive therefore the statute to have decided this question.

The argument on the other side is put in a more plausible form, by stating the defence to be founded upon a fact, of which the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court is the best evidence: there can be no double marriage, it is said, because the sentence disproves the first marriage. This mode of stating the argument makes it necessary to examine the nature of a suit for jactitation of marriage, in order to see what credit is due to the sentence, when offered as evidence to disprove the first marriage.

A suit for jactitation of marriage is, from beginning to end, totally singular. Some writers on the canon law derive its origin from the doctrine of pre-contracts, which, by the ecclesiastical law, constituted a marriage: and till that very mischievous prejudice was destroyed by the late marriage-act, it is not surprising that any attempt to lessen the evil should meet with encouragement. The form of the suit is this: the supposed husband or wife complains to the ecclesiastical judge, that he or she is a person free from all matrimonial contracts or engagements with the adverse party, and so esteemed by all neighbours, friends, and acquaintance; that the adverse party, notwithstanding the knowledge of this, has falsely and maliciously boasted of a marriage with the party complaining; it concludes then, by such false assertions an injury is committed, and prays that right may be done by declaring the party free from all matrimonial engagements with the other, and by enjoining that party perpetual silence. The party defendant may either say, I have not boasted, I deny that fact; or, if he admits that he has boasted, he is then to go on and alledge circumstantially a marriage, which the other party denies, under the circumstances alledged. If the marriage is not proved, then the court pronounces, that, so far as yet appears, the party complaining is free from matrimonial contract with the other party, and enjoins perpetual silence.

After this sentence, so gravely pronounced, your lordships are told by all the learned doctors, and all the books of practice agree, that this injunction of perpetual silence continues no longer than till the party chuses to talk again; and the person, to whom he may with the most perfect safety repeat his assertions, is the judge who enjoined him silence; for, it is agreed on all hands, that the party may at any time inform the court, that though it did not appear formerly that he was married, he can make it appear now; and such proof is admissible.

The forms of all courts had probably a good original, and this suit may have been introduced to prevent a greater mischief; but it is impossible to avoid collusion in such a proceeding, which has no avowed object, but to correct the indiscretion of a supposed discourse; and which, as the learned doctors on the other side truly state, has no termination; and between the parties themselves never obtains the best effect of a judgment, to put an end to litigation. In modern times, such suits have seldom been commenced but to favour some indirect purpose; and were the sentences allowed to have the effect that is now contended for, were they to be a bar to all criminal enquiry, it might be expected that suits, which, as the learned doctors state, may be carried on without end, would very frequently spring up.

Nothing can be further from the temper of my mind upon the present occasion, than to use a ludicrous argument: but when the uncontrollable effect of such sentences as these, so contrived and framed for fraud, was urged yesterday; and while, to lessen the objection to them, it was gravely argued, that no great mischief could happen from the decision, because you may reverse this sentence to-morrow, that the next day, and a third after that, and that the suit was in its nature eternal; an ingenious person among the bystanders was calculating, how many wives a man that had a taste for polygamy, might marry with impunity; and I think he made it out, according to the probable duration of such a suit, that a man between twenty-one and thirty-five might, with good industry, marry seventy-five wives by sentences of the Ecclesiastical Court, each sentence standing good till reversed, and all reversible by that judicature.

My lords, the argument is serious, though it presents a ludicrous idea; for one consequence would probably attend a decision in support of the authority of such a sentence. The marriage-act put an end to that terrible disgrace of a civilized country, Fleet marriages: while they subsisted, it was a common practice for indigent women of easy virtue to get a Fleet husband to protect them from their debts. If a sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court is to have effect against all but the parties, a cause of jactitation will supply the place of a Fleet marriage, and furnish an husband by sentence, whom the lady may remove whenever he proves inconvenient. This is but one instance, and in the lowest class of the evils, that would follow from allowing such sentences to be interposed against public justice, or the rights of third persons. What guard can there be against uncertain issue, uncertain rank, and all the numerous mischiefs that arise from doubt and collusion, introduced in the relations that form the bonds of society?

Were all considerations of the consequences attending such a decision to be laid aside, the very form of the sentence argues against its being conclusive. What says the Ecclesiastical Court in that sentence? 'As far as yet appears, no marriage is proved.' The verdict upon an indictment will say, 'it does now appear, that a marriage is proved.' The two propositions do not clash with each other; there is no contradiction in them: to the party it is said, You have not proved the marriage; a public accuser does prove the marriage; the justice of the country has brought out the evidence of that fact, which the party either did not incline, or was not able to produce. There is no repugnance in the different propositions, no incongruity in supposing that the sentence may stand as between the parties, and yet shall have no conclusion either as to the publick, or as to third persons.

The argument in favour of the sentence was supported by this dilemma. What becomes of this sentence, if the indictment for bigamy goes on? Is it null, or has it any effect? Is the party a wife, or no wife? I answer, to all civil effects no wife; the party has bereaved herself of any right to benefit by the relation; to all criminal effects a wife, because that relation, the duties consequent upon it, and the responsibility for the breach of those duties, cannot be destroyed by the act of the party. I could quote to your lordships other cases, where the party takes no benefit from his act, where he holds the situation only to make himself amenable to the justice of his country. I refer to a known case: a man had committed an act of bankruptcy by collusion with a creditor, and a commission of bankruptcy was taken out against him, the object of which was, to procure a discharge from his debts. He chose to conceal a part of his effects, for which he was indicted upon the statute making it a capital felony for a bankrupt to be guilty of any wilful concealment: it came out clear as the light, that he was no bankrupt, that is, no bankrupt to any civil effect; he could not avail himself of that commission of bankruptcy against any creditor that had a mind to dispute it, except the creditor who had colluded with him; but though he was in fact no bankrupt, he was tried and convicted as such.

My lords, after the indulgence with which your lordships have been so good as to hear me so long upon this subject, I am sorry to be obliged still to trespass a little longer upon your patience, when I consider the fourth proposition, which certainly is not the least material; that is, that a sentence, infected with fraud, to which collusion may be objected, is no bar in any cause. My lords, upon that head the principle is so plain, that the illustration of it will not run into much length, and the authorities are so decisive, that I shall only state, and not argue upon them.

A sentence obtained by fraud and collusion is no sentence. What is a sentence? It is not an instrument with a bit of wax and the seal of a court put to it; it is not an instrument with the signature of a person calling himself a register; it is not such a quantity of ink bestowed upon such a quantity of stamped paper: a sentence is a judicial determination of a cause agitated between real parties, upon which a real interest has been settled: in order to make a sentence, there must be a real interest, a real argument, a real prosecution, a real defence, a real decision. Of all these requisites, not one takes place in the case of a fraudulent and collusive suit: there is no judge; but a person, invested with the ensigns of a judicial office, is misemployed in listening to a fictitious cause proposed to him: there is no party litigating, there is no party defendant, no real interest brought into question; and, to use the words of a very sensible civilian on this point, fabula, non judicium, hoc est; in scena, non in foro, rei agitur.

The ground then upon which I contend, that a collusive sentence is no bar, is shortly this; that such a sentence is a mere nullity. But it is insisted, that the court which pronounced the sentence can alone declare the nullity of it, and, till repealed, it must stand good and valid. The authorities to which I mean to refer upon this head, will refute that argument, at the same time that they prove the general doctrine.

The first is my lord Coke's reasoning in Fermor's case, 3 Coke 77: he concludes the resolution of the case in this manner: 'Thereupon it was concluded, that if a recovery in dower, or other real action, if a remitter to a feme-covert or an infant, if a warranty, if a sale in market overt, if letters patent of the king, if presentations and admittances, that is to say, if all acts temporal and spiritual should be avoided by covin, for the same reason a fine in the principal case levied by fraud and covin shall not bind.' Nothing can be more explicit than these words to shew, that there is no necessity that the covin should be prosecuted in the court in which the judgment was obtained. The case of Lloyd and Madocks in Moore, 917, is a direct and a plain authority: there a fraudulent judgment was set up against a plea of a legatee in the Spiritual Court. The question in the court of King's Bench was, whether the Spiritual Court should be prohibited to enter into the consideration of the fraud of the judgment, which is certainly not a matter of ecclesiastical cognizance; but the court was of opinion, that the covin was aptly examinable in a court christian to that effect, and therefore the prohibition was denied.

My lords, the other authorities are more modern, though not more decisive upon the point than this. The first I mention to your lordships is the case of Prudham and Phillips: there is a very bad and a very inaccurate note of it in Sir John Strange: the note, from which I cite it, is a manuscript note of Mr. Ford. In that case it was determined by lord chief justice Willes, that a fraudulent and collusive sentence against Mrs. Constantia Phillips was binding upon her; but he concludes it was binding upon no other party: the fraud was a matter of fact, which if used in obtaining judgment was a deceit upon the court, a fraud upon strangers, who as they could not come in to reverse it, they could only alledge it was fraudulent. He said in that case, that any creditor of hers might reply that it was fraudulent, and avoid the effect of it. The other cases I refer to are, my lord Hardwicke's authority in the case of Roach and Garvin, 1st Vezey 159; and in the case of Brownsword and Edwards, 2d Vezey 246. In the case of Roach and Garvin, the question was upon the effect of a marriage, said to be established by the sentence of a court in France. Lord Hardwicke enters into the consideration of it thus: 'The question is, whether this is a proper sentence, in a proper cause, and between proper parties; whether a marriage is had in fact, or any contract in present, as a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court would be conclusive, unless there be collusion, which would overturn the whole.' In the other case the ground is exactly the same.

From these cases, I conclude it to have been the uniform opinion of all the great judges who sat in Westminster-Hall, from the time of lord Coke down to the present time (and the courts were never more ably filled) that fraud and collusion not only vitiates, but absolutely annuls; and that a sentence obtained by fraud is, literally, no sentence at all; therefore the objection of such an instrument, of so much paper and writing, is the objection of a mere nullity, and can have no effect neither in a civil nor in a criminal suit. Having troubled your lordships so very long, I will take up no more of your time, even to recapitulate the heads of the argument, but hasten to return my humble thanks for the great indulgence I have already experienced.

Mr. Dunning.

My lords, I purpose to give your lordships very little trouble: indeed, I should be without an apology, if I had thought of giving you much, finding, in the station which I hold in this cause, the subject completely exhausted; and I cannot but suppose your lordships attention in a great measure tired, notwithstanding the occasional relief which the entertaining parts of the cause have afforded, has given you. I have the less inclination to give your lordships much trouble, as I feel a degree of surprise, that it should have been thought necessary for the counsel on the part of the prosecution to give your lordships any.

My lords, the subject for immediate consideration is, the competency of obtruding this sentence, in this stage of the cause, to stop the cause here, and to require of your lordships to decide it, without any regard to the truth or the justice of the case: such however it is contended is the effect of this paper, that is offered to your lordships under the name of a sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court.

The novelty of the attempt it is not my intention to expatiate upon: it has been truly observed to your lordships, that some prejudice at least may be expected in the minds of your lordships against an attempt so novel; for though I am not so blind an admirer of antiquity as to take for granted, that every thing that is new is therefore wrong; sure I am, I am warranted in expecting your lordships concurrence in thinking, that those, who propose at this time of day to introduce into the judicature of this country a new practice, ought to be prepared with such reasons as should compel your lordships assent. This I think may be fairly insisted, upon the head of novelty.

My lords, the gentlemen undertake to maintain, first, that this evidence is competent and admissible; secondly, that it is conclusive; and thirdly, they insist on this conclusion, not only upon the supposition, that it is a sentence fairly obtained between real parties, after an adverse agitation of the question, which it is supposed to have decided; but though all these circumstances should be totally wanting, and though the contrary of them all should be the truth of the case, the sentence is insisted on as equally conclusive. In that extent it is, that the gentlemen have undertaken undertaken to maintain this proposition; and a very considerable task it seems to me they have undertaken. My lords, I consider the sentence as read only de bene esse, merely that your lordships may know what the contents of it are, that you may have the assistance of that knowledge in judging not only of the ultimate effect of it, but of the propriety of receiving it at all in this stage of the business. At the first blush, to be sure it seems a little absurd, that your lordships should be to decide the cause before you have the smallest knowledge of what the case is, that is to be stated upon the part of the prosecution. It is certainly necessary for those that are to judge of this paper, to know what it is. It is a sentence in a court, of which your lordships heard yesterday abundant commendation. It was observable that those who were most lavish in that commendation, were least acquainted with the practice of that court. The first of the learned doctors spoke with a very becoming modesty of the court in which he practises. The other explained to your lordships the nature of a jactitation suit as concluding nothing, being to be revived at any time, and consequently having no end. It was contended by all the gentlemen, that this court was entitled not only to what on the part of the prosecutor we should have had no difficulty perhaps to have admitted, to co-equality with the courts of temporal jurisdiction, but to something superior; it was contended that there was something in the nature of this subject that made it peculiarly the province of that court to judge of and to decide upon: not that they have better means of information, not that they have better rules of decision; but from something unexplained in the constitution of the court, it was rather assumed than attempted to be proved, that to that court exclusively belong matrimonial questions, questions on the rights of marriage, and even of the facts of marriage. I am persuaded your lordships all go before me in feeling a conviction, that there is not in that extent a foundation for that claim: yet this peculiarity of jurisdiction, and the consequential necessity, in order to get rid of the sentence, to resort again to that jurisdiction, appeared to me to be the points principally insisted on. Neither of them, I trust, your lordships will think are made out at present. I am considering the first. That to certain purposes, and with a view to certain consequences, the Spiritual Court is the only court in which questions of matrimony can be agitated, is most true. There alone it is, that the party deprived of, and complaining of the want of conjugal rights, must resort to seek them: there it is, where the party supposed to be injured by a false claim of a marriage, when none exists, can obtain redress for that injury: but, to other purposes, and various are those purposes in which the question of marriage arises, whether it is to be examined into with a view to temporal or spiritual advantages, whether it is to be examined into with a view to rights derived from it, or punishments for crimes committed in relation to it, to the temporal and not to the spiritual courts belongs, I conceive, this question of marriage. My lords, to suppose otherwise would be to deny in fact, that your lordships sit here with any jurisdiction at all; for if it were true in the extent in which it was contended, that to the Spiritual Court exclusively belongs the consideration and decision of the question, marriage or no marriage, it will follow by a necessary consequence, that if there were no such sentence as the present to be thrust in our way, and to create this temporary difficulty, for such I trust it will prove to be, if there had been no decision in the Spiritual Court at all, your lordships would only have been in the possession of this cause for the purpose of writing to the bishop to know how the fact stood, and from his certificate to take your ideas of the question which you are to decide upon. The gentlemen must maintain not only that there was not at the common law any thing like a jurisdiction, but that this statute, which means in terms to give a jurisdiction, has not in point of effect given any. I am at a loss to find a way, consistent with what the gentlemen have maintained, to deliver them from that consequence. If they insist, that no temporal court has a power to enquire into a question of marriage, it will go to that extent. They have made a distinction between those cases, in which the question is the point of the cause, and in which it arises incidentally. The question does not arise at all, unless it arises materially: if there be any thing in the distinction, let us see a little how it will help this argument. Was the marriage the gift of this cause in the Spiritual Court? No: the lady applies to the Spiritual Court, assuming that there was no marriage, complaining of an injury, which consists in the circumstance of a man who was not her husband taking to himself and boasting (as a man would be apt to boast in such circumstances) of the honour of bearing that relation to her.

This cause is not in its nature a question of marriage, but of defamation. If that, which the lady suggested, had been admitted to be the truth of the case, he would have been to excuse or extenuate his offence, just as the nature of his case would enable him to do, by either denying that he had boasted, or stating what had led him into it: but this defendant says, No: I have held that language, which you call boasting: I will not dispute with you the propriety of that appellation: I have called this lady my wife; because, whether it be my good or ill fortune, she is my wife. It is for that reason, and that reason alone, that I have held this language, which is imputed to me as a crime: I am no criminal in holding this language, for that is my situation, and this is my defence. Thus it is, that the question of marriage is introduced into the cause: it is insisted upon as a defence; as a matter material to her defence it is that the question of marriage in this cause arises. Is it less incidental or more direct than the same question arising in the ordinary way, in which it arises in temporal courts? A person, claiming to be the legitimate son of his father, commences an ejectment, in which the question of legitimacy turns out to be the only question in the cause: it is essential to his supporting his claim, that the court, who are to judge of it, and the jury that are to decide upon it, should be satisfied of the facts, that the claimant is the eldest and the legitimate son of the father. The point of marriage is not the point of the suit directly, immediately, ostensibly, and upon the face of the record in that cause; but incidentally, materially, and necessarily that point becomes a point in the cause. Just that, in my apprehension, this cause stands; and, as applied to this case, the gentlemen cannot avail themselves of the distinction between the jurisdiction to be exercised incidentally, and to be exercised directly, upon the subject of marriage. One of the learned doctors represented his ideas of this jurisdiction exercised in the Spiritual Court, as if it was a jurisdiction to decide upon an abstract question. I am persuaded the learned doctor in the use of that word meant only to say, that in their forms of proceeding, and in some of those causes which are instituted in their courts, the right of marriage, in contradistinction to the fact of marriage, was more immediately pertinent than in some of the proceedings in temporal courts; which to be sure it is. In any other sense of the word, the learned doctor used it inaccurately; for that court, any more than this or any court, has no jurisdiction to try abstract questions of any sort. No question ought to be agitated in any court whatever, unless it be a real question springing from a real interest, and between real parties. To agitate any other question is an insult to the court. There is a sense in which the court may be said to have agitated this, in the nature of an abstract question; for it is certainly true, if our instructions have any foundation in truth, no one circumstance of the actual case of the parties was before the court, or made any part of their enquiry. I trust, I shall be thought to have done enough at least for the Ecclesiastical Court in admitting, that their sentences are equal to our judgments; that they are not entitled to more, I may safely contend, when I am admitting, that they are entitled to as much attention as is due to a decree of a court of equity or a judgment of a court of law. In such an admission, at one time I should have been thought to have gone much too far: I trust, the learned doctors will forgive me, if I cannot carry my civility any farther. God be thanked we live at a time, when a better understanding of the subject, and a more liberal way of thinking upon every subject, has so far abolished the ancient differences between the different judicatures in this country, that we and the learned doctors may meet together without quarrelling. Their proceedings in cases in which it is competent to them to proceed, deserve the same attention and faith as those of temporal courts. This appears to me to reduce the claim, upon the part of those that are to support this sentence, precisely to this situation; and it is impossible to carry it one jot further: it is an opinion of a court, not having superior or exclusive, but having a concurrent jurisdiction of this question; having competent power to decide, and having no powers to exclude another decision elsewhere, where, for other purposes, criminal or civil, it may come to be discussed, according to the forms which those different judicatures usually observe in their proceedings, totally unobstructed or assisted by any attention to what has passed in any other judicature: this, I trust, will be your lordships judgment upon the question agitated between us, if it should be material.

My lords, I laid in my claim to object to the admissibility of this piece of evidence, upon which, if I should have the good fortune to have your lordships concurrence, the subsequent consideration of the effects of it, if admitted, will become totally immaterial. I deny, that this is admissible in a court like this, a court of the highest criminal jurisdiction in this country.

My lords, it is so familiar, that it would be impertinent to that part of the court to which I have the honour to address myself, which is more particularly conversant in the forms of proceeding in courts of justice, to be labouring to prove, that when a subject is examined into in the course of a criminal enquiry, under the form of an indictment, or of an information, what has passed or may pass in the course of a civil enquiry upon the same subject and the same question, is not only not regarded, but is not admitted. In the instance that was put, and many others that may occur to some of your lordships, it is perfectly notorious, and therefore neither requires argument nor proof, that the practice is certainly so. Let a man be acquitted in a court of criminal jurisdiction, it does not preclude a party, complaining of an injury arising from that act, which in a criminal court has been presented as a crime, from seeking redress for the civil injury; and vice versa, the fate of such an action cannot be enquired into, much less cannot it preclude the proceedings in a subsequent criminal enquiry, taking its rise from the same act. It has been enquired into in a court of one description, it is now enquiring into in a court of another description.

My lords, one reason (there are others, but) one reason why courts of criminal jurisdiction do not admit any account of what has passed upon the agitation of the question in a court of civil jurisdiction may be, the liability to fraud and collusion. I am not now arguing upon the fact of collusion in this case: but it is obvious that if this would do, if the sentence of a court of such jurisdiction, whether ecclesiastical or temporal, will preclude a criminal enquiry, the receipt is of ample use; and all men may, if they please, cover themselves against the penal consequences of their crimes by instituting a friendly suit. Some such we have known to have been so conducted as to escape the attention of the judges, who have not found out, till after the cause has been decided, that the cause has been collusive. Cases of this sort are so open to fraud and collusion, that for this reason, if there were no other, the courts of criminal jurisdiction will always reject such evidence. I do not know that case has yet existed, where any person has done so strange a thing, as to put it in the power of the court to receive or reject by offering such evidence. Your lordships have had cited to you a case, which, having been treated as it deserves, need not be repeated by me; the case of the King and Vincent. If it were possible to suppose that case could be law, that supposition is removed, when your lordships are told that a different opinion upon the same point has been held by the judges that have succeeded in the same court, and to whose knowledge or ability nobody, that knows who they are, would, I believe, object. The last of these cases, the King and Stirling, I am aware, may be attempted to be distinguished, and for what I know the first of them may, by saying that the question did not occur, the objection was not taken in either of these cases; but your lordships knowing before whom those criminals were tried, will believe that no such objection would have escaped these judges, if it had been founded in law, although no counsel objected to it, or although the criminals perhaps had not the assistance of counsel; therefore I consider that case as fairly dismissed, and the subsequent sequent cases as carrying an authority upon our side that more than over- turns it: but I do not conceive, that even this was wanting; for the instrument in the case of the King and Vincent has no resemblance to the sentence now offered; it was an official instrument, necessary to give sanction to a legal right. Letters of administration, or a probate, may be admissible; but it does not by any means follow, that a sentence like this is admissible here: if it be, it must be equally admissible on all sides. The gentlemen argue, that your lordships should receive it, should act upon it, should conclude upon it. Why? Because it is a sentence rescinding the marriage, declaring that there was no marriage; that is the import of this sentence, and therefore it operates in their favour, and therefore it happens that they produce it. Let me invert the case; let me suppose, that when this lady instituted that suit, the party, who was the object of it, had supported that defence, as we conceive he was very well able to have done, and that in consequence the cause had ended in a declaration or a sentence, that there was a marriage: in that case, would it have been evidence upon the part of the prosecutor? Would it have been attended with those consequences, which they are claiming for it now upon the part of the person prosecuted? Would your lordships have endured, that the prosecutor should have come here to support this indictment by no other evidence, than the production of a sentence in a suit like this in the Spiritual Court, by which that court had determined Mr. Hervey and the lady he had married were husband and wife? Can I possibly state it to any mind that comprehends it, that does not at the same time revolt at the apparent hardship and injustice of such an idea? And yet is there any thing more true, than that a record cannot be evidence of one side, which would not, if it had imported the reverse, have been evidence, and with equal force, of the other? I conceive it to be one of the fundamental rules to determine what evidence of this nature is or is not admissible, that if it could not have been admitted on behalf of the party objecting to it, supposing its import had been favourable to him, so neither shall it be admitted on the part of the person proposing it. I trust I may be warranted in presuming that your lordships think as I do; that in order to support this indictment something more than such a sentence would be required from us; and that the legislature in making this new provision meant, that the fact should be enquired into, as all other facts are enquired into; that the relation should be proved by those who were witnesses to it, by those who can prove the confession of the parties to it, or by those who can give such other evidence as courts of criminal jurisdiction are authorised to act upon. Can any thing then be more obviously unsuitable to any ideas of justice, than that the enquiry should be precluded by a record in favour of one of the parties, which might have been as favourable to the other party, and which, if it had been, would not have been regarded?

If your lordships think fit to admit this evidence, and by so doing to raise a question upon the effects of it, the gentlemen argue with some appearance of triumph, that this kind of sentence is conclusive, for that there are various instances, in which sentences of these courts, in which judgments of other courts, have been held conclusive. For this purpose your lordships are furnished with a great string of cases, some of condemnations in the court of Exchequer, some even from boards of Excise, some from courts of Admiralty, some from domestic and some from foreign courts. There has existed, and still exists, such a comity in the practice of one court towards the proceedings of another, that, whether the court be foreign or domestic, the courts presume, that what is done is rightly done, that there has been no collusion, that there has been no fraud, that the judgment and decree is what it ought to be, the effect of an adverse suit between adverse parties. Presuming the effect of such sentences, such decrees and judgments, in civil causes to have been what it has been stated to be, it must have been upon the supposition and upon the presumption that the sentence or the decree has been fairly and rightly obtained: but if this degree of conclusiveness were allowed to it in criminal cases, if such a sentence were allowed to be conclusive, where the parties are unprepared in point of evidence to impeach it, and if such were allowed to be the effect of it in such a case in courts of criminal jurisdiction, it would obstruct the course of justice in a thousand instances, and in effect operate to the repeal of this and many other wholesome laws. In this instance the mischief would too be great if the policy of this law be questionable, if that which we call a crime is an innocent action: If there is no impropriety in the practice now brought under your lordships consideration, if polygamy deserves encouragement instead of a check, then in another character your lordships will do well to repeal the act; but do not do it in your judicial character.

My lords, cases may be supposed, and we are in a situation that authorizes us, nay, not only authorizes but requires us to suppose, the grossest cases that our imaginations can furnish. It is not difficult to suppose a case, in which the directest fraud upon the court may be practised by means of the grossest perjury, and yet through the collusion of the parties it may be managed with so much dexterity, that it would be impossible to get at them; and in all these instances the effect I am now deprecating would be of course let in upon the criminal jurisdiction of this country.

My lords, I am persuaded your lordships will not do this. In what I have said upon this point, I have anticipated in part the question which I stated as the third in the order, in which I purposed to consider the argument on the part of the lady at the bar. All her counsel have attempted to contend for the conclusiveness of this sentence; and they all mean, I presume, to insist upon it as precluding an enquiry into the mode of obtaining it. The other learned gentlemen will excuse me, if I seem to have been less attentive to what fell from them, than to the second counsel on the part of the lady. The fact is, I heard him more distinctly than those who preceded or followed him. He chose to consider this act as not having created a new offence, but as having simply varied the punishment and mode of trial of a known offence, which existed as the law stood then. I am at a loss to comprehend, in what sense this can be considered as having not created a new offence. This act declares something to be a felony, which before was no felony. This act creates that to be a felony, enquirable into in the way in which other felonies are by law enquirable into, in a case that was before only cognizable as an offence against the canon law, and enquirable into in a suit which had nothing for its object but the spiritual interest of the party. I conceive it to be a new offence in the same sense, in which almost all the statutable offences in this country are new offences. This act has not only created a new offence, but, as I conceive, abolished an old one; for I doubt whether it be now competent for an ecclesiastical court to proceed to enquire into offences of this sort, if it were (as has been supposed) their practice before this act. By the custom of London, a certain species of defamation is actionable there; and upon that ground the temporal courts proceed in granting prohibitions to stay proceedings of the Spiritual Court in such cases; so I apprehend the courts would do here, if the Spiritual Court proceeded pro salute anime in a case of polygamy. My learned friend assumed, that this sentence would stop the proceeding of such a cause in the Ecclesiastical Court, but referred to the learned doctors to make it out; which the learned doctors, I presume, not liking the reference, forgot to attempt: so it stands as a point assumed, but not proved, that the Spiritual Court would at this time entertain such a suit, and that its progress would be stopped by such a sentence. Your lordships heard a very pathetic description of the melancholy situation in which the lady will stand under this sentence, if this prosecution proceeds, and in consequence of it she should be treated in the disagreeable way to which the act exposes her. She will nevertheless, it has been said, after having been punished as a married woman, be totally destitute of any advantage in present or future of that marriage; she can never claim any conjugal rights, nor (if her circumstances did not preclude the necessity of her seeking it) could she compel any maintenance from this gentleman during his life-time, nor can she, if she survives this supposed husband, support any claim to his fortune.

My lords, the husband is in the same lamentable situation: it is equally incompetent to him, while this sentence stands, to derive any advantage in point of comfort during her life-time, or in point of succession upon the death of the lady. It may be so; but if it is so, it will not be the effect of the judgment your lordships will be to pronounce: it is the effect of those practices between the parties which have produced this sentence, and which have made this their situation and their state.

My lords, it will be time enough to consider this question, when the case arises. If ever this lady should re-assume an inclination to establish that relation, which in this suit she has thought good to disclaim; or if it should ever be the pleasure of the earl of Bristol to connect himself again with this lady under the relation of an husband; it will then be time enough to enquire, what they can or cannot make of such a claim, or what the impediments are, which they will have to remove in order to establish that claim. As neither of these cases are very likely to arise, it is immaterial to go further into the enquiry of what may probably or possibly be the consequence of them. It occurred to the learned gentleman to consider, that it was very possible he might be led by this train of reasoning into the consideration of the effect of the collusion. Your lordships will permit me to remark, that the learned gentleman who spoke first upon that side of the question, chose to be perfectly silent upon this head. He did not seem to know that it would be likely to occur to us in the consideration of this sentence to suggest, that it was collusive; for unless it were by an allusion to the case of Hatfield and Hatfield, the notion of collusion, as making a part of this question, did not seem to have occurred to him. Mr. Mansfield saw the certainty of the collusion being introduced into the argument: to obviate it, he used three cases, two that had been mentioned before, and a third he introduced for the purpose. The first, in the order of time, was the case of Kenn in my lord Coke, which whoever reads, will see that the only point determined, and the only point to be determined in that case, was, that it was not competent for the party to traverse an offence that had been found against him: all the rest is that sort of lucubration which adorns, and in many instances improves, the reports of that learned judge of the decisions of his own time. And this is the use that is attempted to be made of this part of the argument; that it was founded in falsehood; and therefore was upon the face of it collusive. The falsehood was, that the party was in a condition, as it turned out by subsequent enquiry, to have made a better case than he did make; and from thence it is to be taken for granted, that of purpose and design he abstained from making that case that he did not make. Your lordships know better the nature of business, than from such a circumstance to infer a fraud: the best-bottomed causes often miscarry for want of that evidence, without which they cannot be supported. The next case, that of Morris and Webber, from Moore's Reports, seems to me to be still less material or useful to the purpose for which it is produced: that was the case of a divorce propter impotentiam viri. The parties marrying afterwards, fruit of each of these marriages was the birth of children. Perhaps it may occur, that that circumstance did not afford a very decisive and conclusive proof of the negative of the ground upon which that decree was pronounced: it is not an impossible case, that what had happened might happen, although the divorce was perfectly well founded in point of fact. But suppose it were taken for granted, that the child must of necessity be the issue of a man who had been divorced propter impotentiam; yet that it must of necessity be inferred from thence, that this sentence was collusively obtained, remains to be made out. I conceive that this case, any more than the one that preceded it, does not afford a colour to say, that the question of collusion and the competency of going into the question of collusion occurred to the court in either of these two cases. In the case of Hatfield and Hatfield, a man, who, under colour of being the husband of the woman, had taken upon him to release some interest which she was entitled to, and he claimed to be entitled to in her right, and the question turned upon the effect of that notion: there was afterwards a sentence between the parties against the marriage; whether the means to obtain it were fair or foul, fraudulent or otherwise, we are left to guess at. Your lordships will not, I presume, adopt all the printed reasons, good, bad, or indifferent, that are offered to your lordships at the close of your printed cases. Your lordships predecessors in that case could do no otherwise than than they did: they saw, that the decision in the court below was right, and upon that ground they affirmed the decree. Now, what was the thing decreed, and the point in controversy between the parties? The man, while he passed for this lady's husband, took upon him to release an interest, which it was not competent for him to release, whether he had or not that character, the subject of the release being a legacy, left to her under a will, in such terms as operated to give her in equity a separate interest. I need not contend, that in a separate interest of the wife the husband cannot controul or deprive the wife of it by any release of his. A court of equity had decided against the party claiming under the release, which, according to the settled doctrine of courts of equity, it was equally bound to do, whether the party releasing had or had not married the woman whose interests were to be affected by it; and the question (husband or no husband) was just as foreign to the merits of that decision, as any thing that could be talked about in the cause. Totally therefore laying out of the question all that had been said upon the subject that was not necessary to the decision of the case, the house of lords affirmed the decree of the court, because they saw it had rightly decided the only point in controversy between the parties. These then are the cases, upon the ground of which, and upon the ground of which alone, (for I have not been able to collect a fourth) your lordships are desired to decline doing that in this instance, which we contend your lordships are bound in justice to do; that is, to let us into the enquiry by what means this sentence was obtained. The gentleman, particularly, who made this use of these three cases, could not forget the familiar practice, which he is a witness to every day of the year, of impeaching the judgments of the courts of law, whenever they are impeachable upon the foundation of fraud and covin. It never occurred to a court in which such a question arises to refer the party who makes a complaint of a judgment so obtained, to the court in which it was obtained, or to direct him to institute a suit to get rid of it; he impeaches it just when it affects him, and not further than as it affects him; beyond that, it is a matter of perfect indifference to him, whether it stands or falls; for the purpose of doing that, which alone he is interested in doing, the party, who would otherwise be prejudiced by such a judgment, is constantly and daily permitted to say, that this was a judgment obtained by covin: this allegation is usually formed into an issue, and if that issue is determined in his favour, though the judgment stands as to every other person, quoad him it is avoided in the manner we are ready to avoid this sentence. It was said, that the reason why creditors are permitted so to avoid judgments set up to their prejudice by executors or administrators, who seek to cover effects in their possession by false judgments, is, because these people cannot be relieved in any other form; it cannot be referred to any other court. I am perfectly content to take that as the principle; then it remains, in order to support this distinction, for the learned gentlemen among them to make out, that it is competent to his majesty to make himself a party to this suit in the Spiritual Court, or to institute there, by his proper officer, a new suit to get rid of this sentence. The gentlemen have not attempted it; it would be ridiculous; and I fancy I may presume it will not be attempted: it is not competent, much less necessary, for the king or his law-officers to go into that court for a purpose so idle as this. Taking this then to be the reason why it is admitted in civil causes to creditors to get rid of judgments, by which they are attempted to be injured, by shewing that they were collusive and fraudulent, does it not follow by parity of reason, that it is equally proper that the same thing should be done here, supposing that your lordships should for a moment forget this to be in a criminal cause, in which the reasons for so doing are so much the stronger? Another distinction between this case and that was attempted. It was said, this is not the case of a third person complaining of an injury arising by a sentence, and wishing to avoid it so far only as it affects him; but it is a suit instituted for overturning the sentence. I apprehend it is not so; we contend for nothing but to lay this sentence out of our way, as applied to the present subject; just as you lay out of the way a judgment between A. and B. where it is attempted to be used to the prejudice of C. After your lordships have convicted this lady, if in the result of the enquiry it should be proved, that such is the justice of the case, I do not know that the verdict or the judgment in this case will be evidence upon an enquiry into the same facts for another purpose. If the result of the present enquiry is understood to establish the marriage, and to nullify the sentence, it is because the sentence is in its nature, when it comes to be enquired into, really and truly null and void; not because that such is the effect of any operative power and force that belong to your lordships conviction. This is not a prosecution for the annulling of that sentence; this is a prosecution to subject the party to the punishment which is by law due to the offence charged upon her: it cannot be attended with any other possible consequence. Upon the same ground that the sentence is attempted to be impeached here, it may be impeached every where, except by the parties, who may perhaps have precluded themselves by their conduct from impeaching it.

My lords, as there are no authorities on the one side, it remains for a moment only to observe, that there are authorities on the other side: as applied to civil cases, two have been mentioned. The good sense of both the authorities, particularly of one, I should apprehend establishes this proposition clear of all controversy; for, when in the case of the action against Constantia Phillips, of famous memory, it was determined, that whatever objections would avoid a judgment in a court of common law, would be sufficient to overturn a sentence in the Spiritual Court, but none other; one should have imagined that the proposition carried with it so much good sense, that all the world should feel it and adopt it. The Scotch case is by the highest authority, and there the true use that is to be made of a judgment in another court is ascertained and limited: it is evidence; it is strong evidence; but it remains to be explained; and still more, it remains to be laid out of the case in a cause like this, and in a case like that of Phillips, where there existed a ground to impute collusion and fraud to it. In Phillips's case, it was not permitted to her to avail herself of that collusion and that fraud. Why? Because it was a fraud of her own. But the learned judge, when he refused to permit her to impeach that sentence, which she had obtained by collusion and fraud, adds, according to Mr. Ford's manuscript note, that, 'as against all others, whatever objections would avoid a judgment in a court of law, would be sufficient to overturn a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court.' We desire to overturn this sentence upon no other grounds, than sentences and judgments in courts of law are every day overturned by: they must continue to be so overturned in future, as long as there continues to be any attention to truth and justice in the decisions of courts of judicature. I do apprehend, that your lordships will not think, that I take an improper freedom with the sentence, or the court whose sentence it is, by desiring that your lordships will by-and-by form an opinion of the purity of their proceedings by the specimen that we shall give you of them, when we come to state and prove the means by which this sentence was procured; and then perhaps your lordships will see no reason for raising it above the level of other courts, on which we are content to leave it. With your lordships permission, I would supply an omission I meant to have stated in its proper place; the case of Robins and Crutebley. A Mrs. Robins commenced an action of dower, claiming a share of the succession to her supposed husband Mr. Robins: this lady had been claimed to be the wife of a Sir William Wolfley. Sir William —, upon the supposition that she was his wife, had instituted a suit in the Spiritual Court, probably with an intention to get rid of her, charging her with having committed adultery with Robins: in the course of that enquiry in the Spiritual Court, it came out to the satisfaction of the court, that she was the wife of Robins and not of Sir William —. This sentence was introduced in pleading in this cause of dower for the purpose of repelling a denial on the part of the heirs of Mr. Robins, that she bore any relation to them or to their ancestor. To that replication there was a demurrer, which brought under consideration of the court of Common Pleas the effect of this sentence so pleaded. The opinion of the court of Common Pleas was to allow that demurrer; and though the point decided may perhaps be only this, that that sentence could not avail the party in that form of pleading; yet I conceive that point must be very erroneously decided, if the sentence were of the description which has been attempted to be passed upon your lordships: for if it had been understood to be conclusive and preclusive of all further enquiry, most undoubtedly it would have been a proper subject to be introduced in pleading as a bar to any farther enquiry. Your lordships, by looking into the only report in print of that case (Mr. Serjeant Wilson's) will find, that the learned judges of the Common Pleas, who decided it, seemed to be agreed in thinking, that it was very far from an established point, that this sentence was conclusive, that the question could only be tried upon the issue ne unques accouple, which your lordships know to be the only proper issue in a question of dower, and that issue must be determined by the bishop's certificate. Now we are told that this sentence is just equivalent to the certificate of a bishop: this was so far from being the opinion of that court, that they leave to the bishop to judge for himself, what regard he would pay to that sentence on the point which he was to certify.

Doctor Harris.

My lords,

It would ill become me at this time, after the points which have been proposed have been so fully discussed by the gentlemen who have gone before me, to take up much of your lordships time.

There are two questions, as I understand, before your lordships.

The first of them is, whether a sentence in a cause of jactitation can be given in evidence, as an absolute bar to a prosecution by the king? and the other is, whether, on supposition that a sentence in a cause of jactitation can be given in evidence, it will afford a complete defence, so that no proofs whatever can be admitted afterwards in order to counteract and impeach that sentence?

How these questions come before your lordships, whether properly or improperly, is not for me to argue. It is out of my profession to say any thing about them; but as the gentlemen on the other side have been permitted to state them and argue on them, it is certainly necessary that they should also be discussed by the counsel for the prosecution.

In regard to the first question, I shall not trouble your lordships long, because the discussion of it relates principally to the practice of courts of law, but shall more particularly attach myself to the consideration of the second; as I shall in so doing have an opportunity to say a word or two in answer to what the gentlemen have urged on the other side, who are of the same profession, and practise in the same courts where I have the honour to attend.

In respect to the first question, whether a sentence of jactitation is an absolute bar, and can be offered as such to a suit at the prosecution of the king, it is to be observed, that anciently the whole cognizance of marriage, with that of the crimes attending it, was vested in the ecclesiastical courts: but those courts being either remiss in the exertion of their jurisdictions, or, more probably, wanting power to inflict an adequate punishment sufficient to stop the growth of the increasing evil, and the legislature, for constitutional reasons, being both unwilling and unable to invest them with more authority than they then had, the aid of parliament became absolutely necessary; and the statute of James the first, on which the prisoner stands indicted, was accordingly made; by which it was enacted, that if any person being married shall marry another, the former husband or wife being alive, the offence shall be felony.

Before this statute, the ecclesiastical courts had the cognizance of the crime of taking a second wife, or a second husband, whilst the first wife or first husband was living; but the statute, as I understand, takes that branch of the jurisdiction, namely, the power of inflicting any punishment whatever on a person guilty of polygamy, entirely from the ecclesiastical courts; inasmuch, that, if at this time a process was to issue from an Ecclesiastical Court in order to call any person to account for bigamy or polygamy (whichever it may be termed), the party cited might obtain a prohibition from the judges of the temporal courts to stop such a suit, a suit, in the same manner as a prohibition may be obtained in case of a prosecution in an ecclesiastical court for perjury not committed in that court, or for any other crime punishable by a statute. Now, my lords, it is evident, that the one court has lost what the other has gained, in respect to the offence of bigamy; so that the temporal court, or rather your lordships, are able to judge of bigamy, and of every ecclesiastical matter incident to that branch of spiritual jurisdiction. It may here be observed; that a jactitation cause is described in our books of practice to be a quasi defamatory suit; and most certainly it is so, and nothing more, when a person libelled against in jactitation confesses the boasting; as, when a man cites a woman for boasting, and she acknowledges the jactitation; for the cause ends here, and is strictly of a defamatory nature. But I do not mean to deny, when the defendant undertakes to justify, that the cause then becomes truly matrimonial; for the sentence will then necessarily be, either that the parties are man and wife, or that the plaintiff's or party agent is free from all matrimonial contracts, quantum nobis constare potuit, or as far as to us as yet appears. But though a sentence in these words may have frequently been adjudged [as in Jones and Bow, Carthew 225—and in Clews and Bathurst, Strange 960.] to be binding on the temporal courts in cases of property, till reversed; yet it by no means follows, that such a sentence can amount to an acquittal of the plaintiff from having any farther evidence brought against him, the very words, as far as to us yet appears, implying the contrary, and evincing that farther proofs may legally be adduced in the proper court. The words of the sentence speak sufficiently for themselves: there is no occasion to have recourse to authorities from books. Let it be supposed for a moment, that the antient jurisdiction remained in the ecclesiastical courts, and that they possessed their former power; is it possible to conceive, that a sentence like the present, pronouncing a woman to be a spinster, as far as to the court as yet appears, could be a bar to a suit in the same or in another ecclesiastical court against the same woman for polygamy? If it could be a bar, it would amount to an acquittal, till the sentence in the civil suit had been reversed; which would be subversive of justice, by making the commission of an undiscovered crime in one court a shelter against the punishment of that very crime in another. If the doctrine now contended for should prevail, that the offering of a sentence in jactitation, pronouncing the party agent free from matrimony as far as it yet appears, is an absolute bar to a criminal prosecution, there would be an opportunity on every indictment for polygamy to defeat the statute: for in the case of a woman marrying two husbands, if the first husband should consent to a collusive suit, the wife would have nothing to do but to cite the first husband into an ecclesiastical court for jactitation, if she apprehended a prosecution on the statute; and then, either on confession of the boasting by the first husband, or on his failing to prove his marriage, if he undertook the proof, a sentence would be obtained, which would intirely defeat the statute. That this house should give a countenance to a doctrine of such tendency, is not to be imagined. It would be so far to restore the ecclesiastical courts to their former authority, as to put it in the power of evil-disposed persons to use those courts to the defeazance of the statute, without giving back to the ecclesiastical courts a jurisdiction to punish the crime of polygamy, which would thus go unpunished: it would be to render those courts in this respect hurtful, without affording them an opportunity of being useful; and it would in effect be to destroy a law in your lordships judicial capacity, which had formerly on the maturest consideration been established in this house as a part of the legislature.

It would now be improper for me to detain your lordships any longer on this question, which has been so ably and fully discussed already; and I shall trust, that your lordships cannot be prevailed on to declare the sentence in jactitation conclusive upon this high court, or to suffer it to be read judicially as a stop to any evidence which may be brought as a proof of the marriage of the lady at the bar with Mr. Hervey, now earl of Bristol.

But on supposition that the sentence may be permitted to be judicially read, it may be necessary for me, in contradiction to what the gentlemen of my own profession have asserted, to trouble your lordships with a word or two in the briefest manner I am able, in order to shew, that evidence of a particular kind may be given in all courts, and at all times, to rebut a sentence in jactitation in disfavour of matrimony, for the purpose of relieving an injured party and of punishing the guilty.

It is a general rule, which is not to be denied, that respect is due from one court in England to the decisions of another, and that comity is due to the decisions of all foreign courts; and it might be more accurate and more strictly true to say in general, that one court in England is bound by the judgments and sentences of another; but the generality of this rule does not exclude an exception, which in reality affords a proof of its generality: for, under circumstances, evidence of every sort, parole as well as instrumental, may be received in one court to affect a sentence in another. Fraud in a single person, and collusion, where there are two or more, may be given in evidence in the same court in a different suit, or in another court, to affect the parties to a sentence; and of course to affect the sentence or judgment itself in some degree.

It is true, that by the ecclesiastical law, a sentence in any case obtained by collusion may be declared void in the same court in which it was pronounced, by means of a special suit for that purpose; and most certainly at the suit of a person having an interest, who could not even have intervened at the time when the suit was pending; and such was the case of lady Francis Meadows, who had no interest in the years 1768 and 1769, when the suit of jactitation was pending: but it does not follow, because a sentence obtained by collusion may be annulled in the same court where it was pronounced, that such sentence may not be impeached by any means whatever in another court.

I shall not, in proof of what I have advanced, detain your lordships with a repetition of the particulars of Fermor's case, as reported in the third part of Coke's Reports. I shall only observe, that it was a case depending in the court of Chancery, in the 44th of Elizabeth, before sir Thomas

Egerton, the then lord-keeper, in which Richard Fermor complained, that Thomas Smith the defendant was his tenant, and had levied a fine with proclamations, in order to bar him of his inheritance, by covin and practice. The lord-keeper, considering on one side the mischiefs which might arise from such practice, and on the other side considering that fines and proclamations are the general assurances of the realm, referred the case to the two chief justices, Popham and Anderson, who, after a conference, thought it necessary, that all the justices of England and barons of the Exchequer should be assembled: they assembled accordingly, and it was at length resolved by the two chief justices and barons of the Exchequer, except two, that Richard Fermor was not barred by the fine with proclamations. The lord-keeper, sir Thomas Egerton, commended the resolution of the judges, and agreed with them in opinion.

The precedents and reasons, on which the above-mentioned opinion was formed, have already been ably related, and are well known to some of your lordships: it may suffice on my part to add, that a fine, the most deliberate (for it is five years in completing) and of course the most solemn of all judgments, was not deemed, in the opinion of the lord-keeper and ten of the judges, to be of weight sufficient to protect a colluding party; but was suffered to be impeached by the admission of evidence in another court than that where the fine was levied, in order to afford relief to an injured man.

It is said by lord Coke in the same Report, that all acts ecclesiastical as well as temporal shall be avoided by fraud and covin. And indeed if one temporal court is bound in justice and law to pay no regard to the judgment of another temporal court under the circumstances above described, can any reason be given, why the sentence of an ecclesiastical court in such a case should be treated with more respect by the temporal judges, than they are obliged to pay to the judgments of their own courts?

But to the honour of the temporal courts it must be said, that, as far as it is in their power, they lend their aid to the ecclesiastical courts in case of covin and collusion, by permitting the ecclesiastical courts to try such fraud, even when committed in the temporal courts, as incidental matter.

The case alluded to is in Moore's Reports, page 917, Lloyd and Maddox.

Mr. Lloyd a legatee sued Maddox the executor of the deceased in the Spiritual Court for his legacy. The executor alleged, that all the testator's effects had been recovered from him the executor, in a court of common law, by a creditor of the testator. The legatee alleged in his turn, and undertook to prove in the ecclesiastical court, that the recovery at common law was in consequence of collusion or covin between a pretended creditor and the executor. And, upon the admission of this plea in the ecclesiastical court, the executor applied to the temporal court for a prohibition, which was denied.

And from this it is evident by necessary inference, that the temporal courts must have deemed themselves competent to judge incidentally of covin or collusion committed in a spiritual court, in order to relieve an injured party or suitor in a temporal court.

When this liberty taken by one court with the apparent judgment of another, under circumstances, comes to be considered, it seems to be founded on the strongest reason: for when a judgment has been procured by a collusion of parties, though it must stand on record, and may not, I grant, be actually expunged or taken from the file, but by the court in which it was given; yet it is certainly a mere nothing to those, who, not being privies, can shew it false and covinous. It is a sentence in which the judge had never an opportunity of doing real justice—and is undoubtedly, what it has been justly styled by a writer on the civil law, a stage-play, a prophane mockery, or any thing but a judgment. It is not to the disrepute, but to the honour of a court, as well as to the benefit of the publick, that such a fraud should be detected. The upright judge must of all things wish it.—And confident I am, that to discover such a profligate proceeding (from which no human wisdom can protect the greatest judicial abilities) could never be construed into a breach of comity between one judicature and another; but, on the contrary, must be construed by the deceived court as a vindication of its purity, and a rescue from an attempt to load it with discredit.

I must now own, my lords, when I was informed that doctors of the civil law were, by the permission of your lordships, to attend on the part of the lady at the bar, and a brief was given to me on the part of the prosecutor on that account, that I was apprehensive of what might be quoted from such miscellaneous books, as the digests, the code, and the decretals, in favour of collusion, and to shew how honestly it might be practised under particular circumstances. Nothing however of this kind has been urged; and I have not myself, from any inspection of the titles and text of the civil and canon law, de collusione detegenda, which treat principally of collusive causes between masters and slaves, and between certain of the clergy in order to defraud the laity, been able to gather any other idea than that collusion between parties to a suit is a very high offence; and such a one, I make no doubt, for which colluding parties might now be articulated against in the Ecclesiastical Court, where the insult was offered, and be punished at discretion by ecclesiastical censures. But a particular discussion of the nature of the offence committed by parties colluding in a cause, how that collusion is to be treated when discovered, and what operation the discovered collusion will have upon the sentence, is rather to be expected from later writers, and such authors as Menochius in his Consilia, or Seaccia de re judicata, than from the laws in the text of the civil and canon law.

And these authors agree in general in saying, quod lata sententia per collusionem habenda est pro non-sententia, et quod aliis non nocet, quamvis, sublata collusionem, noceret. Nam facta collusionem cum adversario [says Seaccia] sententia non prodest adversus tertium; vel quia tertius erat citandus, et tunc videtur non prodest sententia, etiamsi eam obtinuisse sincere.

And when an executor [for example] desirous of proving his testator's will, omits to cite one among others of the next of kin; for in that case the omitted person may, if he thinks it for his interest, oblige the executors to prove the will de novo at a subsequent time, the sentence establishing the will under the process, by which one of the next of kin was omitted, being as to him in the true sense of the expression, Res inter alios acta.

The same author proceeds by adding,

Vel non erat citandus, quia causa agebatur cum legitimo contradicatore; et tunc licet, si sententia fuisset lata sine collusione, tertio noceret; tamen, si fuerit lata per collusionem, non nocebit.

This may be explained by the following supposed case: If an executor to prove his testator's will should cite all the next of kin regularly, but should collude with that next of kin to whom the management of the suit was intrusted, and prevail on him to feintplead, and not put forth his strength on account of some private bargain, and by this covin establish the will; yet, though the sentence in this case would have bound the legal contradicitors, who had been all called, and also all other persons whatever, if there had been no collusion, it shall nevertheless not bind the injured part of the legal contradicitors, on a proof made of the concerted fraud.

It must be allowed, that these writers have not (as far as I have been able to observe) made mention of the place or court where a sentence collusively obtained is to be set aside; and if an actual setting aside or total reversal is meant, there is no doubt but that this must be done in the same court where the parties colluded, and in no other.

But if it is only asked, where and in what court evidence is to be received to relieve an injured person, who was not a party to the collusion? my answer is, that it is plain from these writers, as well as from reason, that it is to be received in every court.

The courts of civil law, known to these writers, hear in the same court and under the same jurisdiction causes of property, and also accusations which affect the life of the accused, exactly in the same manner as our Admiralty-courts in England did before the 28th of Henry VIII. And therefore when Scaccia and other writers, who entertain the idea of the same court having both civil and criminal jurisdiction, say that a sentence obtained by collusion is to be regarded pro non sententia, their meaning fairly taken must be, that such a sentence would be effectually avoidable, or rather disregarded every where, on a proper proof made of the fraud by which it was obtained.

I am aware that the case of Mayo and Brown was quoted by the advocates on the other side, as a late instance, in which the present judge of the Prerogative Court, Sir George Hay, whose decrees will always have great weight, was of opinion, that he could not in his court receive evidence of a sentence having been obtained by collusion in the court of the bishop of London.

The case, in brief, was as follows:

One Mrs. Ailmer died intestate, and Mr. Brown, as her husband, obtained the administration of her effects. Lady Mayo had proved herself to be the daughter of Mrs. Ailmer, and had cited Brown to bring in the administration, and shew cause why it should not be revoked, as unfairly obtained. Brown proved his marriage to Mrs. Ailmer beyond a doubt; but lady Mayo then alledged, that Brown had been married to one Ellen Cutts, who was living at the time of the fact of the marriage of Brown with Ailmer. Brown answered, that Ellen Cutts did once make pretensions to him; but that in a suit of jactitation, brought by him against her in the court of the bishop of London in 1732, she was enjoined silence by sentence; and he was pronounced free from any matrimonial connexion with her. To this lady Mayo replied by plea, that the sentence had been obtained by collusion between Brown and Cutts, and desired to be suffered to prove her allegation.

Many of the arguments were then used which have been made use of on the present occasion; but the judge did not, as I understand, reject the distinction between receiving evidence in favour of an injured person, and being able to annul the sentence, and absolutely deny his authority to admit lady Mayo's allegation, but only appeared to make choice of the method of stopping the cause in the Prerogative Court till lady Mayo had applied to the bishop of London's court for relief: and in so doing he laid great stress on the note in the margin of Strange's Reports, page 981, where it is said, that the chief justice of the Common-Pleas, in the case of Prudham and Phillips, held a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court to be conclusive, and would not receive evidence of fraud or collusion in obtaining it. But it is evident from the very able manuscript note of the case of Prudham and Phillips by the late Mr. Ford, whose learning and accuracy are too well known to stand in need of any encomium, that the only reason why chief justice Willes refused to suffer Mrs. Phillips to relieve herself by giving a proof of collusion in the bishop of London's court, was, because Mrs. Phillips herself was a party to that suit in the Ecclesiastical Court; so that in truth and fact the decree made in the Prerogative Court in Mayo and Brown, appears to have been founded more on the uncertain authority of the note in the margin of Sir John Strange's Reports, than on any other precedent.

Now if a suggestion of fraud in a single person, or collusion between many, affords a foundation for a court, in which causes of property only are decided, to receive evidence that such fraud or collusion was used in obtaining a sentence in another court which has jurisdiction in cases of property, it becomes necessary, a fortiori, that a court, held for the punishment of criminals, should admit evidence to shew that a fraud or forgery has been committed in a court of civil jurisdiction: and there are strong instances in the law of England to shew, that civil judgments have been regarded not only as of no weight to exculpate in criminal prosecutions, but on the contrary as aggravations.

The case of Farr in Kelyng's Reports is one of many strongly to this purpose.

Richard Farr, having an intention to rob the house of Mrs. Stanier, told an attorney that Mrs. Stanier was his tenant, and he could not make her quit his house: the attorney proceeded regularly in a cause of ejectment; and one Eleanor Chadwick, an accomplice with Farr, having sworn falsely that she had served Stanier with a copy of a declaration, judgment was obtained, a writ issued, the woman was ejected, and her house was robbed by Farr and Chadwick, who had got legal possession. Farr and Chadwick were afterwards indicted at the Old-Bailey; and on proofs given of the facts, it was agreed by lord chief justice Hyde, Sir John Kelyng, and Mr. justice Wild, that though the prisoners made use of the law, and the officers of the law, yet as this was done in fraudem legis, the course they had taken was so far from excusing the robbery, that it heightened the offence by abusing the law. Kelyng's Reports, page 43, 44.

There is a single case on the other side, the King against Vincent, reported in Strange, 481, where it is said, that Vincent was indicted for forging a will of a personal estate, and that the forgery was proved at the trial, but that Vincent having produced the probate, it was held to be conclusive in support of the will.

This opinion is said to have been given in the 8th year of George I. and no subsequent case has been quoted in support of it; but numbers of other cases have been quoted by the counsel against the lady at the bar, where the unfortunate prisoners have been found guilty of forging wills, in part upon the same evidence (namely, the probate) on which the very fortunate Mr. Vincent was acquitted.

Among others cited from the State-Trials and Session-Papers, the case of one Stirling has been mentioned; and a stronger to shew the absurdity of the doctrine held in the King and Vincent could not well be imagined.—One Mrs. Shutter, being known to have money in the funds, Stirling forged a will for her. He gave considerable legacies to several, but to himself he gave 30*l.* only as executor; for it was sufficient for his purpose to get possession, in order to make her whole fortune his own. He obtained a probate from the Prerogative Court, and endeavoured to receive her stock at the South-Sea-House, but was discovered in the attempt, and indicted for the forgery. The probate was produced in court, and according to the doctrine in the King and Vincent, the sight of the probate should have instantly occasioned the acquittal of the prisoner; for though Mrs. Shutter herself was alive, and appeared in the court, yet witnesses must have been necessarily produced to prove her identity; and such evidence, according to the doctrine in the King against Vincent, ought not to have been admitted against the probate, which ought to have been conclusive. The prisoner however was convicted.

But admitting for a moment, that the case of the King and Vincent was legally determined, it does not seem to apply in the present instance, unless it could be shewed, that the prosecutor offered to give evidence of collusion in obtaining it, and was not permitted so to do; for it was said by one of the civilians, that the probate issued in that case by a decree of the Ecclesiastical Court, and not in common form. If it did so issue, it is to be presumed, that such decree was made between parties truly adverse, till the contrary is made to appear; and the contrary was not attempted to be proved. And it must be confessed, if the parties to the suit in the Prerogative Court were truly adverse, that then the fraud either was or might have been in proof before the original proper court: and this might have afforded some colour for saying, the man shall not be put twice upon his trial for the same offence; though such an argument could only have been specious; for when the question in a court of civil jurisdiction is, will or no will, deed or no deed, and a forgery is detected, the person who committed that forgery must be tried for it in another court and by another proceeding, or he will never be punished as the law of England directs.

It may be here proper to observe, that no one case has been mentioned by the gentlemen on the other side, where, in any court of civil or criminal jurisdiction, a proof of collusion in another court had been offered by a proper person, and not received or rejected. The case of Hatfield and Hatfield in the house of lords, in the year 1727, has been answered by all the counsel who have preceded me, by shewing that collusion was not at issue in that case. And in the case of Kenn, 7 Coke, so much insisted on by doctor Wynne, there is no mention nor the least hint given of fraud, covin, or collusion. In that case, Christopher Kenn had issue Martha by Elizabeth Stowell; but he afterwards obtained a sentence in a cause of nullity against Elizabeth Stowell, as having been married to her infra nubiles annos; and the marriage was pronounced void in an ecclesiastical court.

Martha, the daughter of that marriage, in order to make good her title to her father's estate, was afterwards permitted, and probably thro' some mistake or haste in the court of Wards, and without hearing counsel, to give evidence that Kenn and Stowell her father and mother were not infra nubiles annos when they intermarried. But according to lord Coke's Reports, the court of Wards agreed, that as the ecclesiastical judge had decreed the marriage to be void, his judgment should be credited, although the parties were proved to have been of the age of consent, and although the foundation was false on which the sentence had been grounded; inasmuch as the court of Wards would not examine into the cause or reasons of the sentence, whether true or false.

From all which nothing farther is to be collected, than that a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court is to have full credit given to it as long as it subsists unrepealed; and that it is not to be overturned in the same court where it was given, or by any other, on account of error and mistake in law or fact; and this is certain law: but it is to be observed, that the parties divorced had been long dead before the suit was commenced, and that there is not the remotest hint or suggestion through the whole case, that the Ecclesiastical Court had been deceived by any fraud or collusion between the parties litigant.

As to the case of Prudham and Phillips, the counsel for the lady at the bar were certainly led into a mistake by the note which I have already mentioned, inserted in the margin of Strange's Reports, page 961, and were not aware of the note in Mr. Ford's manuscript, which is of undoubted authority, and from which it appears that one Mr. Prudham, as a creditor, brought an action of debt in 1737, against the well-known Mrs. Teresa Constantia Phillips.

Mrs. Phillips gave in evidence her marriage with Mr. Muilman.

Mr. Prudham produced a sentence annulling that marriage, in a cause of nullity, nullity, on account of a prior marriage with one Delafeld; and this Mr. Prudham's counsel relied upon as conclusive evidence of the nullity of the marriage with Muilman;—and so it was agreed, unless the defendant Phillips might be admitted to shew fraud in obtaining the sentence, and so to avoid it, as judgments are daily avoided, by replications of fraud.

Resolved, on great debate, that the ecclesiastical law was part of the law of the land, and that sentences by their judges were in matters of spiritual jurisdiction of equal force with judgments in courts of record and in courts of equity: but that whatever objections would avoid a judgment, the same would be sufficient to overturn a sentence in the Spiritual Court; but none other. That fraud used in obtaining judgments was a deceit on the court, and hurtful to strangers, who, as they could not come in to reverse or set aside the judgment, must of necessity be admitted to aver it was fraudulent.

But that Mrs. Phillips had been a party in the cause in the Ecclesiastical Court, and whether she was imposed upon, or joined in deceiving the Ecclesiastical Court, this is not a time or place for her to redress herself.

Now, although Mrs. Phillips was not in this case allowed to alledge, that the suit in the Ecclesiastical Court annulling her marriage was collusive, yet the reason on which the court refused to allow her so to do, namely, her having been a party to the collusive suit, amounts to a full proof, when joined with the other doctrine laid down by the court and related in the case; that any person not having been a party would at all times be permitted in a court of common law or equity to alledge fraud or collusion to have been practised to his injury in an ecclesiastical court.

On the whole therefore it appears beyond a doubt, from the instances which have been given, that in civil cases a stranger is admitted in one court to alledge and prove in his defence, that a sentence to his prejudice has been pronounced in another court by means of fraud and collusion; and that a prosecutor in a criminal prosecution is constantly permitted to do the same.

Taking it then for granted, that this in general must be conceded, it only remains to inquire, why evidence, if necessary, should not be admitted to destroy the force of the sentence in the present case, in favour of the crown and of the public, who were not parties to the jactitation suit between Mr. Hervey and the lady at the bar, and yet are interested, if it is a crime to marry a second husband whilst the first is living; or, in other terms, to inquire why a sentence of jactitation of all sentences should be so highly distinguished on account of its worth and stability, as to be held forth as an exception to the general rule, and as the only species of sentence which ought to be so favoured and honoured by being regarded as conclusive.

That the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court are often rather of longer duration than could be wished, is not to be denied; and that this principally arises from the number of possible appeals under particular circumstances from the first hearing of a cause to what in general cases may be termed the last, is equally true.

When a sentence [for example] given in a cause of jactitation, in which marriage was at issue, has passed through all the stages of appeal, the cause is still liable to be opened de novo in favour of matrimony, as if nothing had been done. Was this possible prolixity of proceeding, and were these opportunities of appealing, an impediment and safeguard against collusion (as one of the doctors has gravely alledged them to be) I do not deny that a cause of jactitation must of all causes stand fairest to be the most immaculate and most free from the stain of fraud. But, when it answers the purpose of parties to collude, is it to be presumed that those, who could begin a cause collusively, would scruple to carry it on from one court to another, till they came to the end of their journey, if it was necessary so to do to obtain their end? The truth however is, that several appeals are not absolutely necessary; and that, when there is collusion in a cause, there is either no appeal, or an ostensible one only, which is always subducted within a convenient time; and the gentlemen best know, whether an appeal from the sentence relied on in the present case was subducted or not. A sentence in jactitation pronounced in disfavour of matrimony is defined to be transitory, and not final; and this definition seems to be founded, as absurdities sometimes are, on a tenet of religion.—The religion I mean is that, which after having been received in this kingdom for a long series of years, was afterwards and now is with reason protested against. In this religion it is maintained, among other condemned doctrines, that marriage is a sacrament, and not to be dissolved: and although it nearly amounts to a certainty, that the rites of matrimony are not now quite so strictly regarded in England as they have been heretofore, and that his majesty's subjects of almost every description, from the lowest to the highest, have shewed an utter abhorrence of this doctrine of the church of Rome; yet it is not to be wondered at, that the ancient canonists, who were to a man of the religion I have just mentioned, and had the framing of the code ecclesiastical, should so fabricate or bend the law, as to render it the support of marriage by every possible method, and should lay it down as a maxim, that a sentence in a marriage cause should never, in their language, pass into rem judicatum, or become a final judgment, but be eternally open and liable to revision and reversal, notwithstanding it may have been established by appeal upon appeal, and even by the judges of the common law in a court of Delegates under the king's special commission, and afterwards by the lord-chancellor, who may have refused a commission of review. Clarke's Praxis, tit. 205.

To render the privilege of a jactitation cause, in which the proof of marriage has been attempted but not perfected, still more extensive, the general safeguard against perjury has been entirely taken away in this species of suit; for the publication of the depositions is no obstacle to fresh examinations, and new witnesses may continually be admitted in favour of matrimony, even after the former depositions have been inspected, and without any proof made that such witnesses are lately come to the knowledge of the producer, which is a proof expected and required in all other causes whatever, and a rule never departed from.

Clarke, in his book of Practice, is express to this purpose, and uses the following words: licet generaliter non admittuntur testes post publicationem, admittuntur tamen in causa matrimoniali sine juramento, quod testes noviter ad notitiam pervenerunt. Tit. 205. It is allowed too in this species of cause, that not only the party silenced, but that any other person, interested to establish the matrimony, may take up the cause in the state in which it was left in the same court, and proceed, as I apprehend, in another court, and invoke or illate the proceedings.

The pars citata, or defendant, is also at liberty to go into another court in a new matrimonial cause; as for example, in a cause of restitution of conjugal rights: licet parti citata aut in eodem judicio, aut coram alio iudice (non obstante quod citatio emanavit in causa jactitationis) contra actorem institueret causam matrimonialem. See Clarke's Praxis, tit. 195, 205.

This ambulatory, indeterminate, state of a sentence in jactitation must certainly, in the apprehension of any man not a lawyer, be a very improper circumstance to be urged in order to render this species of sentence given in one cause an absolute bar to proceeding to judgment in another cause of a civil nature, and more particularly to make it a bar in a cause of a criminal nature in another kind of jurisdiction. Taking things therefore as they are, and having proved the law respecting this extraordinary species of sentence from the books of practice which describe it, can any good reason be assigned why such a sentence should be conclusive in the present case, and should not be revised and revoked, if occasion should require it, in the high court before which we now are?

This sentence never passes into a rem judicatum, or final judgment—it is subject to be revised in any other court having jurisdiction than that in which it was first given. The act of James I. by which the marrying of a second husband or second wife, whilst the first is living, is made felony, has, by creating the felony, plainly transferred that branch of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which before punished polygamy, to those courts where criminals are tried; and to remove even the appearance of any difficulty which might have arisen on the right of the prosecutor to offer the sentence, the counsel for the lady have themselves desired leave on her part to bring it before the court, and have actually introduced it:—can it therefore be possible that this high court should not think themselves authorized by a complete jurisdiction in every respect, spiritual as well as temporal, to give the prosecutor, on the part of the crown and of the public, the liberty, under all the circumstances of this case, of offering a proof of the nullity of the sentence, by pointing out from the proceedings themselves, if necessity should require it, the marks of fraud with which they abound; or, what is rather to be expected, to give the prosecutor the liberty of adducing evidence in a more direct manner, both oral and instrumental, to prove the marriage of the lady at the bar with Mr. Hervey, the present earl of Brissol; by which the collusive proceedings before the Ecclesiastical Court, and the truth of the principal accusation, will at one and the same time be plainly demonstrated?

Lord President of the Council. My lords, I move your lordships to adjourn to the chamber of parliament.

Lords. Ay, ay. Lord High Steward. This house is adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

The lords and others returned to the chamber of parliament in the same order they came down; and the house, being thus resumed, resolved to proceed further in the trial of Elizabeth duchess-dowager of Kingston, in Westminster Hall, on Friday next, at ten o'clock in the morning.

Friday, April 19. The third day.

THE lords and others came from the chamber of parliament in the same order as on Tuesday; and the peers being seated, and the lord high steward in his chair,

Lord High Steward. My lords, the house is resumed. Is it your lordships pleasure the judges may be covered?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Then the serjeant at arms made proclamation for silence; and the duchess of Kingston was conducted to the bar.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Wallace, you may proceed with your reply.

Mr. Wallace.

My lords, I must bespeak your lordships indulgence to examine and discuss the great variety of arguments and considerations, which the counsel on the part of the prosecution have thought proper to enter into, and submit to your lordships. I ought in the first place to take some notice of the charge of novelty imputed to myself, and those who assist me, in the attempt to introduce the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court, before the cause has been opened, or the evidence on the part of the prosecution stated to your lordships.

It might perhaps be thought a sufficient answer to observe, that no indictment ever yet has been preferred on this statute, where the Ecclesiastical Court had given a sentence upon the subject. The prosecutor of this indictment has had the boldness to set at defiance the proceedings ceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court; and, in direct opposition to a sentence pronounced there, to prefer in a court of criminal jurisdiction a charge of felony; for although criminal prosecutions are and must be in the name of the crown, yet in most cases they are carried on by private individuals; and your lordships particularly know, in the present case, there is a private prosecutor, and one who might have applied on the score of interest to the Ecclesiastical Court, to have had that sentence re-examined.

With respect to the novelty of the proceedings, the counsel for the noble lady at the bar would have found themselves standing much in need of your lordships' pardon, if they had not interposed the sentence at the time it was offered. If they had permitted a cause of this kind to have proceeded into evidence (which, from the accounts we have heard, is to be laid before the court by a number of witnesses, and of course must have taken up your lordships many days in the examination), and after all, the sentence had been produced and attended with the effect which we hope it will have, what would have been the situation of counsel, who had suffered so much of your lordships' time to have been mis-spent in the examination of parole evidence to facts which could not be admitted against the decision offered to your lordships?

But in truth it is not new in practice: the case alluded to is not only, as it has been termed, a colour, but a justification for what has been done. It is true, it was an ejectment, which the gentlemen have properly called a fictitious proceeding. It was for that reason the sentence was not interposed, till the evidence was opened; for till then the defendant is ignorant in what manner the plaintiff intends to make out his claim: but as soon as it was stated, that he derived through a marriage, which had been examined and decided in the Ecclesiastical Court, the counsel immediately, without suffering evidence to be given, interposed the sentence. In this case there is no occasion to wait for the opening of counsel; for upon the face of the indictment the supposed marriage with Mr. Hervey is stated as the ground of the offence: the crime in the indictment charged is a marriage with his grace the duke of Kingston, during the life of Mr. Hervey, to whom the noble prisoner at the bar is alleged to have been before married; and consequently upon the validity of that marriage the question depends. The marriage with the duke of Kingston was notorious in the face of the church, under the sanction of a licence from the archbishop of Canterbury, and in the presence of many witnesses. The supposed marriage with Mr. Hervey was the sole question in the Ecclesiastical Court: that court has decided against it; and as long as that sentence remains in force, the relation of the parties as husband and wife is at least suspended, if not absolutely gone.

The practice every day, where one is in possession under a fine, and no claim has been made for five years, is to interpose it immediately. I ventured to do it not long ago in the court of King's Bench at a trial at bar, where the claimant came out of Wales with as long a pedigree as that country could furnish. When I heard it stated, and understanding that a great number of witnesses must be called to support it, I offered the fine to the court, before a witness was called; which instantly put an end to the cause. I did not by that incur any censure from the court, or blame from the counsel. I thought myself called upon in duty to inform the court of it; and a cause, which would have lasted three or four days, was ended in less than ten minutes.

I trust, a conduct designed to prevent your time being mis-spent upon a fruitless enquiry, (for whatever should be the result, yet this sentence, if it has the effect we contend for, must render it totally nugatory and immaterial) will not be the subject of your lordships' animadversion.

Enough, I hope, has been said in defence of the attempt against the charge of novelty; but an observation was made, to create a prejudice against the case of the noble lady at the bar, from the conduct of her counsel in this stage of the proceedings to prevent an examination of witnesses, as a proof of their opinion upon the merits of the cause. God forbid that any impression should be made against the noble prisoner at the bar from the conduct of her counsel! Your lordships know, that in the forms of proceeding she must throw herself upon her counsel, and submit to their management; and no mistake of theirs will, I trust, ever turn to her prejudice. I feel an happiness in speaking to a court incapable of receiving impressions from an insinuation of that kind.

An observation was made upon the form of the sentence, which seemed to strike many of your lordships, that as far as it appeared to the Ecclesiastical Court, the parties were free from all matrimonial contracts and espousals; not positively that they were so; and therefore as far as the evidence went in that court, and no farther, ought the sentence to be regarded. Your lordships have heard from those that practise in the courts of ecclesiastical law, from the counsel on both sides of that description, that it is the constant uniform method of drawing up sentences in causes of this kind; that it is a sentence of validity; that it is considered by them as such; but that it is open to further proceedings in that court; that it falls within the maxim which was cited to your lordships upon the other side, which is not denied here, but admitted, nay mentioned in the very opening of this business, that sententia contra matrimonium nunquam transit in rem judicatum; this sentence, being against a marriage, never passes into a definitive judgment of that court: but does it follow, because it is open to further examination, because other suits may be instituted which may contradict this sentence, that whilst it remains unimpeached, till other suits are instituted, and till a different judgment is given, that the sentence has no effect; that it is the words of the judge, without having any sort of consequence attending of them?

My lords, it is too ridiculous to suppose a suit instituted in the Ecclesiastical Court, where the prosecutor of the suit (or the promoter, in the language of that court) has obtained the sentence of the court in his favour; that it means nothing at all; that it is mere waste paper; that he might as well never have commenced the suit. Is it possible, in a country where the least idea of justice prevails, that this should be the case? On the contrary, the sentence of every court of competent jurisdiction has been considered in the same, and every other court where it has become the subject of debate, till impeached, set aside, reversed, or repealed by the court that gave the sentence, or by the authority of a court of appellate jurisdiction, to be conclusive.

Your lordships have heard from the doctors of the civil law the effect of a sentence in a suit of jactitation of marriage. I took the liberty of stating to your lordships many cases referring, where the same doctrine had been adopted by the judges of the common law, and constantly acted upon without an exception. The proceeding is not, as has been contended, in the nature of an action for words or of slander; it has ever been instituted upon some serious claim of marriage, which calls upon the party for an explanation.

Would it be no objection with a lady to a gentleman paying his addresses to her, that somebody claimed a marriage with him? I believe, my lords, it would at least create a pause in the treaty, if it did not absolutely put an end to it. He certainly would be called upon by the lady or her friends to satisfy them, that there did not exist a ground for such report. There is no legal course to be taken, but by commencing a suit of jactitation in the Ecclesiastical Court. The proceeding calls in form upon the party who has made the claim to justify it. If a marriage be insisted on, the parties instantly change situations; the defendant becomes the plaintiff or actor, and the original plaintiff becomes the defendant, and is called upon to answer that claim made in the Ecclesiastical Court of marriage, not only to answer it in form, but upon oath: the original plaintiff is obliged on oath to declare, whether the allegations of the party respecting the marriage are true or false. The proofs are first made by the party insisting upon the marriage; and the judge gives sentence upon them. The suit in truth becomes, and is admitted by the learned doctor on the other side to be, to all intents and purposes, a matrimonial cause; and the judgment is upon the validity and lawfulness of the marriage. In that light the proceeding in the ecclesiastical courts has ever been received and treated.

But suppose the sentence has been received and considered as conclusive evidence, it is contended by the counsel for the prosecution to be only in particular cases, namely, where the person against whom the sentence has been given, or one deriving under such person, has been a party in the suit, in which the sentence has been offered in evidence; which is not the present case, as the crown was no party to the suit in the Ecclesiastical Court.

The distinction may be thought ingenious and plausible, but there is no foundation in law to support it. In the great number of authorities cited to your lordships, there is not the least hint of such a distinction: the rule is laid down in the most general terms, and without an exception, in the case of Hatfield and Hatfield before the house of lords. The person against whom the sentence was given in evidence, was not a party, nor claimed under any party, to the suit in the Ecclesiastical Court.

No notice was taken of another case which I mentioned to your lordships, where the person against whom the sentence was given in evidence was no party to the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court. It was an action against Mr. Thomas Hervey for a debt contracted by his wife. Mr. Hervey had a judgment in that suit against him: but in a subsequent suit, after a proceeding had in the Ecclesiastical Court, in which it was declared that Mr. Hervey, as far as appeared to the court, was free from all matrimonial contracts (just as it is in the present case) the sentence was received as conclusive evidence upon the fact of the marriage, and defeated the plaintiff.

I am not contending that such sentences are to be used as instruments of fraud upon creditors. No; if there is no real marriage, but a man holds out to the world a woman for his wife, and she gets a credit upon that score, he shall never be permitted to say they are not married: yet where the persons live separate, where no act of his gives a countenance to the demand, there a creditor trusts the wife upon the ground of a legal marriage; there the Ecclesiastical Court deciding upon the marriage is conclusive evidence. That case was acquiesced in; no application was made to the court; and I believe all that heard it approved of the decision.

A learned friend of mine on the other side, after he had as I thought closed his argument and sat down, rose again to mention a case to your lordships of Crutchley and Robins.

It must have struck him that it would appear a little extraordinary, after so full a discussion, no case had been cited to your lordships to warrant or give a colour to the distinction attempted.

That case, when stated, and the reasons given by the court which pronounced the judgment considered, will appear not to have the least application to the present. It was a claim of dower by Mrs. Robins upon the estate of Mr. Robins deceased, in Staffordshire. The defendant in that case, the heir of Mr. Robins, pleaded to that claim, that she never was lawfully married to Mr. Robins. The only legal mode of trying that fact is by a certificate from the bishop of the diocese: the pleading between the parties is brought to an issue; it is the office of the court to direct a writ to the bishop to certify whether there was a marriage or not; and upon the certificate the judgment is given. Instead of suffering the court to issue a writ to the bishop, Mrs. Robins replied to that plea a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court, in a suit wherein she was by the judgment of that court pronounced the wife of Mr. Robins; the defendant put in a demurrer, insisting the replication was not admissible; and that was the question before the court of Common-Pleas.

Did the court of Common-Pleas decide, that such a sentence is not evidence? No; the court of Common-Pleas determined, that by law they could receive no other evidence of the fact than the bishop's certificate; it was the sole proof which the law in that particular case has required for the decision of the cause, and they could not depart from it. But they went farther in that cause: they told Mrs. Robins that the sentence, though it could not be received there, might be laid before the bishop, who was to certify certify to them the marriage. That is the language of the court of Common-Pleas upon the case: the bishop must certify the marriage; the sentence must be laid before him, and not before this court. Did the court of Common-Pleas decide, as contended, that it was no evidence? No such thing is to be found in the case. All the court did, or meant to do, was to inform the plaintiff that she had mistaken the time and place to make use of that evidence; that the law had in that case appointed a certain specific proof to be given to the court, and they could receive no other: the bishop, who was to examine into the matter, might or might not be concluded by the sentence; the court must be determined by his certificate.

My lords, if the bishop had rejected the sentence, he would have done what no bishop ever did before; yet the court must be concluded by his certificate; they could not examine into the proofs: nay, if the bishop by fraud had certified a marriage, the court would have been concluded. So much for that case which has been cited; and which is the only case the industry of the gentlemen on the other side could produce upon this part of the argument.

Your lordships have been told that, by the general rules of evidence in civil cases, no sentence or judgment can be received, unless in a cause between the same parties, or who derive under them. The candour of the gentlemen on the other side has admitted two exceptions to the rule: first, sentences or judgments where the proceeding is in rem; and secondly, in causes where the court has exclusive jurisdiction.

I will not state to your lordships other exceptions to the rule; the two admitted are sufficient; the present case falls within both exceptions, though either would be enough.

In the first place, it is a proceeding in rem: marriage or no marriage is the point to be determined. It does not come collaterally or incidentally, but directly, in question; and the decision of which was the sole object of the suit.

In the next place, it is a sentence of a court having exclusive jurisdiction upon the subject. It is admitted that the Ecclesiastical Courts have exclusive jurisdictions in probates of wills, in all testamentary disputes respecting personal estates; and having decided the question, whether right or wrong, upon true or upon false grounds, it is not competent to any other court, unless in a legal way by appeal, to enter into the matter; but faith and credit is to be given to the decision of the Ecclesiastical Court. It is also admitted, that, till the statute upon which the present indictment is founded, the ecclesiastical courts had the sole and exclusive jurisdiction in matrimonial causes.

But it is contended, that a concurrent jurisdiction is given by this act to the king's temporal courts: where is the ground of this notion to be found? Was it the intention of the legislature to give to the temporal courts a concurrent jurisdiction with the ecclesiastical? The intention must be collected from the act itself. In my own apprehension, nothing is more clear than that the legislature, at the time of passing this act, meant to guard and secure the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts against innovation from the temporal.

The act is general; that whoever shall marry a second husband or wife, living the former, shall be deemed a felon, and suffer the pains of death. Yet that general enacting clause is restrained by a proviso, which demonstrates the intention of the legislature, that the proceedings in ecclesiastical courts should remain untouched, and the temporal courts have no jurisdiction in the case. The exception runs thus:—Nothing herein contained shall extend to any person or persons, that shall at any time of such marriage be divorced by any sentence had or shall be hereafter had in ecclesiastical courts; nor to any person or persons—

These provisions shew an anxiety in the legislature to preserve the privilege of the Ecclesiastical Court, and save their judgments from an examination; and so far from giving a jurisdiction to the temporal courts in such cases, the act expressly declares, that where the ecclesiastical courts have given a decision, the temporal courts must stop. The case is not within the law; it is not permitted to be examined into.—It is pretty extraordinary that history gives no account of this act, or the immediate occasion for passing it. The preamble states, 'that evil-disposed persons, being married, run out of one county into another, to places where they are not known, and marry there.' If this was the evil meant to be redressed, the case of a person of rank, obtaining a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court, and acting under the faith of it, can never fall within the description in the act.

The journals of neither house furnish any lights upon this subject. The act was brought into the house of commons in April, received some amendments in a committee there, and sent to the house of lords: it there also received amendments, and was returned to the house of commons again in June: but what the amendments were, or whether the provisos were inserted by the guardians of the rights of the church, as is most probable, or came from the house of commons, cannot be discovered. Suppose a sentence of divorce pronounced in the Ecclesiastical Court; would it be permitted to any court, under pretence of fraud, to examine for the purpose of making the parties criminals, when the act has declared such a sentence shall not be meddled with; and the parties under such sentences are excepted in terms out of the act?

Where a sentence of nullity of marriage is given, it is equally open to future examination in the ecclesiastical courts with a sentence of jactitation. If this be doubted, your lordships, from the abilities and integrity of the gentlemen who assist us, though counsel in the cause, will receive satisfactory information.

A sentence of nullity of marriage is excepted by the words of the act: and would it not seem extremely inconsistent and harsh; that, where a marriage is doubtful, and the ecclesiastical courts have declared it null, neither party can by a subsequent marriage be in the predicament of a felon; and yet a person, who is by the sentence of that court declared never to have been married at all, and to be free from all matrimonial espousals, is to be a felon? Such a construction on a penal law would be monstrous.

The intention of the legislature is to me as clear as language can make it, that matrimonial causes should be still within the sole jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, and that the temporal courts should have no authority to examine into their decisions, by declaring, that whereforever these sentences obtain, the party marrying whilst they are in force, shall not be a felon; and yet the former marriage, if it were a legal one, is not done away: it is capable of being revived, and a second marriage would be null and void. And upon another proceeding, if the sentence should be in favour of the marriage, either party may commence a suit for restitution of conjugal rights; the first marriage would be established, and a second marriage, pending the sentence, void; yet the party would not be in the predicament of a felon. This is clear from the act of parliament; and in this sense your lordships will give me leave to use it, as shewing beyond a possibility of doubt the intention of the legislature. Where then are the arguments we have heard, that the legislature meant in this case to give the common-law courts such concurrent jurisdiction, as to disregard the sentences of the ecclesiastical courts? Has the legislature said so? Has not the legislature said the contrary in express terms? Wherever a sentence is pronounced, that person is not to be tried in the temporal courts. Is it competent to any temporal court? Is it competent to your lordships, the supreme temporal court in the kingdom? Awful and great as this court is, give me leave to say, that the rules of construction are the same as in the most inferior court of criminal jurisdiction. There is not one law for peers, and another for commons, in this country: the law is the same for both; it only varies in the circumstances of the trial: the evidence to prove the guilt or innocence of the party is the same in all.

There is no doubt, but the temporal courts may try marriages upon this act, where no sentence has been given in the Ecclesiastical Court; as they do every day upon titles to lands on ejectments: but where a sentence has been obtained against, or in favour of, a marriage in the Ecclesiastical Court, the temporal courts are concluded by it.

The concurrent jurisdiction which they contend for, if I understand them right, is this: The ecclesiastical courts, say they, it is true, have a right to try a marriage; but the temporal courts have also a right to try a marriage under this act of parliament. The sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court will not satisfy them; they will have the evidence; and if they are satisfied with the evidence that the ecclesiastical courts have thought insufficient, they will pronounce the crime, and punish the offender. Can there be any such position warranted by the act of parliament?

If the legislature could have foreseen, that in any period it should enter into the head of any man to set at nothing the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, they could not in more positive terms have guarded against it.

If the gentlemen should be able to establish a concurrent jurisdiction in the ecclesiastical and temporal courts, they then beg leave to advance a step further, and lay down a rule, which they hope your lordships will adopt to intitle them to enter into evidence, that judgments only bind in courts of concurrent jurisdiction, where they are just.

I deny the rule in the extent it has been laid down. Have not the courts of King's Bench, Common-Pleas, and Exchequer, a concurrent jurisdiction in civil causes? and was it ever heard, when a judgment of one of the courts is pleaded in another, that the propriety and rectitude of the judgment can be examined into? Certainly not: the party is permitted only to deny the existence of the judgment. The case of Sinclair and Frazier, lately determined by your lordships upon an appeal from Scotland, was cited as an authority for this purpose; in which your lordships ruled, that a judgment in the court of Jamaica should not be enforced, unless it was just; that is, if the defendant in the cause could shew it was unjust, no court ought to lend its aid to carry it into execution.—My lords, nothing is more right or just; but does it apply to the case before your lordships?

Wherever the aid of a superior court is wanted to give effect to a judgment of an inferior court, or of a court which cannot carry into execution its own judgments, from the parties being locally out of its jurisdiction, that court whose aid is prayed ought not to give it, if the defendant can shew the judgment to be unjust:—they will give so much credit to the sentence of every court as to presume it right, unless the defendant can shew the contrary. Not long ago, an application was made to the court of King's Bench to enforce the judgment of the justices at the quarter-sessions in Lancashire. An act of parliament passed for the inclosure of a common. By that act, as the public roads are directed to be sixty feet wide, the common was small, situate in a very remote part of the country, where very few people came but those interested in the lands, and they thought that roads of less breadth would very well suffice for the occasions of the country; the commissioners under that act of parliament assigned, in the name of private roads, what in truth had before been public, and allotted half the dimensions required by the act. There was an application to the sessions, who had jurisdiction, by appeal; and they ordered the roads to be opened to the extent the act directed: but when they had done that, they were left without the power of enforcing their order: they could not compel a specific execution of it. If they had proceeded for a contempt against the commissioners by indictment, that would have been tedious and uncertain: the proper method was by an application to the supreme criminal court of the kingdom, in which the superintendence of all inferior jurisdictions is lodged. A mandamus was moved for in the King's Bench, to enforce the judgment of the sessions. The court of King's Bench told those who opposed the application, We think ourselves bound to enforce it, unless you can shew it to be unjust: convince the court that the sessions have done wrong, and we will not lend our aid. And on that occasion a case was cited by the learned lord at the head of the court, which happened in the time of lord Hardwicke. Upon a decree of the court of Grand Sessions of Wales, where a party had removed out of the jurisdiction of that court, a bill was filed in the court of Chancery to enforce the decree of the Grand Sessions; the defendant by his answer insisted, that the decree was unjust, and ought not to be carried into execution: lord Hardwicke was of opinion, that if the defendant could satisfy him that the decree was unjust, he would not lend his aid to enforce it.

Do we apply to your lordships for the aid of the court to carry the present sentence into execution? No; we ask no favour; we demand nothing but your justice: we produce the sentence: we do not ask for your assistance to carry it into execution; it comes in collaterally; and in such cases, whether in the courts of law or in the courts of equity, the sentences of the Ecclesiastical Court have been constantly attended to and been received as conclusive evidence.

But, my lords, though sentences of the ecclesiastical courts have been ever received as conclusive evidence in civil causes, yet it is contended, they are not admissible in criminal prosecutions. Is it the genius of this country to attend more to the punishment of crimes, than to the administration of justice between the parties in civil rights? Is the distinction founded in good sense or sound policy, that the sentences of ecclesiastical courts should not only be received, but be conclusive, in one case, and be no evidence at all in the other? Your lordships will expect very strong authorities before you listen to such a distinction.

Suppose in a criminal prosecution the property of goods should come in question, and a sentence of condemnation in the court of Exchequer was produced, is there a doubt of its being received? Where the proceeding is in rem, the sentence must of necessity be admissible and conclusive in all courts, between all parties, and on all occasions, and to all intents and purposes. Without it there would be contrariety of determinations upon the same question; which would be a reproach to the justice of the country.

I troubled your lordships with a case from Mr. John Strange's Reports to prove, that the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court was admissible and conclusive in criminal cases: that doctrine is abundantly confirmed by a case in the King's Bench four years after; the King and Rhodes. What is the answer given to the case? The Reporter was a young man, and therefore he is not to be credited; or, his notes of cases after his death came into the hands of his executors, who knew nothing of law, who publish every scrap of paper they can find, and give them to the world—to make a volume: so the authority is got rid of by an objection to the youth of the Reporter, and the manner of the publication.

If your lordships were inclined to listen to objections of this kind, it would be a curious enquiry, at what period of a lawyer's life he can take a note fit to be reported. I confess, I am totally unacquainted with it. Should it be when he is at the bar, a young man, and attending to every thing that passes? Should it be, when he is advanced in business? and when the business he is concerned in engrosses his time? If the case had happened later, your lordships would have been told, Mr. John was then a man of business; he did not trouble himself about taking notes; they are very inaccurate. If it had been the note of a judge taken upon the bench, I do not know but it might be said of him, what was said of another judge,—judges are apt to sleep upon the bench.

I had the curiosity to enquire into the circumstances of the Report. The case happened when Mr. John Strange was about twenty-four or twenty-five years of age; he had been at the bar four years. A note so taken, and preserved to the time of his death, ought not to be slightly treated. The observation of the case being published by his executors would have been spared, had the gentlemen gone to the first page of Mr. John Strange's book; for they would have found by a preface written by Mr. John Strange himself, when between fifty and sixty, that he had collected these cases, and meant the publick should have the use of them; that he had been at the pains of selecting those that he thought fit for publication, and of putting them into order. It appears he had given some of his notes to a gentleman, whose servant had clandestinely copied and sold them to booksellers; and lest the cases so surreptitiously obtained should be imperfectly given to the publick under the sanction of his name, he was at the expence of having his notes transcribed under his own eye: and he says, 'if they should not be published in my life-time, they will come perfect into the hands of my executors; and of course to the publick.' He practised in the first criminal court of this country with the greatest honour and ability; he had never heard in his time that the case had been over-ruled or impeached: if he had, his integrity was such, that the case never would have appeared in his book; or if he had inserted it, it would have been accompanied with a note, that damned it, or threw a doubt on its authority.

There was another objection to this case: that it must have been determined in the time of the dullest alderman that ever sat in that court. Who, my lords, determine cases of this kind at the Old-Bailey? Not the aldermen: they attend indeed; they are fine pictures, handsome furniture; they grace and adorn the court; very respectable, of considerable trade; but they do not deal in law. If they ever study law, it is to avoid it; in which they are not always successful. The judges of the common law, of the superior courts of Westminster-Hall, decide the questions which arise in trials there.

Your lordships have been also told, that the authority of this case, if ever it had any, was soon put an end to in the year 1753, in the case of the King and Murphy; where the probate of the Ecclesiastical Court was set at nought; it was nothing more than paper and wax, without any effect. The case of the King and Murphy was thrown in by name. A case, the King and such a one, shews it to have been a criminal cause; but it must be from a state of the facts that your lordships must discover the application.

I will let your lordships know the state of that case. It was an indictment for forging the will of one Wilkinson. Your lordships have many of you heard of the great successes of some privateers fitted out in the year 1746-7, called the royal-family privateers: they were very successful; and they got very soon into many disputes in the court of Chancery and courts of law. Their wages and prize-money were considerable. Wicked men were tempted to endeavour to possess it. A sailor in a remote part of the world is a being not likely to give himself much trouble about money. Murphy, who was prosecuted at the Old-Bailey, knowing Wilkinson's title to the prize-money, had forged a will of Wilkinson, had got that will proved, and had received from one Noades, the agent, part of the prize-money of Wilkinson. All went off very well. Murphy spent the money. But in a few months after, Mr. Wilkinson was restored to life. He appeared before the agent, and demanded his money. Says the agent, We have paid your executor. Says he, That is pretty odd! I will satisfy you I have not been dead; and nobody can prove my will till I am dead: I insist upon my money. The fraud was detected; Murphy was apprehended, prosecuted, and convicted.

Would the gentlemen have had him set up the probate of the will at the Old-Bailey? Would they have told Wilkinson to go to the Ecclesiastical Court to repeal it? What would Wilkinson, ignorant as he was, say? I have heard of probates of wills of dead men, but never heard of probates of wills of living men before: the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court is to grant probates of the wills of the dead, not of the living; and therefore the question could not arise.

Another case of one Stirling was mentioned. Stirling found out that a Mrs. Shutter had property in the South-Sea stock, and his scheme to possess it was like Murphy's: he forged a will, got it proved, went to the South-Sea-House; there he exhibited the probate; they gave credit to the death of the party, and to his being the executor, and they paid the money. The woman, who had nothing else to live upon, came to receive her dividend. The clerk says, Your executor has proved your will; you must be the ghost of Mrs. Shutter, not Mrs. Shutter herself. She was not to be put off in that way. The Company found out Stirling, and brought him to justice. He did not say to the court on his trial, Do not believe her; no law says you must take the evidence of a ghost: she must go into Doxors Commons and rescind this, before you believe her evidence. No court would bear such an insult. The jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court does not attach, till the party is dead: there is no such thing as a will for the Prerogative Court to give effect to, whilst the testator is living. It was said, the crime consists in obtaining the probate. The will has no legal effect without it. It is not necessary, to constitute the crime of forgery, that the will should be proved. If the will is exhibited as a genuine will, and the officers of the court (what has happened in many instances) suspect a forgery, they stop the probate; and many have suffered without a probate being granted, the offer to prove the will being a publication of the forgery.

Two other cases, the King and Fitzgerald, and the King and Carr and Richardson, were also mentioned to your lordships. In neither of these cases was any probate produced or insisted upon by the prisoner. One of the gentlemen, who cited the cases, suggested that answer to them, which was too obvious to be overlooked.

I trust your lordships are satisfied, there is no ground in reason or authority for the distinction attempted between civil and criminal causes in the admissibility and effect of the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court.

I am now, my lords, arrived at that point to which the whole artillery seems to be directed; that the sentence was obtained by collusion. —Your lordships have been told, that a judgment by collusion is fabula, non judicium; wax, paper, ink, any thing that you will, but not a judgment: the judge does not act, the judge is imposed upon; it is of no effect whatever; in no court, in no light, upon no occasion, can the most ingenious imagination suggest a case, in which collusion does not affect the transaction; and being once proved, destroys it from the beginning, and as much annihilates it, as if it had never existed. This your lordships have been told is the clear settled law of every court.

I must beg leave to deny the doctrine in the extent it is contended for, and to insist before your lordships, the collusion cannot be averred against this sentence, either upon the principles of the common law, or the provisions of any statute. By the common law of this country, proof of collusion in some instances was permitted to rescind transactions: the simplicity of the common law, calculated for more honest times, was not equal to all the arts of injustice which ingenious wickedness hath produced.

By the principles of the common law, the person permitted to rescind a transaction, on the score of fraud or collusion, must have an interest vested at the time. This is expressly laid down by the court in Twyne's case, reported by lord chief justice Coke. Where goods are unjustly taken, and sold in a market overt by fraud, to change the property, the true owner may retake them. So where a creditor prosecutes his debtor to judgment, and the debtor sells his goods to a person knowing of the judgment, with a view to defeat the execution, the goods may notwithstanding be taken by the creditor. In both cases an interest was vested at the time of the fraud.

Many statutes have been made to suppress fraud; in Henry the IVth's time, in the different reigns of the Edwards, and last of all in the time of queen Elizabeth; the main object of which was to enable persons who became interested subsequent to transactions founded in collusion and fraud, to impeach and rescind them.

It has not indeed been expressly insisted, that by the common law, independent of statuteable provisions, all fraudulent judgments were void, and that it was competent to any person to defeat them: the authorities I have cited, and legislative declarations upon the subject, prove the contrary. The statute of 9th Henry VIth, c. 11. has already been mentioned: from thence it is clear, the certificate of the bishop, however collusively or fraudulently obtained, was conclusive between the parties. And in the case of bastardy, a provision is made against such certificates in future: but in other cases, as in marriage, to this day, and also before the Reformation, upon the parties being of a religious order, the certificate was conclusive, notwithstanding any fraud or collusion. —Collusive judgments upon penal statutes to protect offenders frequently occur in practice; and when they are insisted on, the plaintiff has a right to aver such judgments to have been obtained by fraud and collusion. This does not arise from the provision of the common law, but from an act of parliament made in the 4th H. VII. c. 20. The whole statute is material to be attended to. The title of the act is, 'actions popular prosecuted by collusion shall be no bar to those which be pursued with good faith.' It recites, that if an action popular be commenced against againſt an offender by good faith, then the ſame offender will delay the action either by non-appearance or by traverse; and hanging the ſame action, the ſame offender will cauſe like action popular to be brought againſt him by covin for the ſame cauſe and offence that the firſt action was ſued: and then by covin of the plaintiff in that ſecond action, he will be condemned either by confeſſion, feigned trial, or releaſe; which condemnation and releaſe ſo had by colluſion and covin pleaded by the ſaid offender, ſhall bar the plaintiff in the action ſued in good faith: it is therefore enacted, that in future the plaintiff ſuing in good faith may aver the former recovery to have been by covin and colluſion; but no ſuch averment is to be received after a trial on the point of the action, or on the covin or colluſion.

Here your lordſhips find the origin of averments, that judgments on penal ſtatutes were obtained by colluſion. This act affirms the principle of the common law, that none but perſons intereſted were intitled to reſcind judgments on the ground of colluſion. A penalty given to a common informer is not veſted in any individual, till he commences the action; and confequently he could not aver colluſion in a former judgment: ſuch judgment was not then fabula, or waſte parchment, but of ſuch effect and concluſion as called for an act of parliament to remedy the miſchief.

There can be no greater authority to prove the common law of the land, than a parliamentary declaration upon the ſubject: this act furniſhes a moſt explicit and ſatisfactory one. Your lordſhips will not ſuppoſe an act was made to remedy a miſchief, or ſupply a defect, which did not exiſt. If your lordſhips refer to the acts of thoſe days, you will find them drawn with great preciſion and accuracy, and with great knowledge of the ſubject: I will not ſay ſo much for the acts of the preſent time.

This act muſt evince to your lordſhips, that colluſive judgments in courts of law bound in collateral ſuits. Is it then to be wondered at, that there was no provision by the common law reſpecting fraudulent ſentences in the eccleſiaſtical courts, which had the ſole and excluſive jurisdiction in themſelves? But it does not follow, that colluſive practices are to have effect, or the parties go unpuniſhed.

A power is incident to every court to prevent its proceedings from being made the inſtruments of fraud and iniquity, and to puniſh the perſons concerned in the attempt. It may be done upon the information of one intereſted or not intereſted. The court is called upon for its own honour to examine into the buſineſs.

Your lordſhips have been told, that the crown cannot get at the colluſion; that the eccleſiaſtical courts will not attend to the application of the crown. If that were the caſe, it would not follow as a neceſſary conſequence, that the crown ſhould be admitted to alledge colluſion here. But has the attorney-general ſuſmised to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, that there has been ſuch an impoſition put upon them as is inſinuated? Has the judge of the Eccleſiaſtical Court told the attorney-general, I cannot attend to the ſuggeſtion; no application has been made to the Eccleſiaſtical Court, either on the part of the crown, or by the real proſecutor in this caſe, or any other perſon, though the duke of Kingſton and the noble lady at the bar lived together five years under the ſanction of a marriage ſolemnized with the archbiſhop's licence, in the preſence of friends, and known to the world? Does the proſecutor ſay, he is actuated by motives of juſtice, and alledge the ſuppoſed colluſion newly diſcovered?

A caſe happened in the court of King's Bench, which is known to many of your lordſhips. Mrs. Phillips had married Mr. Muilman—Mr. Muilman had got rid of that marriage by a ſentence in the Eccleſiaſtical Court, by proving a former marriage with one Delafield.—It was then the lady's turn. She meditates getting rid of Delafield's marriage, by proving that Delafield at the time he married her had another wife; and ſo the lady was to fix herſelf upon Mr. Muilman in order to give effect to her ſcheme. An action was brought for a real demand againſt her in the court of King's Bench by a brewer, who had got a note from her for a valuable conſideration: the intent of this was to create a rumour that Muilman and ſhe were married. They might have brought this and a thouſand ſuch actions, and no verdict given could be evidence againſt Mr. Muilman. But when Mr. Muilman heard of this proceeding, and the purpoſe of it, though it could not affect him, he applied to the court of King's Bench, not as a party in the cauſe, but informed the court that ſuch a proceeding was had by colluſion, that it was an abuſe of the court, and ought to be rectified. Lord Hardwicke was then at the head of that court: he conſidered it as a high contempt of that court: he attended to the application of Muilman. An objection had been made by counſel, that Muilman was not to be heard. What! ſaid lord Hardwicke, to inform the court of a contempt, is he not to be heard? Any perſon as amicus curiæ may inform the court of a contempt that has been committed. The court ordered the record to be taken off the file, and puniſhed the parties. If the preſent ſentence was by colluſion, the Eccleſiaſtical Court would eraſe from their records the memorial of the tranſaction at the ſuſmiſe of an amicus curiæ; and would not the Eccleſiaſtical Court have thought themſelves honoured with ſuch an amicus curiæ as his majeſty's attorney-general?

Great, and perhaps deſerved, commendation was beſtowed upon the marriage-act, though, I really confeſs, I did not diſcover the application. Your lordſhips were told, that every woman of eaſy virtue and of indigent circumſtances before that act had an immediate receipt for the payment of her debts by getting married at the Fleet. Has the marriage-act been attended with ſuch beneficial conſequences to make all women virtuous, and all women rich? If that be true, it has much greater merit than I conceived belonged to it. Did a Fleet marriage diſcharge the woman from her debts? The only change it made in her ſituation was this: when married, ſhe goes to gaol in company with her huſband; whereas if ſingle, ſhe muſt go alone, and truſt to the company ſhe meets there: and as to future debts, ſhe was not liable, becauſe ſhe was a married woman; and at that time the marriage-ceremony, if performed by a prieſt, was valid. But is there any thing in the marriage-act which ſays, that a woman who now marries ſhall not run into debt? It would be very happy for many huſbands in this country, if there could have been an effectual provision of that kind. Before the marriage-act, a woman by her marriage in the Fleet was not liable to future debts; a woman now by her marriage in the church is not liable to future debts. Has the marriage-act made it a difficult matter in this country to be married? Are there many obſtacles in the way? Is there any delicacy in ſurrogates in granting licences? In truth, it is as eaſy to get married in a church as before in the Fleet. Suppoſe a marriage by banns at a diſtance from London; the woman comes here and runs in debt; does any body in London know of her marriage, though it was in a church? She has as much power to run in debt ſince the marriage-act as before, and as exempt from the payment.

Your lordſhips are told, that a man and woman may to civil purpoſes and to civil duties, by a colluſive ſentence of this kind, become ſeparated, and no longer huſband and wife; but to all the public duties they are huſband and wife: they cannot abſolve themſelves from public duties; there is no power upon earth can do it but the legiſlature of the kingdom; and that the noble lady at the bar is free to all civil purpoſes, but to all criminal purpoſes ſhe is a wife.

I wiſh the gentleman, who uſed this argument, had explained himſelf upon the ſubject; for I proteſt to your lordſhips, I am to be informed that there are other public duties by huſband and wife to be performed, but thoſe in a ſtate of cohabitation: I have no idea of any public duties which the ſtate can exact from a huſband and wife in any other ſituation: and yet, my lords, nothing is more clear, than if a man and woman cohabit together as huſband and wife after a ſentence like the preſent, and whiſt it remains in force, they are puniſhable by eccleſiaſtical cenſures.

Are the public duties alluded to the injunctions found in the act of parliament, that no man ſhall take another wife, or any woman another huſband, living the former? The act does not mean to puniſh all ſuch acts: for in the firſt place the act ſays, that it is competent to any man, without becoming a felon or the object of puniſhment, by the act, to marry a ſecond wife, provided his firſt wife is beyond the ſeas for ſeven years together, though the huſband knows ſhe is living; and yet the ſecond marriage is void, and the huſband may be puniſhed in the eccleſiaſtical courts, but not in the temporal.

Suppoſe a gentleman from Ireland, for inſtance, ſhould be civil enough to leave his wife, and reſides ſeven years in England; though he hears from her by every packet, though he writes to her by every packet, he may marry a woman in England without offending againſt the act of parliament. It would be the ſame, if a perſon living at Dover could prevail on his wife to go and reſide at Calais for ſeven years: he might marry another woman at Dover without any peril from this law, though every veſſel brought him accounts of her good health. Is this then that great public duty which the ſtate ſo rigorouſly exacts, that none of its ſubjects ſhall marry a ſecond huſband or wife, living the firſt?

It is well known, that a divorce for adultery does not diſſolve the bonds of matrimony; the relation of huſband and wife ſtill exiſts, and neither party can marry again; and yet the day after that divorce is pronounced, ſhe can marry any man ſhe pleaſes without offending againſt this law. It is not then in this act of parliament we are to find the public duties which the ſtate exacts from a huſband and wife; for in many caſes a ſecond marriage is not puniſhed, or even condemned by it.

Poſſibly the gentleman may urge, that a wife's reſiding abroad for ſeven years may be by colluſion to give the huſband an opportunity of marrying again without committing felony: in ſhort, if your lordſhips yield to this objection of colluſion, it is impoſſible to foreſee to what extravagant lengths you may be carried in ſupport of the propoſition, that the noble lady at the bar is to all civil purpoſes ſingle, but to all criminal purpoſes a wife. The caſe of a perſon who committed a fraudulent act of bankruptcy, on which a commiſſion iſſued, and for a concealment of part of his effects he was tried and executed, has been mentioned. The caſe, ſo far from maintaining the propoſition, is an authority againſt it: the colluſive act of bankruptcy was deemed equivalent to a real one; it bound the bankrupt to all civil and criminal purpoſes; it ſubjected his property to be ſeized for the benefit of his creditors; it ſubjected his perſon to the puniſhment ordained by the bankrupt laws: there is no diſtinction made between civil and criminal purpoſes.

Suppoſe a commiſſion of bankruptcy iſſuing fairly upon a real act of bankruptcy, and a concealment by the bankrupt; and let me ſuppoſe farther, which is not an impoſſible thing, that the commiſſion by colluſion between the aſſignees and the bankrupt is ſuperſeded, as having improperly iſſued, by an order of my lord chancellor, and an indictment ſhould be afterwards preferred for the concealment; would any judge ſuffer a man to be tried as a felon under theſe circumſtances on a ſuggeſtion of fraud in ſuperſeding the commiſſion? Certainly not: I am perſuaded every judge, who now aſſiſts your lordſhips, would tell the proſecutor he had miſtaken the place to examine the fraud; that he ought to have applied to the court of Chancery, which has excluſive jurisdiction in bankruptcy; and direct the priſoner to be acquitted.

Fermor's caſe, in lord Coke's Reports, was cited to your lordſhips to prove, that acts temporal and eccleſiaſtical may be avoided for colluſion: does that learned judge ſay where ſuch acts are to be avoided? No; but, my lords, to illuſtrate that paſſage he refers to a caſe reported in lord chief juſtice Dyer's Reports; and there it appears, that the act of the Eccleſiaſtical Court, which was granting an adminiſtration, had been repealed in the Eccleſiaſtical Court for colluſion. If I wanted authorities to add to thoſe I have cited, I would borrow this to put into the number; becauſe it is a direct proof, that the Eccleſiaſtical Court have a power to ſet aſide their own acts for fraud.

A caſe of Lloyd and Maddox was cited from Moore's Reports to prove, that the eccleſiaſtical courts had a power to examine into the colluſive means of obtaining a judgment in the temporal courts; and ſhall not, ſay the gentlemen, the temporal courts take the ſame liberty with the sentences of the ecclesiastical? The case need only to be stated to shew the fallacy of the argument. A person claiming a legacy sues in the Ecclesiastical Court, the proper forum for the recovery of that demand: the defendant in answer says, I have nothing to pay you with. Such a one, a daughter of the testator, has sued me in a court of law for a debt; has recovered a judgment against me. I must pay that debt. I cannot pay your legacy, unless I pay it out of my own pocket, and nothing can be more unjust. The executor is to administer the effects as far as they go, but not to pay the debts out of his own pocket. The legatee in answer said, The judgment was by fraud, and the temporal court would not prohibit the ecclesiastical from examining into the matter. This is not only within the principle of the common law, the legatee having an interest at the time of the fraud committed, but falls within the statute of queen Elizabeth, which ordains, that every judgment in any temporal court by collusion is utterly null and void, as if it had never existed; it is void against every person having an interest; it is void by force of the statute against the crown demanding a forfeiture.

A learned friend of mine, who spoke in the cause, and who did me the singular honour of attending to me, not for what I said, but for what I omitted, observed to your lordships, that I had avoided entering into the effect of fraud and collusion upon the sentence, unless by citing the case of Hatfield and Hatfield. I knew it would fall to my share to trouble your lordships upon that subject; and to avoid a repetition, I contented myself in that stage of the business with relying upon the case of Hatfield and Hatfield, which appeared to me alone sufficient to answer every argument upon collusion.

It is pretty singular, that as Hatfield and Hatfield was a case in equity, and two of the most eminent equity-counsel in this kingdom appear for the prosecution, that neither of them thought fit to grapple with that case. They found in the principles of the court of equity, that it was not to be answered, and therefore prudently passed it over to those who should think fit to engage with it. A woman claimed forty pounds a-year, which was vested in a trustee for her use: but there was another devise of an annuity of ten pounds a-year out of lands, and a legacy directly given her. The former husband released to the heir at law of the second husband, who had made these provisions for his supposed wife. She files her bill. The first husband in his answer states all the circumstances of their marriage, the time, the place, the minister, and the persons present, to avoid the effect of the release. A suit of jactitation is instituted in the Ecclesiastical Court by collusion with the second husband, after proof of the marriage in the cause in the Exchequer, and she is declared a separate woman, and the widow of the deceased. The court of Exchequer received the sentence as conclusive evidence. On an appeal to the house of lords, the decree is affirmed.

If it had stood merely upon the printed cases in the house of lords, I should conceive your lordships could not have entertained a doubt; but the case is mentioned in Mr. John Strange's Reports, when he was not a young man; and the ground of the determination is stated to be, that the sentence was conclusive. The case is mentioned also by Mr. Viner in his Abridgment; where he adds, that the house of lords held, that a sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court could not be impeached, though the proceedings were feint and by collusion. This clear and direct authority is to be got rid of and avoided in this manner: Mr. Viner is a nonsensical writer; you are not to give credit to what he says. I should have hoped that gratitude to Mr. Viner's memory would have repressed that observation: he has shortened the hours of the labour of lawyers, and more particularly of those who are in great business. But to cases in themselves irrefragable, with decisions upon the very point, answers cannot be given by argument; unless your lordships will dignify those observations with the name of argument.

The case of lady Mayer was cited from Dolers Commons, which is very material to the cause now before your lordships. It was a case of fraud and collusion, discovered in the Prerogative Court upon the appeal, which had been practised in the Consistory Court of the bishop of London. The fraud was apparent; he that ran might read it: but what said the judge of the Prerogative Court? You must go into the Consistory Court, where the fraud was committed; I can give you no relief. There the collusion must be gone into, there redress may be had, there the honour of the court will be vindicated. This is the opinion of a living judge, of high character for his abilities and integrity: a greater man perhaps never sat at the head of that court.

Your lordships have been pressed to give a more favourable attention to the wishes of the prosecutor, as the present is a criminal proceeding. Is it the principle or genius of this country to be more active to find out and punish crimes, than to give effect to civil rights?

My lords, there is a benignity in the laws of this country to the frailties of mankind. The judges are attentive and zealous that the civil justice of the country be strictly administered, and will not suffer any contrivance, chicane, accident, or neglect, to defeat it; but in criminal prosecutions they are humane, they make great allowances, and are not over-anxious to discover criminals. This observation is verified by daily practice. In a civil cause, if the trial comes on before the plaintiff expects it, if a witness be out of the way, if the verdict be in favour of a defendant contrary to the evidence, the verdict is set aside, and a new trial ordered and justice done: but in a criminal prosecution, if the verdict be in favour of the defendant, though it arises from the absence of a witness, or from any other accident, or it be given contrary to the clearest and most satisfactory proof of guilt, though not one of the jury can shew his face without a blush, yet the verdict stands, and a new trial is never granted. It was even denied in perjury committed in the time of king William, where the defendants had the wickedness to corrupt the witnesses for the prosecution to keep out of the way; for when, and by whatever means, there is an acquittal in a criminal prosecution, the scene is closed and the curtain drops.

I cannot, my lords, sit down without reminding your lordships, that in the course of the argument have been cited many determinations in the temporal courts by judges who had no partiality to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, acknowledging their authority, and declaring undâ voce, that in all cases, where they have an exclusive jurisdiction, the sentence is final and conclusive: there is not an exception to be found in the books. Some of these declarations were made, when the judges of the temporal courts were exceedingly jealous of the ecclesiastical, and when they were even in a state of warfare.

Does the present case call upon your lordships to break down the boundaries which the constitution has fixed between the temporal and ecclesiastical courts, or to invade those rules of decision which have been transmitted from the earliest of times? Is there an authority to warrant your lordships in taking so extraordinary a step?

Is it expected, that your lordships are to be more jealous in finding out crimes and punishing offenders than your ancestors? and to accomplish those purposes, that you will disregard the authorities of the law, the practice of ages, and the spirit of the English constitution?

If the matter, instead of being clear in favour of the noble lady at the bar, as I conceive it to be, had been only doubtful, I am persuaded your lordships would pronounce an acquittal.

It is the duty and practice of every judge in a criminal prosecution to let the jury know, that, if there hangs a doubt in the cause, they ought to give the turn of the scale in favour of innocence, and acquit the prisoner.

Can your lordships after an argument of three days, in which so many respectable determinations in favour of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction have been cited, lay your hands upon your breasts and say, Here is no doubt; the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court, upon the faith of which, and by the advice of a person of the first knowledge and abilities in the ecclesiastical law the noble lady acted, is a nullity and of no avail; and that she has intentionally violated the laws of her country and become a felon?

My lords, I will not permit myself to suspect any one of your lordships can entertain such an opinion; and I sit down with the most perfect confidence, that by your lordships judgment the noble lady at the bar will be dismissed from any farther attendance upon your lordships.

Lord High Steward. A noble lord asks, whether in that case you cited, where an action was brought against Mr. Thomas Hervey, the court upon hearing the sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court refused to proceed farther in it; or whether it was, that the cause was then depending in the Ecclesiastical Court?

Mr. Wallace. I will give your lordships an account from my memory, confirmed by a note taken in a subsequent cause; and if there is any doubt upon the facts, I am happy to acquaint your lordships, that you will have much better information upon the subject from the noble judge who tried the cause. Mr. Hervey and the lady had lived separate several years, during which time a creditor, who had furnished her with necessaries, brought an action against Mr. Hervey. He denied his marriage. There had not been a sentence at that time in the Ecclesiastical Court. The jury were satisfied with the evidence of the marriage, and found a verdict against Mr. Hervey.—Another creditor, who had furnished necessaries for the lady afterwards, brought his action against Mr. Hervey, and was provided with the same evidence which had satisfied the former jury: but between the time of the former trial and the trial of this cause, a suit of jactitation had been instituted in the Ecclesiastical Court by Mr. Hervey against the lady, and a sentence pronounced in his favour, which was offered in evidence. The learned judge conceived himself bound by that sentence, as the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction: there was no imposition upon the creditor, no occasion for an alarm by the decision, the debt was not contracted during cohabitation, no act of Mr. Hervey's had induced the creditor to furnish the necessaries to her as his wife, he renounced the relation; the plaintiff gave credit upon the marriage itself, and therefore took upon him to satisfy the court that there was a legal marriage: the sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court had determined the point: the judge apprehended that the question was closed, and that he was bound to give faith and credit to the sentence; and the plaintiff failed on account of the sentence, though it was afterwards reversed upon an appeal.

Doctor Calvert.

My lords, the question arising upon the sentence which has taken up so much of your lordships time, seems now confined to a narrower compass than we at first apprehended.

My lords, when the counsel for the noble duchess at your lordships bar offered the sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court to be read as conclusive evidence, it was desired by the counsel on the other side, that the rest of the proceedings in that cause might likewise be read. This raised a belief in us, that exception would be taken to the nature of this sentence in particular, as differing from sentences in other matrimonial causes.

My lords, we apprehended it would be said, as indeed it was by some of the counsel on the other side, that a proceeding in a cause of jactitation, when the issue of it was, pronouncing for the jactitation, and the defendant enjoined silence (let the proceeding in that cause have been what it might), would not amount to a positive decree against a marriage, but it would be merely a dismissal of the party; that it would amount to no more than this, that nothing had been proved for the present, and that the judgment never would become decretal.

My lords, I take it to be a mere mistake, to speak of proceedings in such a cause in that way; but however, we have it now, as I understand, in concession from the counsel on the other side, and we are perfectly agreed about the nature of the sentence: it has been allowed, it is as complete a sentence against a marriage, as if it had been pronounced in a cause of nullity of marriage.

My lords, a concession of this sort coming from the counsel on the other side, your lordships will see, must leave them much embarrassed: first, by their own concessions of the effects similar judgments have had in other questions; and likewise by the act of parliament, upon which alone this prosecution can be founded.

My lords, it is conceded, that some judgments of the ecclesiastical courts are final as to matrimony; but if they concede that some are, there is now remaining no objection to this in particular. Your lordships will see how much this is supported by the statute on which the prosecution is founded; founded; because the exceptions out of that statute go directly to those sentences with which it is now allowed this is upon a footing. Can it therefore with any propriety be now urged, that it ought not to be received as conclusive, because there is a possibility of setting it aside? This seemed astonishing to the learned gentleman who spoke first on the other side; that, as it is allowed that the court who passed that sentence could at any time upon proper evidence reverse it, it should be urged in this judicature as conclusive upon your lordships. Many instances have been given, where sentences not more final or irrevocable than this have been allowed in the common-law courts. If in a cause of nullity, a marriage be pronounced to be void, it would not be contended a moment, but that such a sentence is within the exception of the act; and no person marrying again after such a sentence could be an object of punishment under that act. It is surely therefore a very considerable concession, and sufficient to justify the reliance we have upon it, that it is a positive and direct sentence against the marriage.

My lords, the ground of some of the exceptions out of the act of parliament seems to be the notoriety of the state of the party, which leaves no room for imposition on the person with whom the second marriage is contracted; for the act has not in view merely the punishment of the offence as against morality, because the exceptions are such which allow in many cases a second marriage, though the first is really in force. The object therefore of the act of parliament seems to be this, that there should be no deceit put upon the person: it is expressed by the preamble in these words: 'Whereas many persons going from one county to another, or into places where they are not known, marry again; therefore be it enacted:' but when there has been any proceeding of this sort, when there has been any question litigated in the Ecclesiastical Court relative to that marriage, and when the sentence of the court is against that marriage, I believe it is no strain of the interpretation of that act, to suppose it is one of those cases, in which no prosecution of this sort ought to be carried on.

My lords, the variety of instances that have been produced to shew, that whenever any sentence of this sort has been produced, it has been constantly attended to by all civil jurisdictions, will not bear a contradiction; nothing can be more clear. To all the cases that have been quoted on our side, I do not apprehend that any answer has been given to affect their authority; what is more, there has been no case cited on the other side: therefore, if a series of authorities will establish any point, it is to be conceded, that in all civil cases a sentence thus pronounced by a court having a competent jurisdiction, where the question has come before that court, marriage or not marriage, will be received. The question then will come to this: if it can be established, that in civil suits it would be received, ought it not to have the same effect in a criminal prosecution?

My lords, for that purpose there have been cases cited to your lordships; that of the King against Vincent, where there was a prosecution for a forgery, and the probate was received as conclusive evidence against that forgery.

My lords, in answer to that it was urged only, that it was a case that was too strong, and they could not give credit to the Reporter. That answer seems by no means satisfactory, especially as it does not meet with support from any subsequent authority, since none has been quoted that comes up to the point. Two or three cases have been mentioned; but when they are considered, and the circumstances they were attended with, your lordships will find, it does not appear that they come up to the case in question. In two of these instances, the supposed testators were living. My lords, it was a gross imposition, and the whole proceeding a mere mistake, and nothing more. The testator came into court to give evidence. To be sure, a probate under these circumstances could not be attended to; it could not be a probate at all; nor could it be contended, that the probate of the will of a living person could be received in evidence. I know the treatment it received in the Court of Prerogative in that case, where Stirling was executed for a forgery. I enquired, to see how that stands, and I do not find there were any proceedings to reverse or revoke the probate; the thing was too absurd to require a judicial disquisition. I was informed, a pen was drawn through the probate, and on the margin was written the word void. There were two other cases mentioned of indictments for forging wills, where it was said that there was a probate existing; but it does not appear throughout these cases, that any mention was made of the probate at the trial, or that the exception was taken for the prisoners. We pointed out to your lordships the great inconvenience that would arise from going on to enquire into questions of this sort in two different judicatures. It was asserted—

A Lord. Whether the scratch with a pen through the probate, in the case of Stirling, was done by any order of the court?

Doctor Calvert. Not by any judicial order, I believe. I apprehend it never came judicially before the court. By whom it was done I know not: I am not acquainted with that.

My lords, it was asserted by the counsel on the other side, that no decision of a civil nature could be applied to any criminal question: it was asserted, but I did not find that it was supported by any principles or authorities.

My lords, we, on the other hand, did submit to your lordships, that the inconveniences arising from such different enquiries might be extremely great; for if they produce different judgments upon the same point, the persons, who should be affected and interested under them, under such a predicament might find it difficult to know what should be their duty. We pointed out, that in case the sentence now in question remains in force, which I trust it will, notwithstanding any judgment that may be passed in this court; yet if you should proceed to censure the person thus separated from the supposed former husband, from this contrariety of judgments the greatest confusion would arise: for you would censure the person for marrying again, as being the wife of that husband, of whom it had been directly in issue and determined that she was never the wife. This, my lords, appears to us a very considerable absurdity. The only answer I heard to that was rather avowing the inconvenience than removing it. When it was asked, in what predicament would a woman stand under these circumstances? it was said, she would be a wife to criminal purposes, but not so as to civil considerations. What the distinction meant, I confess I do not well understand; but it was said, the noble lady at the bar should be considered as a wife to all criminal purposes, because persons cannot absolve themselves from their public duties. I never understood, that with regard to matrimony any party could absolve himself from his private duties neither: I always understood it, as far as his own act could affect it, to be an indelible obligation. But what are the duties to the publick, which a person in this situation should be answerable for? A woman by law separated from, and even pronounced not to be the wife of, the supposed husband, and to whom she cannot return; I do not know what duties there are, that she should be answerable to the publick for. It is contended, that of not marrying again; but this is expressly contrary to the meaning of the act itself, which provides that in many cases, even where the former marriage remains in force, yet a second marriage shall not be criminal: as in the case of a separation a mensa et thoro there is no doubt, that the parties remain man and wife as much as if they had never been divorced; nay, it is so merely a temporary separation, that there is no occasion for a judicial proceeding to bring them together again; for whenever the parties chuse to cohabit, they may live together, and are as completely man and wife as if no separation had happened. It has been observed, that some inconveniences, which were removed by the late marriage act, might be introduced again under these suits of jactitation: it is certainly somewhat unintelligible how these suits could be applied to those purposes. The grievance mentioned is this, that single women contracting debts did, before that act of parliament, procure themselves to be clandestinely married to persons with whom they never intended to cohabit, but merely with a view fraudulently to protect themselves against their creditors. Now, can it be argued, that by going into the Ecclesiastical Court, and obtaining a sentence in a cause of jactitation, that end would be answered? What! when a woman wants a husband to protect her from her debts, shall she get herself fraudulently released from her husband? It seems it would have quite a contrary effect, and cannot answer the purpose for which it would be intended. If any of the excellent regulations made by that act are in danger of being infringed upon by undue practices, it were worthy the legislature to attend to it, and provide against them; but a court of justice cannot for such reasons depart from ancient and established modes of proceedings: and in this case these considerations ought not to have the least weight, because there is not any ground for the apprehension. In the proceedings in this criminal court, therefore, your lordships ought to receive these sentences upon the very same principles, or indeed broader than a civil court: for who shall pretend to say, that in a civil question parties may avail themselves of such a suit? But where a person is brought merely to answer for a crime, and for the purpose of punishment, who shall say, that it is consonant to the principles of law that such a defence should not avail? So rigorous a determination in criminal cases has not been supported on any authority, or established on any principle. Upon the authorities therefore which have been quoted, and which remain unshaken and uncontradicted, we do submit to your lordships, that these two points are well established. But it has been said, that we are now arguing for what is not open to be considered on the general principles of law; because this question has been already decided by the very act upon which the prosecution is now depending: for when an act of parliament makes some exceptions, the true interpretation of that act is, that all cases, which are not within the exceptions, are within the prohibition.

My lords, supposing that to be a good principle of interpretation, yet it may very well and with propriety be contended, that the case that is now offered, I mean the sentence pronouncing against this marriage in a cause of jactitation, is within the exceptions of the act of parliament.

My lords, the two exceptions are, that it shall not extend to any person, who is at the time of such marriage divorced by any sentence had in the Ecclesiastical Court; or to any person, where the former marriage hath been, or hereafter shall be, by sentence in any ecclesiastical court, decreed to be void and of no effect.

My lords, it will be difficult to explain the latter words, connected with the provision in the former clause, without taking in the very sentence which is now under consideration. The general words in the first clause are, that it shall not extend to those cases, in which at the time of such marriage the person was divorced by any sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court.

Now, my lords, the word divorce has always been applied, not only to separations a mensa & thoro, but to divorces a vinculo matrimonii. The first clause therefore, under the general word of divorce, seems to take in both these cases, whether it be a temporary separation for adultery or cruelty, or whether it be a divorce a vinculo matrimonii. If that clause applies to these two cases, I would ask, what is the meaning of the second, that speaks of sentences, declaring a marriage null and void to all effects? A sentence pronouncing a marriage null and void, and of no effect, is the same thing as a divorce a vinculo matrimonii; because if the marriage has ever been a true and legal marriage, it is well known, that no judicial power in this kingdom can put an end to it. In order therefore to give every part of this act some meaning, it ought to be understood, that the legislature by those general words must mean any sentence whatever, by which the Ecclesiastical Court should have pronounced, that there is no marriage, or that a marriage is void; it being the purport and the general object of this act to save not only the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court (that is not what I am contending for), but it is to save the innocence of the persons acting under such sentences: because where that question has been agitated in a public court (for the legislature does not suppose, as some of the the counsel on the other side have unwarrantably supposed, it to be a private and clandestine transaction; but) the constitution supposes every court to be open and public, and proceedings there to be before the face of the world: every body may see and know them, if they please; and when there has been this public sentence of any constitutional court, the meaning, the equity of the act must be, that any one of these sentences shall justify the party acting under it. To make a distinction between a cause of nullity and a cause of jactitation, I apprehend can be founded upon nothing, but not considering the nature of the proceedings; because I can hardly put a case, which would be a proper subject for a suit of nullity, but it might likewise be proceeded to the same effect in a suit of jactitation: the only difference is, the proof being put upon the different party. Suppose a person means to dispute the validity of his marriage; he may, if he pleases, proceed in a cause of nullity of marriage; in which case he must state the circumstances of his marriage, and the prayer of his libel will be, that under these circumstances his marriage may be pronounced void: the sentence then would be direct to that point. Suppose, on the other hand, he chuses to bring a suit of jactitation, and charges that the woman has claimed him to be her husband: if he justifies that jactitation by pleading her marriage, it is incumbent on her then to state the case, and to go into the question, whether it is a marriage or no: and if in that justificatory plea such circumstances be stated, as would have been the contents of the libel in a cause of nullity, the sentence, I contend, would have precisely the same effect.

My lords, I have known more instances than one to justify what I assert. The first suit that ever was brought upon the marriage act to avoid a marriage by reason of minority, where the party under age was married by licence without the consent of parents, was by a suit of jactitation: it was the case of Frost and Weldeck in 1760. I looked into the sentence that was pronounced in that cause, and it was precisely in the same words as this now in question. Will any body contend that it is not an effectual sentence, declaring the marriage between these parties void? Your lordships see it is a fallacy therefore to say, that this method of proceeding in a cause of jactitation will not as effectually bring on the question of marriage, as a cause of nullity of marriage. There were two other cases afterwards upon that act, that were brought in the same way; neither of them came to a decision, but the method of proceeding was the same. Afterwards there was a suit upon that act of parliament brought as a cause of nullity of marriage. I remember it being made a question, whether even that was a proper way of proceeding; but the judge was of opinion, that the party might have proceeded in either way, conceiving, I presume, that the sentence in one way would be as effectual as in the other. With what propriety then can it be said, as it was on the other side, that all proceedings in causes for jactitation of marriage must be with an ill intent?

My lords, it doth not apply at all to the manner of proceedings. Suppose it to be true, what was asserted by the counsel, and I believe it is in a great measure so, that these suits were chiefly used for the purpose of enquiring into contracts of marriage; for before the marriage act put an end to such contracts, it was difficult for parties to know, whether they had entered into such contracts as would bind them or no; with what propriety can it be said, that if a suit of jactitation be brought upon such contract, it must be with an ill intent? I have mentioned, that these suits have been brought under the marriage act, and therefore merely upon the question of marriage. In those cases the sentences are precisely conceived in the same words with the sentence in this cause: and if a man was to be married again after such a sentence pronounced, would it be argued one moment, that he would be guilty of polygamy under this statute? If he would not, it must be, because such a sentence is on the same footing, as if it had been given in a cause of nullity. For, if a sentence given in a cause of nullity was to be offered as conclusive, and before you entered into evidence upon the fact, your lordships would think it the proper time to offer it, there would be no occasion to go into the question; because, let the fact turn out what it might, that sentence would be satisfactory, that the marriage was void, that is, that there was no marriage then subsisting between the parties. What is the assertion often then in a suit of jactitation; and what was the assertion in the cause now before your lordships? The plaintiff to justify his claim upon the lady states, that at a particular time he was married, states the circumstances, states the persons present: he attempts to prove this fact. The judge having considered the proofs, and gone into the question, determined that there was no marriage, or, in other words, that the marriage is of none effect: that is, that the marriage that is pleaded there can have no effect; for he pronounces, that, as far as to him appears, the party is a spinster, and free from all matrimonial contracts. If we are right then in bringing this cause within the exceptions of the act, every objection I should conceive, that can be stated, is removed under the express regulation of the act of parliament; because the legislature taking this matter into their consideration, well aware, as it must be supposed, of what inconveniences might be argued to arise, have still enacted, that these sentences existing, the person marrying again shall not be within the act of parliament.

Under these considerations, the reply having been so fully and so ably gone into by the gentleman who went before me, I shall take up your lordships time no longer, than in hoping you will be of opinion, that this sentence coming within the exceptions of the act, it would be improper to go into any proof of the fact: and therefore I hope your lordships will admit of this plea of the defendant.

Lord President of the Council. My lords, I move your lordships to adjourn to the chamber of parliament.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. This house is adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

The lords and others returned to the chamber of parliament in the same order they came down. The duchess of Kingston retired from the bar.

Vol. XI.

After some time passed in the chamber of parliament,

(See the Appendix.)

The lords and others came back from thence in the same order; and the peers being seated, and the lord high steward in his chair, the duchess of Kingston was again brought to the bar.

Lord High Steward. Mr. attorney general, you may go on to state your charge.

Mr. Attorney General.

My lords, it seems to be matter of just surprise, that, before the commencement of the last century, no secular punishment had been provided for a crime of this malignant complexion and pernicious example.

Perhaps, the innocence of simpler ages, or the more prevailing influence of religion, or the severity of ecclesiastical censures, together with those calamities which naturally and necessarily follow the enormity, might formerly have been found sufficient to restrain it.

From the moment these causes ceased to produce that effect, imagination can scarcely state a crime which calls more loudly, and in a greater variety of respects, for the interposition of civil authority; which, besides the gross and open scandal given to religion, implies more cruel disappointment to the just and honourable expectations of the persons betrayed by it; which tends more to corrupt the purity of domestic life, and to loosen those sacred connections and close relations, designed by Providence to bind the moral world together; or which may create more civil disorder, especially in a country where the title to great honour and high office is hereditary.

[Here followed a great uproar behind the bar, and the serjeant at arms made the usual proclamation.]

My lords, the misfortunes of individuals, the corruption of private life, the confusion of domestick relations, the disorder of civil succession, and the offence done to religion, are suggested, not as ingredients in the particular offence now under trial, but as miseries likely to arise from the example of the crime in general; and are laid before your lordships only to call your attention to the course and order of the trial, that nothing may fall out, which may give countenance to such a crime, and heighten such dangers to the publick.

The present case, to state it justly and fairly, is a tript of much of this aggravation. The advanced age of the parties, and their previous habits of life, would reduce many of these general articles of mischief and criminality to idle topicks of empty declamation. No part of the present complaint turns upon any ruin brought on the blameless character of injured innocence; or upon any disappointment incurred to just and honourable pretensions; or upon any corruption supposed to be introduced into domestick life. Nor should I expect much serious attention of your lordships, if I should urge the danger of intailing an uncertain condition upon a helpless offspring, or the apprehension of a disputed succession to the house of Pierrepont, as probable aggravations of this crime.

But your lordships will be pleased withal to remember, that every plea, which, in a case differently circumstanced, might have laid claim to your pity for an unfortunate passion in younger minds, is entirely cut off here. If it be true, that the sacred rights of matrimony have been violated, I am afraid it must also appear, that dry lucre was the whole inducement, cold fraud the only means to perpetrate that crime. In truth, the evidence, if it turns out correspondent to the expectations I have formed, will clearly and expressly represent it as a matter of perfect indifference to the prisoner which husband she adhered to, so that the profit to be drawn from this marriage, or from that, was tolerably equal. The crime, stated under these circumstances, and carrying this impression, is an offence to the law; which, if it be less aggravated in some particulars, becomes only more odious in others.

But I decline making general observations upon the evidence. I will state it to your lordships (for it lies in a very narrow compass) in the simplest and shortest manner I can invent. The facts (as the state of the evidence promises me they will be laid before your lordships) form a case, which it will be quite impossible to aggravate, and extremely difficult to extenuate.

My lords, considering the length of time which has intervened, a very few periods will comprise the facts which I am able to lay before your lordships. First, the marriage of the prisoner with Mr. Harvey; her cohabitation with him at broken and distant intervals; the birth of a child in consequence of it; the rupture, and separation which soon followed. Secondly, the attempt which the prisoner, in view to the late lord Bristol's then state of health, made to establish the proofs of her marriage with the present earl. Lastly, the plan, which makes the immediate subject of the present indictment, for bringing about the celebration of a second marriage with the late duke of Kingston.

The prisoner came to London early in life, some time, as I take it, about the year 1740. About forty-three, she was introduced into the family of the late princess of Wales, as her maid of honour. In the summer of forty-four, she contracted an acquaintance with Mr. Harvey; which begins the matter of the present indictment. This acquaintance was contracted by the mere accident of an interview at Winchester races. The familiarity immediately began; and very soon drew to its conclusion.

Miss Chudleigh was about eighteen years of age; and resided at the house of a Mr. Merrill, her cousin, on a visit with a Mrs. Hammer, her aunt, who was also the sister of Mr. Merrill's mother. One Mrs. Maunley, an intimate friend of Mr. Merrill's, was there at the same time.

Mr. Harvey was a boy about seventeen years old, of small fortune, but the younger son of a noble family. He was lieutenant of the Cornwall, which made part of Sir John Dauris's squadron, then lying at Portsmouth.

month, and deſtined for the Weſt-Indies. In ſhort, he appeared to Mrs. Hanmer an advantageous match for her niece.

From Wincheſter races he was invited to Lainſton; and carried the ladies to ſee his ſhip at Portsmouth. The Auguſt following, he made a ſecond viſit at Lainſton for two or three days; during which the marriage was contracted, celebrated, and conſummated.

Some circumſtances, which I have already alluded to, and others, which it is immaterial to ſtate particularly, rendered it impoſſible, or improvident in a degree next to impoſſible, that ſuch a marriage ſhould be celebrated ſolemnly, or publickly given out to the world. The fortune of both was inſufficient to maintain them in that ſituation to which his birth and her ambition had pretenſions. The income of her place would have failed. And the diſpleaſure of the noble family to which he belonged, rendered it impoſſible on his part to avow the connection. The conſequence was, that they agreed without heſitation to keep the marriage ſecret. It was neceſſary for that purpoſe to celebrate it with the utmoſt privacy; and accordingly no other witneſſes were preſent, but ſuch as had been apprized of the connection, and were thought neceſſary to eſtabliſh the fact, in caſe it ſhould ever be diſputed.

Lainſton is a ſmall pariſh, the value of the living being about fifteen pounds a-year; Mr. Merrill's the only houſe in it; and the pariſh church at the end of his garden. On the 4th of Auguſt 1744, Mr. Amis, the then rector, was appointed to be at the church, alone, late at night. At eleven o'clock, Mr. Hervey and Miſs Chudleigh went out, as if to walk in the garden; followed by Mrs. Hanmer, her ſervant (whoſe maiden name I forget; ſhe is now called Ann Cradock, having married Mr. Hervey's ſervant of that name) Mr. Merrill, and Mr. Mountenay; which laſt carried a taper to read the ſervice by. They found Mr. Amis in the church, according to his appointment; and there the ſervice was celebrated, Mr. Mountenay holding the taper in his hat. The ceremony being performed, Mrs. Hanmer's maid was diſpatched to ſee that the coaſt was clear; and they returned into the houſe, without being obſerved by any of the ſervants. I mention theſe ſmall circumſtances, becauſe they happen to be recollected by the witneſs.

The marriage was conſummated the ſame night; and he lay with her two or three nights following; after which he was obliged to return to his ſhip, which had received failing orders.

Miſs Chudleigh went back, as had been agreed, to her ſtation of maid of honour in the family of the princeſs dowager. Mr. Hervey failed in November following for the Weſt-Indies; and remained there till Auguſt 1746, when he ſet ſail for England. In the month of October following he landed at Dover, and reſorted to his wife, who then lived, by the name of Miſs Chudleigh, in Conduit-Street. She received him as her husband, and entertained him accordingly, as far as conſiſted with their plan of keeping the marriage ſecret. In the latter end of November in the ſame year, Mr. Hervey ſailed for the Mediterranean, and returned in the month of January 1747, and ſtaid here till May in the ſame year. Mean-while ſhe continued to reſide in Conduit-Street, and he to viſit her as uſual, till ſome differences aroſe between them, which terminated in a downright quarrel; after which they never ſaw each other more. He continued abroad till December 1747, when he returned; but no intercouſe, which can be traced, paſſed between them afterwards.

This general account is all I am able to give your lordſhips of the intercouſe between Mr. Hervey and his wife. The cauſe of the diſpleaſure which ſeparated them, is immaterial to be enlarged upon. The fruit of their intercouſe was a ſon, born at Chelſea, ſome time in the year 1747. The circumſtances of that birth, the notice which people took of it, and the converſations which he held about that, and the death of the child, furniſh part of the evidence that a matrimonial connection actually ſubſiſted between them.

After having mentioned ſo often the ſecrecy with which the marriage and cohabitation were conducted, it ſeems needleſs to obſerve to your lordſhips, that the birth of a child was ſuppreſſed with equal care. That alſo made but an awkward part of the family and eſtabliſhment of a maid of honour.

My lords, that which I call the ſecond period, was in the year 1759. She had then lived at a diſtance from her husband near twelve years. But the infirm ſtate of the late lord Briſtol's health ſeemed to open the proſpect of a rich ſucceſſion, and an earldom. It was thought worth while, as nothing better had then offered, to be counſels of Briſtol; and for that purpoſe to adjust the proofs of her marriage.

Mr. Amis, the miniſter who had married them, was at Wincheſter, in a declining ſtate of health. She appointed her couſin, Mr. Merrill, to meet her there on the 12th of February 1759; and by fix in the morning ſhe arrived at the Blue Boar inn, oppoſite Mr. Amis's houſe. She ſent for his wife, and communicated her buſineſs, which was to get a certificate from Mr. Amis of her marriage with Mr. Hervey. Mrs. Amis invited her to their houſe, and acquainted her husband with the occaſion of her coming. He was ill a-bed; and deſired her to come up. But nothing was done in the buſineſs of the certificate, till the arrival of Mr. Merrill, who brought a ſheet of ſtamped paper to write it upon. They were ſtill at a loſs about the form, and ſent for one Spearing, an attorney. Spearing thought, that the merely making a certificate, and delivering it out in the manner which had been propoſed, was not the beſt way of eſtabliſhing the evidence which might be wanted. He therefore propoſed, that a check-book (as he called it) ſhould be bought; and the marriage be regiſtered in the uſual form, and in the preſence of the priſoner. Somebody ſuggeſting that it had been thought improper ſhe ſhould be preſent at the making of the regiſter, he deſired the might be called; the purpoſe being perfectly fair, merely to ſtate that in the form of a regiſter, which many people knew to be true; and which thoſe perſons of honour, then preſent, gave no room to doubt. Accordingly his advice was taken, the book was bought, and the marriage was regiſtered. The book was intitled, Marriages, Births, and Burials in the pariſh of Lainſton. The firſt entry ran, The twenty-second of Auguſt, one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-two, buried, Mrs. Suſannah Merrill, relict of John Merrill, eſq. The next was, The fourth of Auguſt one thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-four, married, the honourable Auguſtus Hervey, eſq. to Miſs Elizabeth Chudleigh, daughter of colonel Thomas Chudleigh, late of Chelſea Colledge, deceased, in the pariſh church of Lainſton, by me Thomas Amis. The priſoner was in great ſpirits. She thanked Mr. Amis, and told him, it might be a hundred thouſand pounds in her way. She told Mrs. Amis all her ſecrets; of the child ſhe had by Mr. Hervey; a fine boy, but it was dead; and how ſhe borrowed a hundred pounds of her aunt Hanmer to make baby cloaths. It ſerved the purpoſe of the hour to diſcloſe theſe things. She ſealed up the regiſter, and left it with Mrs. Amis, in charge, upon her husband's death, to deliver it to Mr. Merrill. This happened in a few weeks after.

Mr. Kinchin, the preſent rector, ſucceeded to the living of Lainſton; but the book remained in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Merrill.

In the year 1764 Mrs. Hanmer died, and was buried at Lainſton. A few days after, Mr. Merrill deſired her burial might be regiſtered. Mr. Kinchin did not know of any regiſter which belonged to the pariſh; but Mr. Merrill produced the book which Mr. Amis had made; and taking it out of the ſealed cover, in which it had remained till that time, ſhewed Kinchin the entry of the marriage, and bade him not mention it. Kinchin ſubjoined the third entry, Buried, December the tenth, one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-four, Mrs. Ann Hanmer, relict of the late colonel William Hanmer; and delivered the book again to Mr. Merrill.

In the year 1767 Mr. Merrill died. Mr. Bathuſt, who married his daughter, found this book among his papers; and taking it to be, what it purpoſed, a pariſh regiſter, delivered it to Mr. Kinchin accordingly. He has kept it as ſuch ever ſince; and upon that occaſion made the fourth entry, Buried, the 7th of February, one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-seven, John Merrill, eſq.

The earl of Briſtol recovered his health; and this regiſter was forgotten, till a very different occaſion aroſe for enquiry after it.

The third period, to which I begged the attention of your lordſhips in the outſet, was in the year 1768. Nine years had paſſed, ſince her former hopes of a great title and fortune had fallen to the ground. She had at length formed a plan to attain the ſame object another way. Mr. Hervey alſo had turned his thoughts to a more agreeable connection; and actually entered into a correſpondence with the priſoner, for the purpoſe of ſetting aſide a marriage ſo burdensome and hateful to both. The ſcheme he propoſed was rather indelicate; not that afterwards executed, which could not ſuſtain the eye of juſtice a moment; but a ſimpler method, founded in the truth of the caſe; that of obtaining a ſeparation by ſentence a menſa et thoro propter adulterium; which might ſerve as the foundation of an act of parliament for an abſolute divorce. He ſent her a meſſage to this effect, in terms ſufficiently peremptory and rough, as your lordſhips will hear from the witneſs. Mrs. Cradock, the woman I have mentioned before as being Mrs. Hanmer's ſervant, and preſent at the marriage, was then married to a ſervant of Mr. Hervey, and lived in the priſoner's family with her husband. He bade her tell her miſtreſs, that he wanted a divorce; that he ſhould call upon her (Cradock) to prove the marriage; and that the priſoner muſt ſupply ſuch other evidence as might be neceſſary.

This might have answered his purpoſe well enough; but her's required more reſerve and management; and ſuch a proceeding might have diſappointed it. She therefore ſpurned at that part of the propoſal; and reſuſed in terms of high reſentment, to prove herſelf a whore. On the 18th of Auguſt following ſhe entered a caveat at Dockers Commons, to hinder any proceſs paſſing under ſeal of the court, at the ſuit of Mr. Hervey, againſt her, in any matrimonial cauſe, without notice to her proctor.

What difficulties impeded the direct and obvious plan, or what inducements prevailed in favour of ſo different a meaſure, I cannot ſtate to your lordſhips. But it has been already ſeen in a debate of many days, what kind of plan they ſubſtituted in place of the former.

In the Michaelmas ſeſſion of the year 1768, ſhe inſtituted a ſuit of jactitation of marriage in the common form. The answer was ſo ſhaped, and the evidence ſo applied, that ſucceſs became utterly impracticable.

A groſſer artifice, I believe, was never fabricated. His libel ſtated the marriage, with many of its particulars; but not too many. It was large in alledging all the indifferent circumſtances which attended the courtſhip, contract, marriage ceremony, conſummation, and cohabitation; but when it came to the facts themſelves, it ſtated a ſecret courtſhip, and a contract, with the privacy of Mrs. Hanmer alone, who was then dead. The marriage ceremony, which, in truth, was celebrated in the church at Lainſton, was ſaid to have been performed at Mr. Merrill's houſe, in the pariſh of Sparſhot, by Mr. Amis, in the preſence of Mrs. Hanmer and Mr. Mountenay, who were all three dead. Mrs. Cradock, whom but three months before he held out as a witneſs of the marriage, was dropped; and, to ſhut her out more perfectly, the conſummation is ſaid to have paſſed without the privacy or knowledge of any part of the family and ſervants of Mr. Merrill; meaning perhaps that Cradock was ſervant to Mrs. Hanmer. It was further inſinuated, that the marriage was kept a ſecret, except from the perſons before-mentioned.

To theſe articles the form of proceeding obliged her to put in a perſonal answer upon oath. She denies the previous contract; ſhe evades the propoſal of marriage, by ſtating that it was made to Mrs. Hanmer without her privacy; not denying that it was afterwards communicated to her. The reſt of the article, which contains a circumſtantial allegation of the marriage, together with the time, place, witneſſes, and ſo forth, ſhe buſies in the formulary concluſion of every answer, by denying the reſt of the ſaid pretended poſition or article to be true in any part thereof. Finally, ſhe denies to the article which alledges conſummation.

Denying the reſt of the article to be true in any part of it reſerves this ſalvo. The whole averment of marriage was but one part of the article; that averment (the language is ſo conſtructed) makes but one member of a ſentence; and yet it combines falſe circumſtances with true. They were, in Mr. Merrill's houſe at Sparſhot, joined together in holy matrimony. This

This part of the article, as her answer calls it, is not true. It is true they were married; but not true, that they were married at Sparshot, or at Mr. Merrill's house.

How was this gross and palpable evasion treated? It is the course of the Ecclesiastical Court to file exceptions to indistinct or insufficient answers. Otherwise, to be sure, they could not compel a defendant to put in any material answer. But it was not the purpose of this suit to exact a sufficient answer; consequently no exceptions were filed; but the parties went to issue.

The plan of the evidence also was framed upon the same measured line. The articles had excluded every part of the family: even the woman whom Mr. Hervey had sent to demand the divorce, was omitted. But her husband is produced, to swear, that in the year 1744 Mr. Hervey danced with Miss Chudleigh at Winchester races, and visited her at Lainston; and in 1746 he heard a rumour of their marriage. Mary Edwards and Ann Hillam, servants in Mr. Merrill's family, did not contradict the article they were examined to, which alleges, that none of his servants knew any thing of the matter. But they had heard the report. So had Messrs. Robinson, Hossack, and Edwards. Such was the amount of Mr. Hervey's evidence; in which the witnesses make a great shew of zeal to disclose all they know, with a proper degree of caution to explain that they know nothing.

The form of examining witnesses was also observed on her part; and she proved, most irrefragably, that she passed as a single woman; went by her maiden name; was maid of honour to the Princess Dowager; bought and sold; borrowed money of Mr. Drummond; and kept cash with him, and other bankers, by the name of Elizabeth Chudleigh; nay, that Mr. Merrill and Mrs. Hammer, who had agreed to keep the marriage secret, conversed and corresponded with her by that name.

For this purpose a great variety of witnesses was called; whom it would have been very rash to produce, without some foregone agreement, or perfect understanding, that they should not be cross-examined. Many of them could not have kept their secret under that discussion; even in the imperfect and wretched manner, in which cross-examination is managed upon paper, and in those courts. Therefore not a single interrogatory was filed, nor a single witness cross-examined, though produced to articles exceedingly confidential, such as might naturally have excited the curiosity of an adverse party to have made further enquiries.

In the event of this cause, thus treated, thus pleaded, and thus proved, the parties had the singular fortune to catch a judgment against the marriage by mere surprise upon the justice of the court.

While I am obliged to complain of this gross surprise, and to state the very proceedings in the cause as pregnant evidence of their own collusion, I would not be understood to intend any reflection on the integrity or ability of the learned and respectable judges.

*For oft, though wisdom wake, suspicion sleeps
At wisdom's gate, and to simplicity
Resigns her charge; while goodness thinks no ill,
Where no ill seems.*

Nor should any imputation of blame be extended to those names, which your Lordships find subscribed to the pleadings. The forms of pleading are matters of course. And if they were laid before counsel, only to be signed, without calling their attention to the matter of them, the collusion would not appear. A counsel may easily be led to overlook what nobody has any interest or wish that he should consider.

Thus was the way paved to an adulterous marriage; thus was the duke of Kingston drawn in to believe, that Mr. Hervey's claim to the prisoner was a false and injurious pretension; and he gave his unsuspecting hand to a woman, who was then, and had for twenty-five years, been the wife of another.

In the vain and idle conversations which she held, at least with those who knew her situation, she could not refrain from boasting how she had surprised the duke into that marriage. Do not you think (says she with a smile to Mrs. Amis), do not you think, that it was very kind in his grace to marry an old maid? Mrs. Amis was widow of the clergyman who had married her to Mr. Hervey, who had assisted her in procuring a register of that marriage, and to whom she had told of the birth of the child. The duke's kindness, as she insultingly called it, was scarcely more strange, than her manner of representing it to one who knew her real situation so well.

My lords, this is the state of the evidence; which must be given, were it only to satisfy the form of the trial; but is in fact produced, to prove that, which all the world knows perfectly well, as a matter of public notoriety. The subject has been much talked of; but never, I believe, with any manner of doubt, in any company at all conversant with the passages of that time in this town. The witnesses, however, will lay these facts before your lordships; after which, I suppose, there can be no question what judgment must be pronounced upon them: for your lordships will hardly view this act of parliament just in the light in which the prisoner's counsel have thought fit to represent it, as a law made for beggars, not for people of fashion. To be sure, the preamble does not expressly prove the legislature to have foreseen or expected, that these would be the crimes of higher life, or nobler condition. But the act is framed to punish the crime, wherever it might occur; and the impartial temper of your justice, my lords, will not turn aside its course in respect to a noble criminal.

Nor does the guilt of so heinous a fraud seem to be extenuated, by referring to the advice of those by whose aid it was conducted, or to the confident opinion they entertained of the success of their project. I know this project was not (nor did I ever mean to contend it was) all her own. Particularly, in that fraudulent attempt upon public justice, it could not be so. But, my lords, that imparting a criminal purpose to the necessary instruments for carrying it into execution, extenuates the guilt of the author, is a concept perfectly new in morality, and more than I can yield to. It rather implies aggravation, and the additional offence of corrupting these instruments. Not that I mean by this observation to palliate the guilt of such corrupt instruments. I think it may be fit, and exceedingly wholesome, to convey to Dockets-Commons, that those among them, if any such there are, who, being acquainted with the whole extent of the prisoner's purpose, to furnish herself with the false appearance of a single woman in order to draw the duke into such a marriage, assisted her in executing any part of it, are far enough from being clear of the charge contained in this indictment. They are accessaries to her felony; and ought to answer for it accordingly. This is stating her case fairly. The crime was committed by her, and her accomplices. All had their share in the perpetration of the crime: each is stained with the whole of the guilt.

My lords, I proceed to examine the witnesses. The nature of the case shuts out all contradiction or impeachment of testimony. It will be necessary for your lordships to pronounce that opinion and judgment, which so plain a case will demand.

Mr. Solicitor General.

My lords, we will now proceed to call our witnesses.—Call Ann Cradock.

Who came to the bar, and one of the clerks held the book to her, upon which she laid her hand.

Clerk of the Crown. Harken to your oath.

The evidence that you shall give on behalf of our sovereign lord the king's majesty, against Elizabeth duchess-dowager of Kingston, the prisoner at the bar, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth;

So help you God.

Then she kissed the book.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I am desired by the noble lady at the bar to apply to your lordships for an indulgence, that a question may be put to the witness by her counsel.

Lords. Aye, aye.

Mr. Wallace. I shall beg the witness may inform your lordships whether she has not had a security for some provision, or benefit, or a promise, in consequence of the evidence she is to give on this indictment?

Ann Cradock. No.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long have you been acquainted with the lady at the bar?

Ann Cradock. Above thirty-two years.

Mr. Solicitor General. Where did you first become acquainted with her?

Ann Cradock. I saw the lady first in London, afterwards at Lainston.

Mr. Solicitor General. What occasion carried you to the lady at Lainston?

Ann Cradock. Along with a lady that I served.

Mr. Solicitor General. Name the lady.

Ann Cradock. Mrs. Hammer.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was Mrs. Hammer any relation to the lady at the bar?

Ann Cradock. Her own aunt.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was the lady at the bar at Lainston along with Mrs. Hammer?

Ann Cradock. Not when I first went down to Lainston.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did she come down there afterwards?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you remember seeing Mr. Augustus Hervey there at that time?

Ann Cradock. I remember seeing Mr. Augustus Hervey there, but not at the time I first saw the lady there.

Mr. Solicitor General. When did Mr. Hervey come there?

Ann Cradock. It was in June, at the Winchester races.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long did he stay there at that time?

Ann Cradock. I cannot particularly say how long he might stay: he was coming and going.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was you in Lainston church with Mr. Hervey, and that lady, at any time in that summer?

Ann Cradock. I was.

Mr. Solicitor General. At what time of the day?

Ann Cradock. It was towards night: it was at night, not in the day.

Mr. Solicitor General. Upon what occasion?

Ann Cradock. To see the marriage.

Mr. Solicitor General. Name the persons who were present.

Ann Cradock. Mr. Merrill, Mrs. Hammer, Mr. Mountenay, Mr. Hervey, Miss Chudleigh, and myself.

Mr. Solicitor General. Who was the clergyman?

Ann Cradock. Mr. Amis, who belonged to the church.

Mr. Solicitor General. Were they married there?

Ann Cradock. Yes; I saw them married.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was the marriage kept secret?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Mr. Solicitor General. By what ceremony was the marriage?

Ann Cradock. By the matrimonial ceremony; by the Common Prayer Book.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was you employed to take care, that the other servants should be out of the way?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did they return to Mr. Merrill's house after the marriage?

Ann

Ann Cradock. Yes, they did.

Mr. Solicitor General. How far is the church from the houſe?

Ann Cradock. Not a great diſtance, but I cannot ſay how far: it is in the garden.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did Mr. Amis return with the party into the houſe?

Ann Cradock. Not that I ſaw.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you attend on the lady as her maid?

Ann Cradock. I did at that time, her own not being able.

Mr. Solicitor General. After the ceremony, did you ſee the parties in bed together?

Ann Cradock. I did.

A Lord. Repeat what you ſaid.

Ann Cradock. I ſaw them put to bed: I alſo ſaw Mrs. Hanmer inſiſt upon their getting up again.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you ſee them the next morning?

Ann Cradock. I ſaw them that night afterwards in bed, the ſame night after Mrs. Hanmer went to bed.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you ſee them afterwards in bed for ſome nights after that?

Ann Cradock. I ſaw them particularly in bed the laſt night Mr. Hervey was there, for he was to ſet out in the morning at five o'clock; I was to call him at that hour, which I did; and entering the chamber, I found them both faſt aſleep: they were very ſorry to take leave.

Mr. Solicitor General. Can you fix what year this was?

Ann Cradock. I believe it to be in the year 1744, but I am certain it was the ſame year in which the Victory was at Portſmouth.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you recollect what time of the year it was?

Ann Cradock. In the month of Auguſt, I think.

Mr. Solicitor General. What is your reaſon for thinking it was in the month of Auguſt?

Ann Cradock. My reaſon is, that it was in the time of Maunhill fair; and alſo that there were green-gages ripe, which the lady and gentleman were both very fond of.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you recollect how long it was after the death of Mr. Merrill's mother?

Ann Cradock. No, I cannot juſtly ſay.

Mr. Solicitor General. Where did Mr. Hervey go, as you underſtood, the morning he went away?

Ann Cradock. To Portſmouth.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you underſtand that he was then in the ſea ſervice?

Ann Cradock. I did, and that he was going with admiral Davers.

Mr. Solicitor General. Have you any particular reaſon for knowing that he did go with admiral Davers?

Ann Cradock. The reaſon I have to believe he did go with him is, the perſon whom I married afterwards was Mr. Hervey's ſervant.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was he ſervant to him at that time?

Ann Cradock. He was.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you receive any letter from the perſon you afterwards married, who was Mr. Hervey's ſervant, and attended him?

Ann Cradock. I did, from Port-Mahon.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you know what relation Mr. Merrill was to the lady at the bar?

Ann Cradock. Firſt-couſin.

Mr. Solicitor General. Who was Mr. Mountenay, whom you mentioned as preſent at the marriage?

Ann Cradock. A friend of Mr. Merrill's, as he pretended.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did he live in the family at that time?

Ann Cradock. He was in the family at that time, and had been from the time of the death of his mother.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you know whether any other part of the family, of both parties, were acquainted with the marriage, except thoſe perſons whom you have mentioned?

Ann Cradock. No, I did not at that time.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did the lady change her name on the marriage?

Ann Cradock. Never in public, to my knowledge.

Mr. Solicitor General. Had you occaſion after this to ſee the lady in London?

Ann Cradock. I ſaw the lady in London many times.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you know whether there were any children of the marriage?

Ann Cradock. I believe one.

Mr. Solicitor General. What reaſon have you for believing ſo?

Ann Cradock. The lady herſelf told me ſo, and her aunt alſo, whom I ought to have mentioned firſt. The lady told me, that ſhe would take me to ſee the child.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did ſhe offer to carry her aunt as well as you to ſee the child?

Ann Cradock. I do not know that.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long after the marriage was it, that ſhe told you ſhe would take you to ſee the child?

Ann Cradock. That I cannot ſay, but it was after Mr. Hervey returned a ſecond time.

Mr. Solicitor General. Returned, from whence?

Ann Cradock. I heard he had been at Port-Mahon.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you recollect how long Mr. Hervey had been abſent the firſt time?

Ann Cradock. No, I do not.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long had he been abſent the ſecond time?

Ann Cradock. After his return the ſecond time, I believe the child to have been begotten.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long after Mr. Hervey's ſecond return was it, that ſhe told you ſhe would carry you to ſee the child?

Ann Cradock. It was after his firſt return.

A Lord. I believe there is ſome miſtake. Let the witneſs explain that. Mr. Solicitor General. Was it after Mr. Hervey's firſt or ſecond return, that the lady told you ſhe would carry you to ſee the child?

Ann Cradock. I believe the firſt time.

Mr. Solicitor General. Do you recollect how long that was after the marriage?

Ann Cradock. I do not recollect.

Mr. Solicitor General. When did you marry Mr. Hervey's ſervant?

Ann Cradock. The 11th of February 1752.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did the priſoner at the bar ſay any thing particular to you about the child?

Ann Cradock. She told me the child was a boy, and like Mr. Hervey.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long did you continue in the ſervice of Mrs. Hanmer?

Ann Cradock. Till ſhe died.

Mr. Solicitor General. When did Mrs. Hanmer die?

Ann Cradock. She has been dead eleven years the ſecond of laſt December.

Mr. Solicitor General. Had you any occaſion to know what became of the child, whether it lived or died?

Ann Cradock. I know nothing further than what the lady ſaid. When I expected to go to ſee it, the lady came in great grief, and told me it was dead.

Mr. Solicitor General. Have you any reaſon to know at what place the child was born?

Ann Cradock. At Chelſea, by reaſon her mother could not go there.

Mr. Solicitor General. Who informed you that the child was born at Chelſea?

Ann Cradock. Mrs. Hanmer told me this.

Mr. Solicitor General. Have you ever heard it from the priſoner?

Ann Cradock. Yes, I certainly have.

Mr. Solicitor General. She ſaid, her mother could not go there. What do you underſtand to be the reaſon, why Mrs. Chudleigh could not go to Chelſea?

Ann Cradock. By reaſon her huſband and ſon were buried there, as I have been told.

Mr. Solicitor General. Had you any converſation with the priſoner, about the year 1768, about any meſſage to be delivered to the priſoner, that Mr. Hervey had given to you?

Ann Cradock. I had a meſſage from Mr. Hervey, ſignifying to the lady he was determined to be parted from her.

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you deliver that meſſage?

Ann Cradock. Not for ſome time after I received it, not being able.

Mr. Solicitor General. When did you deliver it?

Ann Cradock. On Saturday morning, when the lady came up to me, and told me, that ſhe knew what had been the matter with me. I told her Mr. Hervey deſired me to let her know, that he was determined to be, I ſhould have ſaid divorced, but I ſaid parted; and alſo, that he deſired me to tell the lady, ſhe had it in her own power to aſſiſt him. I delivered the meſſage, and the lady replied, was ſhe to make herſelf a whore to oblige him?

Mr. Solicitor General. Did ſhe appear to be with child before this converſation with you?

Ann Cradock. She did appear ſo to be.

Mr. Solicitor General. What pariſh is Mr. Merrill's houſe in?

Ann Cradock. I believe in St. George's: his houſe at Lainſton is a pariſh of itſelf.

Mr. Solicitor General. Are there any other houſes in the pariſh beſides Mr. Merrill's?

Ann Cradock. Not at Lainſton, there is not.

Mr. Solicitor General. Was there ſervice regularly in Lainſton church, or did the family go to any other church?

Ann Cradock. They went to ſervice at Sparſhot church.

Mr. Solicitor General. My lords, we have no more queſtions to aſk this witneſs at preſent.

Lord High Steward. The counſel for the priſoner are at liberty to aſk the witneſs any queſtions they think proper.

Mr. Wallace. Have you not declared to ſome perſons, that you had an expectation of ſome provision or benefit on the event of this proſecution?

Ann Cradock. I never could declare I had any thing promiſed me by any body.

Mr. Wallace. Expectation of provision from the perſons that proſecute?

Ann Cradock. I never had; I know none of the family.

Mr. Wallace. Where have you lived for this month, or two, or three?

Ann Cradock. I have lived at Mr. Beauwater's.

Mr. Wallace. What is the reaſon of your having your reſidence there?

Ann Cradock. In regard to his lady being a relation to Mr. and Mrs. Bathurſt.

Mr. Wallace. Had your reſidence there any relation to this proſecution?

Ann Cradock. It is unknown to me, if it has.

Mr. Wallace. What have you to do with Mr. Bathurſt?

Ann Cradock. Mrs. Bathurſt is ſo kind as to have me there, as being a ſervant to her aunt from my childhood.

Mr. Wallace. How long have you been at Mr. Beauwater's?

Ann Cradock. I am ſure I cannot juſtly ſay the day when I came there.

Mr. Wallace. How long before this proſecution was commenced?

Ann Cradock. I can't tell when I came there; I can't tell how long I have been there.

Mr. Wallace. I do not mean that you ſhould answer to a day, but according to the beſt of your memory.

Ann Cradock. About four months, I fancy.

Mr. Wallace. Was it before or ſince you appeared before the grand jury?

Ann Cradock. Since I appeared before the grand jury.

Mr. Wallace. Do you know who is the proſecutor of this indictment?

Ann Cradock. Mr. Meadows, I imagine.

Mr. Wallace.

Mr. Wallace. Do you know Mr. Meadows?

Ann Cradock. I have seen him twice or three times in my life, and that is all.

Mr. Wallace. Where?

Ann Cradock. The first time I ever saw him, was at Mr. Beauwater's house, since I came to town.

Mr. Wallace. Are you to stay at Mr. Beauwater's or to return, when this prosecution is over?

Ann Cradock. The last home I had is at Lainston, where I hope I may return again. I went down there in August was a twelvemonth.

Mr. Wallace. Have you never declared to any body, that you had an expectation of some provision from the cause now in hand?

Ann Cradock. I could not declare it, as I had no offers made me from the prosecutor.

Mr. Wallace. Have you declared it?

Ann Cradock. I have just now said, I could not.

Mr. Wallace. Would you be understood, that you have not?

Ann Cradock. What was I to declare?

Mr. Wallace. Whether you have not declared, whether true or false I do not care, that you had an expectation of some provision from this prosecution?

Ann Cradock. I could not declare it, before it was made to me.

Mr. Wallace. You must say, whether you did say so or not.

Ann Cradock. I never had any offer from the prosecution.

Mr. Wallace. Had not you an expectation from the prosecution?

Ann Cradock. No, I could not say that, when they never offered it me.

Mr. Wallace. Do you understand the question generally, or confined to the prosecutor?

Ann Cradock. I think it can be confined to none but himself.

Mr. Wallace. Have you any expectation from any body else?

Ann Cradock. No, none.

Mr. Wallace. Nor ever declared so?

Ann Cradock. No. I never declared that I had any such expectations.

Mr. Wallace. At what time of the night was this marriage?

Ann Cradock. I cannot possibly tell the hour; it was at night.

Mr. Wallace. Have not you mentioned to any body some hour of the night?

Ann Cradock. I do not know that I have mentioned it, any farther than that it was at night.

Mr. Wallace. You have said, that you was employed to keep the servants out of the way at the time; how came you then to go to the church?

Ann Cradock. I was employed to come out of the church after the marriage, and see that the house was clear: after the marriage, and not before.

Mr. Wallace. Was there any care taken before they went to church?

Ann Cradock. No, I do not know that there was. Mr. and Mrs. Merrill dined out that day, and I do not know that any of the house knew that there was to be a marriage.

Mr. Wallace. Are you sure that Mr. and Mrs. Merrill dined out that day?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Mr. Wallace. When did Mrs. Merrill die?

Ann Cradock. I do not know. Mrs. Hanmer it was; there was no Mrs. Merrill at that time.

Mr. Wallace. Then by Mrs. Merrill you meant Mrs. Hanmer, did you?

Ann Cradock. Certainly I did mean Mrs. Hanmer, for there was no Mrs. Merrill.

Mr. Wallace. Was you desired to go to the church?

Ann Cradock. I don't know whether I was desired to go, but there I was; that I recollect.

Mr. Wallace. Did you go as a witness, or out of curiosity?

Ann Cradock. I was there to see the marriage. As to witness, I was not called to be a witness.

Mr. Wallace. Did any of the parties know you was in the church?

Ann Cradock. Those that were in the church knew it.

Mr. Wallace. Did you hear the ceremony performed?

Ann Cradock. I did.

Mr. Wallace. Did you hear the whole ceremony?

Ann Cradock. I believe so: certainly.

Mr. Wallace. Have you not said, you did not hear the ceremony?

Ann Cradock. Not that I know of, and I never was asked, to my knowledge.

Mr. Wallace. Do you speak positively that you have not so declared?

Ann Cradock. Certainly I do, for I know whether I was asked or not.

Mr. Wallace. How long did Mr. Hervey stay there after this marriage?

Ann Cradock. I really cannot say how many days; he was not long there.

Mr. Wallace. You said that Mrs. Hanmer made them get up soon after they went to bed; how long did Mrs. Hanmer sit up after that?

Ann Cradock. I cannot justly say how many hours; I can't say whether it might have been one, or two, or three hours.

Mr. Wallace. Was it Mrs. Hanmer's custom to lock the door where Miss Chudleigh lay?

Ann Cradock. I never knew that she did lock the door at all.

Mr. Wallace. Nor any body by her order?

Ann Cradock. Not to my knowledge: I never knew the door ordered to be locked by any body, nor by myself neither: I am sure I never locked it.

Mr. Wallace. You are sure the door was never locked then, when Mr. Hervey went out, when he was made to get up and leave the room as you have said?

Ann Cradock. Went out where? I don't understand.

Mr. Wallace. You have said, he was made to get up again.

Ann Cradock. To the best of my knowledge, the lady got up too, as well as Mr. Hervey.

Mr. Wallace. And both left the room?

Ann Cradock.

Ann Cradock. I believe they both left the room, I know nothing to the contrary; but I know they afterwards went to bed together.

Mr. Wallace. Have you not declared, you knew nothing of this marriage?

Ann Cradock. No, never in my life, to my knowledge.

Mr. Wallace. That you did not remember any thing about it?

Ann Cradock. It is very odd that I can remember it now, and should not have remembered it before: I ever had it in my memory.

Mr. Wallace. Have not you declared, that you did not remember it?

Ann Cradock. No, not that I know of.

Mr. Wallace. I desire you will give a positive answer, yes or no, whether you have or have not declared it?

Ann Cradock. I never could have declared that which I did not know.

Mr. Wallace. That you did not remember any thing about it?

Ann Cradock. No, I never could say that.

Mr. Wallace. Did you or did you not say so?

Ann Cradock. No, I did not say so.

Lord Buckingham. I beg to put one question to the witness. You know that you speak not only in the presence of this respectable court, but in the presence of Almighty God?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Lord Buckingham. Have you, or have you not, ever declared that you did expect an advantage from the prosecution? Say aye, or no.

Ann Cradock. I must say no: I could not say aye.

Lord Buckingham. You have told us, that Mr. Merrill and Mrs. Hanmer went out to dinner the day on which the marriage was performed; I should be glad to know at what time Mr. Merrill and Mrs. Hanmer returned home?

Ann Cradock. I believe it might be between seven and eight o'clock, as I had given tea out of the housekeeper's room to the gentleman and lady by candle-light.

Lord Buckingham. What day of the month was it?

Ann Cradock. That I cannot tell.

Duke of Grafton. Did you ever see the child, that the lady at the bar offered to carry you to see?

Ann Cradock. No, I never did.

Duke of Grafton. What was the interval of time between the offer to carry you to see the child, and the death of that child?

Ann Cradock. That I cannot justly say neither; but as far as I can remember, the day that I was to go to see the child, the lady came and said it was dead.

Duke of Grafton. Though you cannot exactly recollect the interval between the one transaction and the other, yet still you may speak at large. Was it a week? Was it a month? Was it half a year?

Ann Cradock. It was not a month, nor yet half a year.

Duke of Grafton. Were there a few days interval between the one and the other?

Ann Cradock. There was, but I cannot say how many days.

Duke of Grafton. Did you, in the space of these few days, ever express to the lady at the bar your earnestness and desire to see the child, which you say the lady at the bar told you was so like Mr. Hervey?

Ann Cradock. I expressed my desire at the time, when the lady spoke of the child to her aunt.

Duke of Grafton. What was the answer that you had for not carrying you immediately to the child?

Ann Cradock. The lady told me, she would come on such a day with the princess's coach, and that I should go and see the child.

Duke of Grafton. Was you examined by the Ecclesiastical Court?

Ann Cradock. I was not.

Duke of Grafton. Did you know at the time, that there was such a process going on here?

Ann Cradock. I was told by Mr. Hervey there was.

Duke of Grafton. Did you offer to Mr. Hervey, or to any other of the parties, to give that evidence which you now have proved it was material to give?

Ann Cradock. He told me, he must call upon me to assist him in his marriage.

Duke of Grafton. Did anything else pass relative to the process in Doctors Commons, after Mr. Hervey's conversation with you?

Ann Cradock. Yes, there certainly was, though I never was called.

Duke of Grafton. Did anything pass between Mr. Hervey and you, or between any of the parties and you, after that declaration of Mr. Hervey's to you?

Ann Cradock. I was to acquaint the lady with his intentions.

Duke of Grafton. You said you was to remove the servants out of the way at Mr. Merrill's house at the time of the marriage: how many servants might there be about Mr. Merrill's house at the time of the marriage?

Ann Cradock. The butler; a maid, who waited on Miss Merrill; two house-maids; a laundry-maid: one of the house-maids belonged to Mrs. Hanmer, who always went down along with her, and there was a kitchen-maid.

Duke of Grafton. Were there any lights in the church at the time of the ceremony being performed?

Ann Cradock. There was a wax light in the crown of Mr. Mountenay's hat.

Lord Townsend. Whether she has ever received or been offered any thing to with-hold her evidence relative to the supposed marriage?

Ann Cradock. I never have.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you ever receive any letter, offering you any advantage in case you would appear against the prisoner, before you was subpoena'd at Hick's Hall?

Ann Cradock. I received a letter from a friend, wherein I was told, that a gentleman of their acquaintance would get me a fine-cure, but on what account I knew not.

Lord Hillsborough. A gentleman of whose acquaintance?

Ann Cradock. I do not know who the gentleman was; it never was explained to me who the gentleman was; nor I never asked.

Lord Hillsborough. Who was the friend who wrote that letter to you?

Ann Cradock. Mr. Fozard, of Piccadilly.

Lord Hillsborough. What answer did you make to that letter?

Ann Cradock. I made no answer any further, but that it was very kind in any body that would assist me in getting me any thing?

Lord Hillsborough. Who is Mr. Fozard?

Ann Cradock. A person that lives near Hyde-park-Corner, and keeps livery-stables.

Lord Hillsborough. You say he wrote you word, that some of their friends would get you a fine-cure?

Ann Cradock. I said, a gentleman of their acquaintance.

Lord Hillsborough. Of whose acquaintance?

Ann Cradock. Mr. Fozard's.

Lord Hillsborough. Upon what account did you conceive or understand that he was to get you a fine-cure?

Ann Cradock. That I cannot tell.

Lord Hillsborough. What have you done with the letter?

Ann Cradock. I do not know where the letter is; I know I have it not.

Lord Hillsborough. Will you take upon you to say, that there was not in that letter an expression intimating, that if you would appear against the prisoner at the bar, a fine-cure would be gotten for you?

Ann Cradock. I certainly do say, there was no such expression in the letter; only a friend of theirs, or a gentleman of their acquaintance, I do not know which, would get me a fine-cure.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you, or did you not, by virtue of your oath, understand that that was to be the consequence of your appearing against the prisoner at the bar?

Ann Cradock. I did not know that that was to be the consequence of my appearing. I had no room to imagine so, because I know not the person of the prosecutor, nor none of his family.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you advise with any body concerning what you should do with regard to that letter?

Ann Cradock. I certainly did apply to a friend, and acquainted him I had received such a letter.

Lord Hillsborough. What did you write to your friend?

Ann Cradock. I never writ to any friend; I applied to a friend, and shewed the letter.

Lord Hillsborough. Whether you did not ask advice from some body, what you should do with regard to that letter?

Ann Cradock. I did not ask any body what I was to do with it; I received it.

Lord Hillsborough. What did you consult that friend about?

Ann Cradock. To let him know I had received such a letter; but I did not know what it might be upon, or what it might not.

Lord Hillsborough. Did he read the letter?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Lord Hillsborough. What conversation passed between you and him on the subject of the letter?

Ann Cradock. I told him, I did not know what it might be from, but that I apprehended it might be something concerning my being called upon in point of the lady. I think I told him, that I had once been told, that I might have the same settled upon me as the lady promised me when I went into the country.

Lord Hillsborough. What reason had you for thinking so?

Ann Cradock. The reason I had for thinking so, was, because I had been told once, that I might have the same given me that the lady at the bar offered me, when I was to go into the country, if I would speak the truth; but by whom I know not: I never asked the question.

Lord Hillsborough. I desire to know, what you did with that letter, whether you put it into the hands of the person whom you consulted?

Ann Cradock. I put it into no one's hands; the person had the letter I consulted.

Lord Hillsborough. You put it into that person's hand to read it?

Ann Cradock. I gave the letter into that person's hand to read it, and told him, he might shew it to Mr. Hervey, if he would.

Lord Hillsborough. For what purpose did you desire it might be shewn to Mr. Hervey?

Ann Cradock. For this purpose, believing it might be against him and the lady; but by whom I know not, for I never asked the question, who it was that was to give it.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you desire your friend to shew it to the prisoner at the bar?

Ann Cradock. That was impossible, for the lady was not in England.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you then desire him to shew it to any body on her part?

Ann Cradock. I should look upon it, if it was shewn to Mr. Hervey, it would be on her part, as being man and wife.

Lord Hillsborough. Whether you desired it to be shewn to any body else?

Ann Cradock. No, not besides Mr. Hervey.

ADJOURNED.

Saturday, April 20.

ANN CRADOCK.

Continuation of her examination.

Lord Hillsborough. I WAS exceedingly glad the house was adjourned, but I would much rather it had been adjourned sooner, because I now lie under a good deal of difficulty to resume the thread of those questions, that for my own information, and for that of the house, I thought highly proper and necessary to be explicitly and exactly answered. My lords, I think the last question that I put to the witness at the bar, was, whether she had put that letter, which she said was signed by Fozard, into the hand of any other person? If I do not mistake, my lords, she said, she had put it into the hand of a friend of hers to read. Upon asking her, whether she had any other intention than that of putting the letter into his hand? I think she said, she told the person he might shew the letter to Mr. Hervey, as she apprehended it related to him. Now I desire to ask the evidence at the bar, whether she knows, that her friend did shew that letter to Mr. Hervey or not?

Ann Cradock. My friend did shew it to Mr. Hervey.

Lord Hillsborough. Did your friend tell you what Mr. Hervey said concerning the letter?

Ann Cradock. My friend told me, that he desired I should keep the letter.

Lord Hillsborough. Do you mean Mr. Hervey or the friend desired you to keep the letter?

Ann Cradock. I mean, the answer, that was given upon the letter being shewn, was brought by my friend, and Mr. Hervey desired me to keep the letter.

Lord Hillsborough. Did your friend, who carried the letter from you to Mr. Hervey, say any thing more to you, than that Mr. Hervey desired you should keep the letter?

Ann Cradock. He told me that I should acquaint the lady that was abroad with it.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you acquaint the lady that was abroad with it?

Ann Cradock. I had it not in my power so to do.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you acquaint any body else with it?

Ann Cradock. I did several of my acquaintance.

Lord Hillsborough. In particular, did you acquaint any body that was concerned in business for the lady?

Ann Cradock. No.

Lord Hillsborough. I desire to know, whether you did by yourself, or by any body else for you, make any answer whatever to the letter to Mr. Fozard?

Ann Cradock. I went to Mr. Fozard when I received the letter, as in the letter it was required to know my age, and where I was born.

Lord Hillsborough. I desire you will inform their lordships of the whole of what passed between Mr. Fozard and you at that interview?

Ann Cradock. Nothing in particular, further than relating to where I was born, and my age; my age I did not know. I did not ask who was to give me the fine-cure.

Lord Hillsborough. Did you not think it extraordinary, that Mr. Fozard should enquire of you your age, and where you was born?

Ann Cradock. I certainly did think it extraordinary.

Lord Hillsborough. Whether you did not ask the meaning of it?

Ann Cradock. I did not ask any meaning for it.

Lord Derby. You said yesterday, that you did expect to receive something adequate to what you had received from the prisoner at the bar: what did you formerly receive from the prisoner at the bar?

Ann Cradock. Many favours in friendship, but not any thing in particular.

Lord Derby. What was you offered by the lady?

Ann Cradock. Twenty guineas a-year, to go and settle in the country, and the choice of three different counties.

Lord Derby. At what time was that offer made to you?

Ann Cradock. The time I cannot justly remember.

Lord Derby. Recollect; how many years was it ago?

Ann Cradock. I believe it may be three years ago, or four, I am not certain.

Lord Derby. What was your answer to that proposal?

Ann Cradock. It made me very unhappy to think that I was to be banished, but I consented to go into Yorkshire.

Lord Derby. What were the counties that were proposed to you?

Ann Cradock. Yorkshire, Derbyshire, I think, and Northumberland.

Lord Derby. In consequence of that consent to go into Yorkshire, did you go into Yorkshire?

Ann Cradock. No, I did not; I went to Thoresby: I tried, but I could go no further.

Lord Derby. What was the reason that you could go no further?

Ann Cradock. From being unhappy, and going from all my friends.

Lord Derby. Did you receive any sum of money in consequence of going as far as Thoresby?

Ann Cradock. None, no further than was to carry me to the place where I said I was to go.

Lord Derby. You mentioned an annuity of twenty guineas a-year; has that annuity been paid, or have you received any part of it since that agreement?

Ann Cradock. No.

Lord Coventry. You said you was present at the marriage in 1744: I desire to know whether you have ever communicated that information to any person till this year, and to whom?

Ann Cradock. I have several times to many, but to particular persons I cannot speak.

Lord Derby. I should be glad to know whether you do understand, or do not understand, that any sum or sums were ever paid to any person for your subsistence and board, on the part of the prisoner at the bar?

Ann Cradock. No, I do not know that ever any sum was paid upon my account.

Lord Buckingham. I desire to ask the witness, whether she at any time did receive any present whatever from the prisoner at the bar?

Ann Cradock. Several in point of friendship.

Lord Townshend. Was you ever offered any sum of money at any time, to conceal any evidence?

Ann Cradock. No.

Lord Townshend. By either side?

Ann Cradock. No.

Lord Camden. I desire to know whether you saw the lady at Thoresby in the way to Yorkshire?

Ann Cradock. I was in the lady's house, and saw her several times.

Lord Camden. In any of those interviews, did any thing pass respecting the annuity of twenty guineas a-year, and the journey you was then making to Yorkſhire?

Ann Cradock. No, not any thing in particular as to that.

Lord Camden. What was the reaſon of your return from Thoreſby, and not going to your journey's end?

Ann Cradock. My reaſon was, from my ill ſtate of health, and unhappineſs of mind.

Lord Lyttelton. Did the lady explain to you what were her motives for ſending you, or, as you called it, banifhing you, into thoſe diſtant counties?

Ann Cradock. No, my lords.

Lord Derby. What did you apprehend to be the lady's motives for ſuch a propoſal?

Ann Cradock. That I was ever at a loſs to know, becauſe I never aſked.

Duke of Ancaſter. Did you conſult a friend on account of the ſubſtance of Mr. Foxard's letter?

Ann Cradock. I did.

Duke of Ancaſter. I deſire you to tell the houſe, who that friend was?

Ann Cradock. My friend was Dr. Hoffack, who is phyſician of Greenwich hoſpital.

Duke of Ancaſter. What is become of that letter, or have you it?

Ann Cradock. I have it not; but it is in my box, I believe, at Lainſton, as I carried it with me, when I went there with my other things.

Duke of Richmond. Was not the marriage to be kept a ſecret?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Duke of Richmond. If during the time the marriage was to be kept a ſecret, any perſon had aſked you about the marriage, would you have owned it, or denied it?

Ann Cradock. I never from the time divulged the ſecret, until it had been told before.

Duke of Richmond. Did no perſon, during the time it was a ſecret, ever aſk you if you knew it?

Ann Cradock. Several have aſked me, but I have always replied, no.

Lord Preſident. Do you not know, that your huſband was examined in the Spiritual Court, in the cauſe of jaſtitation?

Ann Cradock. I know he was called upon in the court, but what paſſed I am an utter ſtranger to, as I never aſked.

Lord Preſident. Had not Mr. Hervey intimated to you, that you was to be called upon on that occaſion?

Ann Cradock. He did.

Lord Preſident. After that did you hear any thing from Mr. Hervey, reſpecting your attendance in that cauſe?

Ann Cradock. Mr. Hervey told me, he muſt call upon me to aſſiſt him in the marriage, and to ſwear to Mrs. Hanmer's hand-writing.

Lord Preſident. Was you ever called upon that occaſion?

Ann Cradock. I was not.

Lord Derby. Did you live with Mrs. Hanmer until the time of her death?

Ann Cradock. I did.

Lord Derby. Which happened eleven years ago the ſecond of laſt Decem-ber?

Ann Cradock. Yes.

Lord Derby. Upon what have you ſubſiſted ſince that time?

Ann Cradock. Mrs. Hanmer left me two hundred pounds; one was taken up, the other was left: I quitted the lady's houſe, and went to Newington. I ſhould have told you that the two hundred pounds were in this lady's hands [pointing to the ducheſs]; one was taken up, and the other, with my huſband's income, ſupported me whiſt he lived.

Lord Derby. How do you know that that two hundred pounds was left you by Mrs. Hanmer?

Ann Cradock. It was left me in her will.

Duke of Ancaſter. Do you of your own knowledge aſſert that there was a child?

Ann Cradock. I do aſſert I was told ſo. I never ſaw the child.

Duke of Ancaſter. Who told you ſo?

Ann Cradock. Mrs. Hanmer told me ſo, and the lady told me at our return out of the country.

Duke of Ancaſter. Who told you there was a child?

Ann Cradock. This lady at the bar told me ſo herſelf. Both told me ſo.

Duke of Ancaſter. Do you from your own knowledge aſſert, that that child is dead?

Ann Cradock. The lady at the bar told me it was dead, as ſhe told me before ſhe would take me to ſee it.

Duke of Ancaſter. Did the lady at the bar bring the princeſs of Wales's coach, and carry you to ſee the child at Chelſea?

Ann Cradock. The lady told me ſhe would come in the princeſs's coach, and carry me to ſee the child.

Lord Radnor. How old do you apprehend the child was at the time of its death?

Ann Cradock. That I can give no account of: it was very young; but the age I know not.

Lord Radnor. Weeks, months, or years?

Ann Cradock. Months, but not years.

Lord Radnor. Did you ever hear that the child was baptized?

Ann Cradock. I did hear that the child was baptized; but Mrs. Hanmer and I were in the country at that time.

Lord Radnor. Did you ever hear what the child's name was?

Ann Cradock. No, I cannot recollect that I did.

Lord Radnor. Did you ever hear where the child was buried?

Ann Cradock. I did hear that it was buried at Chelſea.

Lord Radnor. Who told you ſo?

Ann Cradock. The lady at the bar told me ſo herſelf one day, when I was aſcending in the coach with her that way.

Lord Portſmouth. How have you ſubſiſted ſince your huſband's death?

Ann Cradock. With what I made of my furniture which was in my houſe, which was all new.

Lord Portſmouth. How long is it ſince your huſband died?

Ann Cradock. Five years laſt March.

Ordered to withdraw.

Lord High Steward. Who do you call next, Mr. Solicitor-General?
Solicitor-General. We deſire to call

Mr. CÆſar Hawkins, who was ſworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. Mr. Hawkins, are you acquainted with the lady at the bar? and how long have you been ſo?

Mr. Hawkins. A great many years: I believe above thirty.

Mr. Dunning. Are you acquainted with the preſent Lord Briſtol? and how long have you been ſo?

Mr. Hawkins. I have had the honour of knowing the earl of Briſtol nearly as many years.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know of any intercourſe between my lord Briſtol and the lady at the bar?

Mr. Hawkins. Of an intercourſe certainly; of acquaintance undoubtedly.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know from the parties of any marriage between them?

Mr. Hawkins. I do not know how far any thing that has come before me in a confidential truſt in my profeſſion ſhould be diſcloſed, conſiſtent with my profeſſional honour. [Queſtion and Answer repeated.]

Mr. Dunning. I truſt your lordſhips will ſee nothing in my queſtion, that can betray confidential truſt, or diſhonour Mr. Hawkins in giving it. My queſtion is ſimply, whether Mr. Hawkins knows, from the parties, of any marriage between them?

Lord High Steward. The queſtion that was aſked by the counſel at the bar, is, 'Whether the witneſs knew, from any information of either of the two parties, that they were married?' The witneſs objects to it, whether he is to answer any queſtions that are inconſiſtent with his profeſſional honour. Your lordſhips are to determine, whether the queſtion put by the counſel at the bar ſhall be aſked?

Lord Maſfield. I ſuppoſe Mr. Hawkins means to demur to the queſtion upon the ground, that it came to his knowledge ſome way from his being employed as a ſurgeon for one or both of the parties; and I take for granted, if Mr. Hawkins underſtands that it is your lordſhips opinion, that he has no privilege on that account to excuſe himſelf from giving the answer, that then, under the authority of your lordſhips judgment, he will ſubmit to answer it: therefore, to ſave your lordſhips the trouble of an adjournment, if no lord differs in opinion, but thinks that a ſurgeon has no privilege to avoid giving evidence in a court of juſtice, but is bound by the law of the land to do it; [if any of your lordſhips think he has ſuch a privilege, it will be a matter to be debated elſewhere, but] if all your lordſhips acquieſce, Mr. Hawkins will underſtand, that it is your judgment and opinion, that a ſurgeon has no privilege, where it is a material queſtion, in a civil or criminal cauſe, to know whether parties were married, or whether a child was born, to ſay, that his introduction to the parties was in the courſe of his profeſſion, and in that way he came to the knowledge of it. I take it for granted, that if Mr. Hawkins underſtands that, it is a ſatisfaction to him, and a clear juſtification to all the world. If a ſurgeon was voluntarily to reveal theſe ſecrets, to be ſure he would be guilty of a breach of honour, and of great indiſcretion; but, to give that information in a court of juſtice, which by the law of the land he is bound to do, will never be imputed to him as any indiſcretion whatever.

Mr. Dunning. My queſtion is, Whether you knew from either of the parties, that there was a marriage between them?

Mr. Hawkins. From the converſation with both parties I apprehended there was a marriage, but nothing in proof appeared before me: I mean nothing as legal proof, but converſation.

Mr. Dunning. But did they in converſation admit, that they were man and wife? and is that the ground upon which you form that apprehenſion?

Mr. Hawkins. Yes, it is; they did admit it in converſation.

Mr. Dunning. Do you, or do you not, know that a child was the fruit of that marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. Yes, I do.

Mr. Dunning. Can you tell their lordſhips, about what time that child was born? and where?

Mr. Hawkins. About the time I cannot tell. If I ever put down any thing in writing at the time, I might have deſtroyed it afterwards, according to my cuſtom, which is to deſtroy papers that are of no uſe, and which might be improper to be found after my deceaſe.

Mr. Dunning. Inform their lordſhips about what time this might be, as near as your memory will enable you to do.

Mr. Hawkins. I ſhould ſuppoſe it was about thirty years ago; but I do proteſt I do not know.

Mr. Dunning. Where was this child born?

Mr. Hawkins. At Chelſea, near to Chelſea-College; but I forget the name of the ſtreet.

Mr. Dunning. Was this marriage, and the birth of that child, at that time kept a ſecret?

Mr. Hawkins. I was told it was to be a ſecret.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know what is ſince become of that child?

Mr. Hawkins. I believe it died in a little time afterwards.

Mr. Dunning. By your answer, that you underſtood it was to be kept a ſecret, did you mean the marriage, or the birth of the child, or both?

Mr. Hawkins. Both.

Mr. Dunning. Which of the parties can you recollect it was, Mr. Hervey or Miſs Chudleigh, that deſired this might be kept a ſecret? or both?

Mr. Hawkins. I ſhould take for granted both equally.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know enough of the then Mr. Hervey's motions to be able to inform their lordſhips, whether this child was born after his firſt or ſecond return from ſea, ſubſequent to the marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. No, I do not know enough of his motions to answer this queſtion.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know what age this child had attained before its death?

Mr. Haw-

Mr. Hawkins. I protest I do not remember now.

Mr. Dunning. Can you recollect about what time of the year it was you first heard this child was born, and about what time of the year you heard it died?

Mr. Hawkins. I do not know; I might hear of the death immediately.

Mr. Dunning. Did you ever attend the child in the course of your profession?

Mr. Hawkins. I did once: I am not sure whether I did not attend more, but I remember I attended it once.

Mr. Dunning. Do you remember whether your recollection of this transaction was, or was not, helped about the time of the commencement of the suit in the Spiritual Court?

Mr. Hawkins. Really I do not know any thing that passed to bring it to my mind then.

Mr. Dunning. Was you, or was you not, applied to by either of the parties, or both, at the time of the commencing this suit in the Spiritual Court?

Mr. Hawkins. I was applied to by the earl of Bristol.

Mr. Dunning. Will you be so good as to tell what was the purport of lord Bristol's then application to you?

Mr. Wallace. On the part of the noble lady, I must submit to your lordships, that nothing said in the absence of the lady is evidence against the prisoner at the bar.

Mr. Dunning. I will put the question in a way that it shall be liable to no objection. Did you, or did you not, in consequence of lord Bristol's application, apply to the lady at the bar?

Mr. Hawkins. I did.

Mr. Dunning. Then tell us, what was the purport of lord Bristol's application to you, and what message you carried from lord Bristol to the lady at the bar?

Mr. Hawkins. To the best of my remembrance, the earl of Bristol met me in the street, and stopped me, telling me that he should be glad I would call on him at his house the first morning I had half an hour to spare; and that if I could then fix the time, he would take care to be in the way, and that no other company should interrupt the conversation. He intimated that it was not on account of his own health, but on account of an old friend of mine. I named the time, and went to him. I found his lordship expecting me. Upon a table, at a little distance from his right hand, there lay two or three bundles of papers, folded up as these papers are (taking up some papers at the bar): to these papers he often pointed in course of what he said afterwards. After making some polite apologies to me for the particular trouble he was then giving me, he told me it was on the present duchess of Kingston's account: that he wished me to carry her a message upon a subject that was very disagreeable, but that he thought it would be less shocking to be carried by, and received from, a person she knew, than from any stranger: that he had been for some time past very unhappy on account of his matrimonial connections with the duchess, Miss Chudleigh that was then: that he wished to have his freedom; which the criminality of her conduct, and the proofs which he had of it (which, in pointing to the papers I before mentioned, he said he had for some time past, with intent and purpose to procure a divorce, been collecting and getting together): that he believed they contained the most ample and abundant proofs, circumstances, and every thing relative to such proof: that he intended to pursue his prosecution with the strictest firmness and resolution; but that he retained such a regard and respect for her, and as a gentleman to his own character, that he wished not to mix malice or ill temper in the course of it; but that in every respect he would wish to appear and act on the line of a man of honour and of a gentleman: that he wished (he said) she would understand that his soliciting me to carry the message, should be received by her as a mark of that disposition: that as most probably in the number of so many testimonial depositions as were there collected, there might be many offensive circumstances named, superfluous to the necessary legal proofs, that if she pleased I might inform her, that her lawyers, either with or without herself, might, in conjunction with his lawyers, look over all the depositions, and that if any parts were found tending to indecent or scandalous reflections, which his gentlemen of the law should think might be omitted without weakening his cause, he himself should have no objection to it: that as he intended only to act upon the principles of a gentleman and a man of honour, he should hope she would not produce any unnecessary or vexatious delays to the suit, or enhance the expences of it, as he did not intend to prosecute to gain by any demands of damages, I think, or to that purpose. I delivered this message to the duchess as well as I could. I do not presume now, that either the precise words, or the identity of the words and expressions can be recollected by me, but it was to the purport, as near as possibly I can remember, of what I have said.

Mr. Dunning. Will you recollect, whether upon this conversation any distinct proposition was stated to the duchess which required an answer? or, what answer you carried back from the duchess for that purpose? You will of course be referring yourself to what passed between you and the duchess.

Mr. Hawkins. I delivered my message to the duchess. After a little time taken for consideration, I do not recollect exactly what her grace desired me to report to the earl of Bristol; but it was to this effect: that she was obliged to him for the polite parts of his message, but, as to the subject of the divorce, she should cut that short by wishing him to understand, that she did not acknowledge him for her legal husband, and should put him to the defiance of such proof: that she had then already, or should immediately, institute a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, which she called, I think, a judicium de matrimonio; but, as he had promised before, that he would act upon the line of a man of honour and a gentleman in his own intended suit, she hoped that he would pursue the same line now, and that he would confine himself to the proof of legal marriage only, and not to other proofs of connections or cohabitations: if he did, that he would make it a process of no long delay, and that either he would gain an equal freedom to himself by a sentence of that court, declaring them to be free, or he would the sooner be able to institute his own intended suit.——The earl of Bristol received my message as one affected and struck by it, making no reply or answer for two or three minutes; then, not speaking to me, but rather seeming to express his own thoughts aloud in short sentences, that he did not conceive he should have his equal freedom by that method. I believe I should have mentioned, that her grace desired, in part of her message, that nothing might be brought forwards, which might be the subject of useless conversation and scandal. He said, in reply, that he was no more inclined to bring forward any thing for the lovers of scandalous conversation only, than she could be; and that, if he could not establish the proof of legal matrimony (I do not remember the words, but to the sense of this) that he was too much a gentleman to bring any thing before the publick relative to other connections with the lady. I do not remember that any thing material passed, or more than this.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect that in any subsequent conversation with the lady, you was desired to apply to the gentleman for any other civility in the course of this cause?

Mr. Hawkins. Before the first attendance that I have lately alluded to in illness, Mrs. Chudleigh, her mother, did us the honour of a private family friendship. After these messages, her grace now and then called on my wife in an evening, frequently saying, she was passing to or from her law gentlemen. When I happened to see her grace, I every now and then asked how her suit went on? to which, I think, she always seemed to answer cheerfully, 'Very right,' and 'Well.'

Mr. Dunning. Did you ever carry any other messages?

Mr. Hawkins. Two or three times, I cannot recollect which, she asked me to deliver some message to the earl of Bristol; I am not sure whether one was not a letter, or whether upon the occasion of her asking me to deliver something, for my own memory I might not ask her to write it down, but I really do not remember at present, though I have endeavoured to recollect what the subject of these messages were: but I know they were of very trifling import, nothing that could have struck me strongly, or I should have remembered them; and I understood they were rather given to me, as if the earl of Bristol was delicate in receiving any message from her grace, and that I was only to expect a verbal answer on that account.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect, whether any of these messages related to any witness or witnesses to be produced or kept back?

Mr. Hawkins. Certainly not; I never had a supposition, that the duchess would have given me such a message. Nothing appeared to me, but what contained matter of little import, and of the most honourable kind.

Mr. Dunning. Did you ever observe, or do you now recollect, any ground to form a belief, whether the parties had forgotten or remembered, that there was then living one of the witnesses to the fact of the marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. I profess I do not recollect that: I have heard it in common conversation in the town, but not that ever I remember from either him or her at that time.

Mr. Dunning. At what time did you receive that report from him or her?

Mr. Hawkins. I think I have seen the earl of Bristol but once since the commencement of this prosecution, and then his lordship seemed rather to speak peevishly.

Lord Mansfield. They will not examine to what lord Bristol has said since the commencement of the prosecution?

Mr. Dunning. Was any thing, that my lord Bristol said on that subject, communicated to the lady?

Mr. Hawkins. I certainly might, and did, I believe, tell her grace what was said.

Lord Mansfield. Then you may go on.

Mr. Dunning. Then tell the house what lord Bristol said, and you repeated to the lady.

Mr. Hawkins. His lordship seemed to be peevish, that such a person was now brought forward, and as he had heard it supposed, I believe, for want of her having such allowance or such care taken of her by the duchess, as he supposed she used to have. If I understood him right, the earl of Bristol said, this person had been with him to express things to that purpose; and said, that if she had been as easy to come at, or had had as good a memory when that cause was carried on in the Ecclesiastical Court, that he believed the issue of it would have been different.

Mr. Dunning. Will you be so good as to recollect, whether you communicated this to the lady, and what passed upon that occasion?

Mr. Hawkins. I did communicate it to the duchess; and I thought she was rather out of temper with the message, or with me, she calling at my house at a time I was very much in haste to go out upon business, and could not give her grace that time to hear, what she seemed to wish to have to talk more upon it. She offered to come again, but I was then not well in my health at all, and perhaps, as she might think, not quite so civil, would not name another time with her grace for her to call upon me, but said, that I would take an opportunity, as soon as I was able, of waiting upon her grace at her own house. I did do this some time after, and was told at the door, that her grace was not at home. I left my name, and said I should call again. After some days interval I did so, and then was told, that her grace was at home, but was laid down to sleep, from whence I concluded, that I was not to call again.

Mr. Dunning. Am I to understand from you, that this last message from my lord Bristol was never the conversation between you and the duchess?

Mr. Hawkins. I did relate it to her during the time that she was at my house.

Mr. Dur-

Mr. Dunning. Have you at any time since heard any thing from the duchess on that subject?

Mr. Hawkins. I did hear, but not from any good authority, that her grace was rather angry.

Mr. Dunning. Has the lady never conversed with you on the subject of this living witness to the marriage, from that time to this?

Mr. Hawkins. I have never seen her grace but once since, and that was yesterday morning for a few minutes at the duke of Newcastle's.

Mr. Dunning. Generally, at any time whatever, have you heard any thing from the duchess on the subject of this living witness to the marriage, where she was, or any thing concerning her?

Mr. Hawkins. I protest, nothing conclusive. I might hear there was such a person, but it was never related to me, whether she was a better or worse evidence; nothing relative to that, whether she was a better or worse evidence, or that she was afraid of her, or any thing to that purpose.

Mr. Dunning. Am I to understand you to have heard her say, that there was such a witness?

Mr. Hawkins. In what looser conversation I cannot tell, but nothing that ever made me know, that there was such a person, who had such material knowledge.

Mr. Dunning. I understand you, that from lord Bristol you understood there was a surviving witness to the marriage. My question is, whether you ever learnt the same thing from the lady, or not?

Mr. Hawkins. If it was, it was some accidental looser conversation, not as trusting me with such a knowledge.

Mr. Dunning. Was it then mentioned in any looser or accidental conversation, or any conversation?

Mr. Hawkins. I protest, it is impossible to remember that with any degree of precision or of use.

Mr. Dunning. I did not mean to ask you to recollect any particulars of the conversation, but simply to the point, whether the duchess ever stated to you, or acknowledged, there was a living witness to the marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. No, I do not remember that she ever stated to me, or said, that there was a living witness to the marriage.

Mr. Dunning. Is it a fact that ever you learned from the lady?

Lord DERBY moved the clerk might read this part of the evidence.

Mr. Hawkins. I rather (if I may say any thing) understood from her grace, that there was some looser marriage, not quite in the common manner. I think I could remember an expression of her grace's once, upon her grace's speaking on the occasion. If I remember, I asked her grace how her suit went on? This was towards the latter part of it. She looked grave, and desired to speak to me in another room. She said, that she had had a great deal of concern and agitation of mind since she last saw me, which I remarked to her had been for a longer interval of time on her not calling at the house upon my wife in the usual manner. Her grace said, that she had had so much concern upon what she had not expected at the commencement of her suit, from finding that a positive oath was expected from her grace that she was not married, and which she had for some time together apprehended would be put to her in that form, that she thought she should have dropped her suit entirely, for that she would not for the whole world have taken that direct kind of positive oath; but that what had been offered to her, had been so complicated (I think, I understood) with other things that were certainly not true, that she could and had taken the oath with a very safe conscience. To some questions, I do not remember the words to her grace from me, how then she came to institute a suit at all? She answered me, 'O, for that matter (I think it was) the ceremony as done, was such a scrambling shabby business (I do not say these were the precise words, but to that purport) and so much incomplete, that she should have been full as unwilling to have taken a positive oath that she was married, as that she was not married.'

N. B. This part of the evidence was ordered to be read by the clerk, who accordingly read it.

Mr. Dunning. I should be glad, if you would tell their lordships, what it was that was so particular in this business? if the lady ever explained it to you?

Mr. Hawkins. I never had an explanation from that moment. I had within myself a curiosity from the time that I carried the message to my lord Bristol from her grace, and his reception of it. I had rather imagined that there was some marriage of which legal proofs could not be produced, but that was only my own notion: before that time I had no real authority at all; I did not know myself honestly what to think of it.

Mr. Dunning. Did the lady ever explain to you, by what reason it happened, that the question, when it came to be put, came in so much more palatable a form than she expected it?

Mr. Hawkins. No, not in the least: I should not have presumed to have asked such a question; nor did she give me any explanation at all.

Mr. Dunning. Was any thing ever said by lord Bristol, and communicated to the lady, respecting an intention of his to appeal from this sentence?

Mr. Hawkins. I know nothing of that.

Mr. Dunning. What said her grace on that subject?

Mr. Hawkins. Her grace had told me, that the sentence was passed, and that it was irrevocable and final to them two, unless my lord Bristol, within a certain limited time, did something to keep the cause open. I do not know what that was. That there was, she believed, some demur at that time, as my lord Bristol was not satisfied with the sentence, and had made some demand by his proctor, if I understood right, for the costs of suit which were decreed, I believe, against him.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know whether the costs of suit were ever paid by my lord Bristol?

Mr. Hawkins. I do not, but I believe they were. I was going on to say what I recollected upon that. They had some demurs upon the costs of suit; but that if my lord Bristol insisted upon it, she would give her proctor directions not to let such a thing stop the closing of the suit.

Mr. Dunning. Do you then know whether my lord Bristol, who by the terms of the sentence was to pay the costs, did not, upon this, receive the costs he had been put to in the suit?

Mr. Hawkins. I know nothing more than I have mentioned: not a little more nor less.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know of no other means that were used to satisfy my lord Bristol, and to prevent this cause from continuing any longer open?

Mr. Hawkins. No.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know nothing of any bond that was given from any body to any body, respecting this cause and this question?

Mr. Hawkins. Not the least in the world.

Mr. Dunning. Am I to understand, that you say you know nothing of any bond that has any direct, immediate, or other relation to this subject?

Mr. Hawkins. Not the least that ever I heard of.

Mr. Dunning. You are not then a trustee in any such bond?

Mr. Hawkins. Oh no, certainly not.

Mr. Dunning. Can you give us the date of the time when the first message was conveyed from lord Bristol to the lady through you?

Mr. Hawkins. I was endeavouring, before I came into the court, to recollect it, but I could not: I put nothing down in writing relative to it.

Mr. Dunning. Can you recollect the year?

Mr. Hawkins. The message must have been immediately before the commencement of the suit, whenever that was.

Mr. Dunning. I presume, though you used the terms, her grace, and his lordship, you perfectly well understood, that neither of the parties had a right to these appellations at the time these circumstances passed?

Mr. Hawkins. Yes, certainly.

Mr. Dunning. Does any circumstance impress you with the recollection of the time of the year when this conversation passed, if you cannot tell us the exact year?

Mr. Hawkins. I might have enquired how long the suit lasted; but I protest I do not recollect now any particular circumstances to bring it to my mind.

Mr. Wallcut. My lords, I have no question on the part of the prisoner to put to Mr. Hawkins.

Duke of Ancafter. Did you attend the child?

Mr. Hawkins. I think once.

Duke of Ancafter. Was it a boy or a girl?

Mr. Hawkins. A boy.

Duke of Ancafter. Do you speak from your own knowledge that the child is dead?

Mr. Hawkins. No; but have no reasons to doubt it.

Duke of Ancafter. Do you know of your own knowledge, that that child was the child of the prisoner at the bar?

Mr. Hawkins. No, I could have no proof of that; for from the time that her grace was brought-to-bed of it, I never saw the child till I was sent for to it in its illness; perhaps I had hardly ever heard of it: I had never seen it.

Duke of Ancafter. Did you attend the duchess at the time she lay-in?

Mr. Hawkins. I did not at her lying-in: I was desired, in case at any future time it had been necessary, that I should have been a witness of the birth of that child.

Duke of Ancafter. Did you understand that child to be the legitimate child of the duchess of Kingston and Mr. Hervey?

Mr. Hawkins. I did suppose so at that time.

Duke of Ancafter. Was you told so by any body?

Mr. Hawkins. I could not be necessarily told so at that time, because I had been told of the marriage before.

Duke of Grafton. Was you, from the conversation that passed with the party at that time, convinced that it was a supposed, or that it was a real marriage; and were any expressions used relative to the concealing the birth of the child?

Mr. Hawkins. I understood at that time, that it was a real marriage.

Duke of Grafton. Were there expressions made use of, that would not have been made use of in any other circumstance?

Mr. Hawkins. I do not remember any particular expression at all, only that I was desired to attend, with a view and purpose that I might be a witness to the birth of that child; being, as I suppose, thought more proper, as a physical man, to be in the room at the time of a delivery and the birth of a child than any other person.

Lord Lyttelton. Who first informed you of the marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. I should rather apprehend it came from the duchess, before I saw my lord Bristol.

Lord Lyttelton. Do you recollect how long that was ago?

Mr. Hawkins. I do not indeed; it was a great many years ago.

Lord Lyttelton. Do you remember to have heard any particular circumstances related to you by either of the parties, concerning the celebration of that marriage?

Mr. Hawkins. No, never more than what I have mentioned just now.

Lord Camden. Was you in the room at the time of the delivery?

Mr. Hawkins. To the best of my remembrance, I certainly was.

Lord Camden. Did you ever see the child itself?

Mr. Hawkins. At the time of the delivery I dare say I did. Afterwards I never did, but when I was sent for on purpose to see it.

Lord Camden. Had you then any certain knowledge of its being the prisoner's child?

R r r

Mr. Hawkins.

Mr. Hawkins. It is impossible for me to say when I saw the child some months afterwards, that I could know it to be the same child.

Lord Ravensworth. Did you not understand that the duchess apprehended and was convinced that the sentence in the Ecclesiastical Court was final?

Mr. Hawkins. Undoubtedly so.

Lord Ravensworth. And that she was at liberty to marry again, unless the sentence was appealed from within a limited time?

Mr. Hawkins. Most certainly.

Lord Ravensworth. Who delivered the prisoner?

Mr. Hawkins. I was endeavouring to recollect before I came, who was present besides myself, and who delivered her grace; but I protest I have forgotten it, so as not to recollect. I could not recollect, it is so long ago.

Ordered to withdraw.

The honourable SOPHIA CHARLOTTE FETTIPLACE sworn.

Mr. Attorney General. How long have you been acquainted with the prisoner at the bar?

Mrs. Fettiplace. A great many years.

Mr. Attorney General. Did you know the lady before the year 1744?

Mrs. Fettiplace. My lords, I have no other knowledge of any of the circumstances to be enquired after, than what arises from my connection formerly with the lady; and unless your lordships require it of me as a witness for justice, I should wish to be excused.

Lord High Steward. The lady must certainly disclose what she knows for the purposes of justice.

Mr. Attorney General. Did you know the prisoner at the bar before the year 1744?

Mrs. Fettiplace. I cannot recollect.

Mr. Attorney General. Did you know the prisoner before she was maid of honour to the late princess of Wales?

Mrs. Fettiplace. No, I did not.

Mr. Attorney General. What conversation have you ever had with the prisoner relative to her marriage with Mr. Hervey?

Mrs. Fettiplace. I believe I have heard her say that she was married to him.

Mr. Attorney General. Can you recollect what circumstances she has mentioned respecting that marriage, where, and at what time, and before what witnesses?

Mrs. Fettiplace. In Hampshire, in a summer-house, in a garden.

Mr. Attorney General. Can you recollect upon what occasions these conversations have passed between you and the prisoner?

Mrs. Fettiplace. Upon my word, I cannot pretend to say that: it is long ago.

Mr. Attorney General. Do you recollect any conversation respecting the child which the prisoner had by Mr. Hervey?

Mrs. Fettiplace. I know nothing about it.

Mr. Attorney General. Can you recollect how often in conversation it has been said between the prisoner and you, that she was married to Mr. Hervey?

Mrs. Fettiplace. I believe but once.

Mr. Attorney General. My lords, I shall not trouble Mrs. Fettiplace with any more questions.

Lord High Steward. Would the counsel for the prisoner ask the witness any questions?

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I shall not ask Mrs. Fettiplace any questions.

Mr. Solicitor General. My lords, I would now call Lord Barrington.

Lord BARRINGTON, who was in like manner sworn.

Mr. Solicitor General. How long have you been acquainted with the lady at the bar?

Mr. Solicitor General. Did you ever hear from the lady at the bar, that she was married to Mr. Hervey?

Lord Barrington. My lords, I am come here in obedience to your lordships summons, ready to give testimony as to any matter that I know of my own knowledge, or that has come to me in the usual way; but if any thing has been confided to my honour, or confidentially told me, I do hold, with humble submission to your lordships, that as a man of honour, as a man regardless of the laws of society, I cannot reveal it.

Lord High Steward. When the last witness but one (Mr. Hawkins) was at the bar, he made something like the same excuse for his not answering the questions put to him. He was then informed by a noble and learned lord, and the whole court agreed with that lord, that such questions were to be answered in a court of justice.

Lord Barrington. I have no doubt but that the question is a proper question to be asked by a court of justice, otherwise your lordships would not have permitted it to be asked. But, my lords, I think every man must act from his own feelings; and I feel, that any private conversation intrusted to me, is not to be reported again.

A Lord. His lordship will recollect the oath that he has taken, is, that he shall declare the whole truth.

Lord Barrington. My lords, as I understand the oath, I can decline answering the question that has been asked me without acting contrary to that oath, without being guilty of perjury. But, if it is the opinion of your lordships that I am bound by that oath to answer, and that I shall be guilty of a perjury if I do not answer, in that case, my lords, I shall think differently, for I will not be perjured.

Duchess of Kingston. I do release my lord Barrington from every obligation of honour. I wish, and earnestly desire, that every witness who shall be examined, may deliver their opinions in every point justly, whether for me or against me. I came from Rome at the hazard of my life to surrender myself to this court. I bow with submissive obedience to every decree, and do not even complain, that an ecclesiastical sentence has been deemed of no force, although such a sentence has never been controverted during the space of one thousand four hundred and seventy-five years.

Lord Barrington. My lords, I do solemnly declare to your lordships, on that oath that I have taken, and on my honour, that I have not had the least communication made to me of the duchess of Kingston's generosity. I have not had the least communication with her grace by letter, message, or in any other way, for more than two months; and I had no idea of being summoned as a witness here, until the Easter holy-days, so that her grace's generosity is entirely spontaneous, and of her own accord. But, my lords, I have a doubt, which no man can resolve better than your lordships, because your honour is as high as any men; I have a doubt, whether, thinking it improper that I should betray confidential communications before the duchess consented that I should, and gave me my liberty; whether her grace's generosity ought not to tie me more firmly to my former resolutions?

Duke of Richmond. For one, I think that it would be improper in the noble lord to betray any private conversations. I submit to your lordships, that every matter of fact, not of conversation, which can be requested the noble lord is bound to disclose.

Lord Mansfield. I mean only to propose to your lordships, to avoid adjourning to consider this question or any thing further upon it at present, that the counsel might be allowed to call other witnesses in the mean time, and that Lord Barrington may have an opportunity of considering of the matter, if the counsel should think proper to call his lordship again.—This proposal was over-ruled.

The counsel against the duchess desired to withdraw the witness.

Lord Camden. My lords, I understand from the bar, that rather than your lordships should be perplexed with any question which may arise upon the noble lord's difficulty in giving his evidence at the bar, the counsel would rather waive the benefit of his evidence in the cause. My lords, if that be their resolution, and they think, that safely and without prejudice to this prosecution they may venture to give up that evidence, your lordships, to be sure, will acknowledge the politeness of the surrender. But, my lords, now I am upon my legs, you will give me leave to make one short remark on this proceeding, and to hope that your lordships, sitting in judgment on criminal cases, the highest and most important, that may affect the lives, liberties, and properties of your lordships, that you shall not think it befitting the dignity of this high court of justice to be debating the etiquette of honour, at the same time when we are trying lives and liberties. My lords, the laws of the land, I speak it boldly in this grave assembly, are to receive another answer from those who are called to depose at your bar, than to be told that in point of honour and of conscience they do not think, that they acquit themselves like persons of that description, when they declare what they know. There is no power of torture in this kingdom to wrest evidence from a man's breast, who with-holds it; every witness may undoubtedly venture on the punishment, that will ensue on his refusing to give testimony. As to casual points, how far he should conceal or suppress that which the justice of his country calls upon him to reveal, that I must leave to the witness's own conscience.

Lord Lyttelton. The laws of the land have spoken clearly on this occasion, and if your lordships had applied them to the noble lord at the bar, he has told your lordships that he is willing to submit to your judgment. But, my lords, it is yet a question, whether or not the noble lord will be perjured? It is a question not decided by your lordships, that he will be perjured, if he refuses to betray a confidence. I am sure that I feel, and I apprehend your lordships as men of honour feel, the full weight of the noble lord's objection. He will speak to matters of fact, but he does not desire to speak merely to conversation. And, my lords, I am not surprised that he should make that objection: for if you consider how loose and inaccurate all evidence of conversation must be, it takes off in a court of justice much from its availment. The noble lord has told you, that confidential conversation may have passed between him and the noble lady at the bar: he has stated to you his doubts, and I apprehend he is not obliged to go on with his evidence, until your lordships have unanimously pronounced, that it is your opinion that he is obliged so to do.

Lord High Steward. If the counsel for the prosecution say, that they have no questions to ask the noble lord, he may withdraw.

Lord Barrington. My lords, might I be allowed to say a word or two, before I withdraw from this bar? It is impossible that any person can reverse this high court, indeed any court of justice in this country, more than I do. It is not, my lords, from contumacy, of which I am incapable; it is not with any view or purpose that any of your lordships would disapprove, as individuals, I am certain, that I have taken the part which I have done. I do not say, that there are no cases, in which a person ought not to reveal private conversation. There are cases, in my opinion, in which he should: there are cases, in my opinion, in which he should not: and, my lords, no person can draw the line but himself. But, my lords, I have recollected (I am obliged to the counsel for the prosecution, who are willing to admit me to withdraw. I return them my thanks. I dare say in that they have consulted my feelings as much as they could, consistent with the duties of their station) but I have recollected, my lords, since the generous manner in which the duchess of Kingston has been pleased to absolve me from all ties, I have recollected, that she said, she wished and desired that I might say any thing. If her grace thinks that any thing I can say, consistent with truth, can tend to her justification, I am then ready to be examined to private communications.

Mr. Solicitor General. I do not desire to examine the noble lord. I stated stated to your lordships, that I do not think the cause, in which my duty engages me, will at all suffer by having deference to any difficulty that the noble lord may entertain. I will not examine the noble lord on the concession of the lady at the bar. The noble lord stands at your lordships bar a witness. Having taken the oath, though I do not examine him, the prisoner may.

Mr. Wallace. At the same time that I express my astonishment at the offer, lord Barrington is not called to the bar as a witness for the prisoner. The noble lady at the bar has her witnesses, in her turn, to call, with which she shall trouble your lordships.

Duke of Richmond. I do not look on a witness at the bar to be the witness of the counsel or of the prisoner, but the witness of the house. I shall, therefore, ask a question or two of the noble lord. I will not distress the noble lord's feelings by inquiring into confidential matters. I will merely ask questions of fact. The first question I would ask the noble lord is, whether he knows any fact by which he is convinced that Mr. Hervey was married to Miss Chudleigh?

Lord Barrington. I do not know of any fact, which will prove the marriage between the duchess of Kingston and Mr. Hervey, of my own knowledge.

Duke of Richmond. The noble lord must leave it to the house to judge whether it will or not. But does his lordship know any fact relative to that matter?

Lord Barrington. I do not know any thing of my own knowledge that can tend to prove that marriage. I know nothing but what I have heard in the world, and from conversation.

Lord Radnor. I am afraid your lordships, by your acquiescence, have admitted a rule of proceeding here, which would not be admitted in any inferior court in the kingdom. I desire, therefore, to ask the noble lord, whether he knows any matter of fact relative to that marriage.

Lord Barrington. My lords, if I do, I cannot reveal it; nor can I answer the question without betraying private conversation.

Moved to adjourn. Adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

After an adjournment of some time, the lords returned to Westminster Hall.

Lord High Steward. My lord viscount Barrington, I am commanded by the lords to acquaint your lordship, that it is the judgment of this house, that you are bound by law to answer all such questions as shall be put to you.—Has the counsel for the prosecution any question to put to the witness at the bar?

Mr. Solicitor-General. We shall not ask the noble lord any questions.

Lord High Steward. Has the counsel for the prisoner any question to put to the witness at the bar?

Mr. Wallace. Not any.

Lord Radnor. Does the witness know from conversation with the lady at the bar, that she was married to the earl of Bristol?

Lord Barrington. My lords, I have already told your lordships the motives which induce me to think that I cannot, consistent with conscience, with honour, or with probity, answer such questions, as will tend to disclose confidential communications made to me. At the same time I informed your lordships, that if the oath went so far as that I should break that oath, if I did not answer all questions which could be put to me; if that was the determination of your lordships, I said I would not break my oath. My lords, I continue in the same opinion and principle. My own judgment, as far as it guides me, which is very imperfectly, does tell me, that I am not obliged to answer all questions that can be put to me. But, my lords, though nobody can draw the line of conscience, of honour, and of probity in this case but myself, yet in point of law, and in interpretation of law, and the oath I have taken, I am desirous of assistance from those who can best give it me, and I had much rather trust almost any man's judgment than my own. I do not dare to ask again your lordships opinion on that point. But, my lords, might I be permitted to apply to the learned counsel who are near me; if it is the opinion of the learned counsel, that I am obliged by my oath to answer the noble lord's question, I will readily answer it.

Lord Effingham. I apprehend, that no question can be put in this court on a matter of law to the counsel at the bar.

Several lords said, 'You may ask the counsel.'

Lord Barrington. My lords, I have put the question to the Attorney-General, and I give him my thanks. He says, he thinks I am obliged by my oath to answer all questions. That being the case, I have nothing more to say, than humbly to beg your lordships pardon for having given you so much trouble, and to beg and entreat that you will believe, that nothing but the tenderest and the strongest feelings, and the most determined resolution to do what was right in my situation, could have induced me to give you so much trouble.

Lord Radnor. Whether his lordship knows from conversation with the lady at the bar, that she was married to the earl of Bristol?

Lord Barrington. My memory I have found by long experience to be a very erroneous one, and especially with relation to things past long ago. To the best of my memory and belief, the duchess has never honoured me with any conversation on the subject for many, many years past; I believe I might say for above twenty years past. And, my lords, that being the case, I must answer that question very doubtfully: but after the question which the learned counsel has given to my doubts, I mean not to conceal any thing from your lordships. Thinking it right to be examined, I think it right to give frank answers, and any doubt in any thing I say will arise from my not remembering well the circumstances. I the duchess of Kingston many (I should not say too much if I was to say thirty) years ago did entrust me with a circumstance in her life, relative to an engagement of a matrimonial kind with the earl of Bristol, then Mr. Hervey.

Lord Radnor. Whether his lordship understood, that that matrimonial engagement, which had already passed, was a marriage?

Lord Barrington. I understood, there had been a matrimonial engagement entered into; but whether it amounted to a legal marriage or not, I am not lawyer or civilian enough to judge.

Lord Radnor. Did his lordship ever understand, that there was issue of that marriage?

Lord Barrington. Upon my word I cannot say; I do not know that the duchess ever made any communication of that sort to me. I had heard of it in the world, but I do not know that the duchess ever communicated to me the circumstance of her having had any issue.

Lord Radnor. Does his lordship know any thing of a bond entered into on the part of the prisoner at the bar, of late years, relative to the suppression of evidence, or the payment of costs of suit in the Ecclesiastical Court?

Lord Barrington. I never had the least communication from the duchess of Kingston, or from any person relative to any thing of the kind; I do not recollect that I ever heard of any such thing even in the world; and the duchess of Kingston has never communicated to me, in the course of her life, to the best of my memory or belief, any thing which was, at the time she was pleased to communicate it to me, in the least a deviation from the strictest rules of virtue and religion.

Ordered to withdraw.

My Lords, is it too much to beg, that what I have said at the bar may be read over to me? Part of it is of a nice nature; I may have expressed myself improperly; the writer may have taken it down erroneously: I should be glad to have it read over to me, that I may correct it in your lordships presence.

Here the universal voice was 'Read, Read!' but lord Barrington spared the house the trouble, by addressing himself to their lordships as follows:

My lords, I find by the clerk, that the part which is of the nicest kind with relation to me, wherein I expressed the difficulties and feelings I had on the subject of questions that I thought I ought not to answer, and why and on what ground I have since thought it my duty, understanding that my oath obliges me to it, to give my answers; I find, my lords, that part has not been taken down by the clerk, and therefore I shall give your lordships no further trouble.

Mr. Dunning. My lords, we desire next to produce

Mrs. JUDITH PHILLIPS, who was sworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. You was the widow of Mr. Amis, was you not?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Dunning. Mr. Amis was parson of the parish of Lainston in Hampshire?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Dunning. Did you know a family of the name of Merrill?

Mrs. Phillips. I did.

Mr. Dunning. Was, or was not, Mr. Merrill's house in that parish?

Mrs. Phillips. It was.

Mr. Dunning. How long since did your husband die?

Mrs. Phillips. Seventeen years ago.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know the lady at the bar?

Mrs. Phillips. Very well.

Mr. Dunning. How long have you known the lady at the bar?

Mrs. Phillips. About thirty years.

Mr. Dunning. Was you privy to her marriage in your husband's lifetime?

Mrs. Phillips. I was not at the wedding; but I heard my husband say, he married them.

A Lord. That is not evidence.

Mr. Dunning. Had you not any other means of knowing that fact from the lady at the bar herself?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Dunning. Do you remember the lady at the bar coming to Winchester?

Mrs. Phillips. Very well.

Mr. Dunning. When?

Mrs. Phillips. She came about the middle of February, 1759.

Mr. Dunning. Was that in your husband's life-time, or since his death?

Mrs. Phillips. In my husband's life-time.

Mr. Dunning. Was it long before, and how long before Mr. Amis's death?

Mrs. Phillips. Six weeks.

Mr. Dunning. What was the occasion of the lady's visit to Winchester?

Mrs. Phillips. For a register of her marriage.

Mr. Dunning. If you recollect any particulars of what passed upon that occasion, state them.

Mrs. Phillips. She came to the Blue Boar in King's-gate-street, Winchester, and sent for me by six o'clock in the morning. When I went to her, she asked me if I thought Mr. Amis would give her a register of her marriage? I told her, I thought he would. Then I asked her to my house; and when she came, she asked me to go up with her to Mr. Amis, and ask if he would see her and give her a register of her marriage? I went up to Mr. Amis, and told Mr. Amis what the lady had desired. Mr. Amis desired to see the lady. Then I came down and told her, that Mr. Amis at that time was confined to his bed. The lady went to Mr. Amis, and told Mr. Amis her request. Then Mr. Merrill and the lady consulted together whom to send for, and they desired me to send for Mr. Sparring, the attorney. I did send for him, and during the the time the messenger was gone, the lady concealed herself in a closet: she said, she did not care that Mr. Spearing should know that she was there. When Mr. Spearing came, Mr. Merrill produced a sheet of stamped paper, that he brought to make the register upon. Mr. Spearing said, it would not do, it must be a book, and that the lady must be at the making of it. Then I went to the closet, and told the lady. Then the lady came to Mr. Spearing, and Mr. Spearing told the lady a sheet of stamped paper would not do, it must be a book. Then the lady desired Mr. Spearing to go and buy one. Mr. Spearing went and bought one, and, when brought, the register was made. Then Mr. Amis delivered it to the lady. The lady thanked him, and said it might be an hundred thousand pounds in her way: at the same time she added, that she had had a child by Mr. Hervey, and that it was a boy, but that it was dead; and that she had borrowed an hundred pounds of her aunt Hanmer to buy baby things. Before Mr. Merrill and the lady left my house, the lady sealed up the register, and gave it to me, and desired I would take care of it until Mr. Amis's death, and then deliver it to Mr. Merrill.

Mr. Dunning. Did it accordingly remain in your hands until your husband's death, and then deliver it to Mr. Merrill?

Mrs. Phillips. I did.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect, whether Mr. Merrill accompanied the lady from the time you first saw her in Winchester to your husband's house, or did Mr. Merrill join them afterwards when they were there?

Mrs. Phillips. He joined them afterwards.

Mr. Dunning. Do you remember, whether any other entry was then made in this register-book, besides the entry of this marriage?

Mrs. Phillips. I don't remember any.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect to have seen any thing of the lady at the bar since your husband's death?

Mrs. Phillips. Many times.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect any conversation that has passed between you at any of those times?

Mrs. Phillips. After I had delivered the register to Mr. Merrill, I waited upon the lady at her house at Knightsbridge, and found her in the garden. I told her, I had delivered the register to Mr. Merrill. She thanked me for it; and desired I would take no notice of it: at the same time she said Mr. Swins was in the garden, and hoped I would take no notice to him of the affair.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect any further conversation about this book, after Mr. Merrill's death, with the lady?

Mrs. Phillips. I was once a-fishing with the lady, and she told me some things that had passed in the family. She told me, that Mrs. Bathurst had used her very ill, for she had got all the papers Mr. Merrill had of her's at the time of his death. Upon which I asked her, what was become of the register? She told me the minister of the parish had it.

Mr. Dunning. Was, or was not, the Mrs. Bathurst you have spoken of, the daughter of that Mr. Merrill?

Mrs. Phillips. She was.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect any other conversation with the lady at the bar, after her marriage with the duke of Kingston?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes; I waited upon her in Arlington-street, after her marriage with the duke of Kingston. She said to me, Was it not very good-natured of the duke to marry an old maid? I looked her in the face and smiled, but said nothing then. She asked me, if Mr. Hervey had sent to me at the time of her trial? I said he had not sent to me.

(The book shewn to the witness.)

Mr. Dunning. Can you be sure, whether that is the book you have been speaking of?

Mrs. Phillips. I am very sure.

Mr. Dunning. I believe there are the vestiges of the seals about it still?

Mrs. Phillips. There are.

Mr. Dunning. Where it was sealed up?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Dunning. Look at the entries in the book; are they not your husband's writing? and were they not made in your presence?

Mrs. Phillips. They are my husband's hand-writing, and they were made in my presence.

Mr. Dunning. They were made likewise in the presence of the lady at the bar, were they not?

Mrs. Phillips. They were.

Clerk reads.

'Marriages, births, and burials in the parish of Lainton. 2d of August, Mrs. Susannah Merrill, relict of John Merrill, esq; buried.
'4th of August 1744, Married the honourable Augustus Hervey, esq;
'in the parish church of Lainton, to Miss Elizabeth Chudleigh, daughter of colonel Thomas Chudleigh, late of Chelsea College, deceased.
'By me Thomas Amis.'

Mr. Dunning. My lords, I have done with this witness.

Lord High Steward. Would the counsel for the prisoner ask this witness any questions?

Mr. Mansfield. I should be glad first to see the book.—I would wish to know by what means you now subsist? what support you have?

Mrs. Phillips. Upon my own private fortune.

Mr. Mansfield. Where do you live?

Mrs. Phillips. At Bristol.

Mr. Mansfield. Is your husband living or dead?

Mrs. Phillips. Alive.

Mr. Mansfield. What employment was he in, before he lived at Bristol upon his fortune?

Mrs. Phillips. He was steward to the duke of Kingston, and a grafter.
Mr. Mansfield. Was he not turned out of the service of the duke of Kingston?

Mrs. Phillips. I believe he was not turned out.

Mr. Mansfield. Do not you know, whether he was or not?

Mrs. Phillips. He wrote a letter to the duke, and desired to leave him.

Mr. Mansfield. Do you know then, that he was not turned out?

Mrs. Phillips. Yes.

Mr. Mansfield. Had he been threatened to be turned out, before he sent that letter?

Mrs. Phillips. Not that ever I heard of.

Mr. Mansfield. Had your husband had any differences or disputes with the duke of Kingston?

Mrs. Phillips. No, not that I know.

Mr. Mansfield. Was his reason then for quitting the service of the duke of Kingston merely his own inclination, without any particular reason or cause?

Mrs. Phillips. He thought the duke looked cool upon him: for what reason he could not tell.

Mr. Mansfield. Had the duke ever expressed any cause of dislike to him?

Mrs. Phillips. Not that I know of.

Mr. Mansfield. How long have you left Bristol?

Mrs. Phillips. About four months.

Mr. Mansfield. Where have you lived?

Mrs. Phillips. Sometimes in one place, sometimes in another.

Mr. Mansfield. In what places?

Mrs. Phillips. Sometimes at the Turf coffee-house, sometimes in St. Mary Axe.

Mr. Mansfield. How much of the time at the Turf coffee-house?

Mrs. Phillips. I really cannot say exactly.

Mr. Mansfield. You are not asked as to a week. Have you lived there the greater part?

Mrs. Phillips. The greater part.

Mr. Mansfield. Who has supported you at the Turf coffee-house?

Mrs. Phillips. Ourselves.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you paid the expences of your support there?

Mrs. Phillips. That I do not know any thing of.

Mr. Mansfield. Do you not know, that the whole of your expence at the Turf coffee-house is to be defrayed by the prosecutor, Mr. Evelyn Meadows?

Mrs. Phillips. I do not know it is.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you not understood so?

Mrs. Phillips. I have not.

Mr. Mansfield. Nor do you believe it?

Mrs. Phillips. I cannot tell what to believe, or what is to be done.

Mr. Mansfield. Cannot you tell, whether you believe that your expences at the Turf coffee-house are to be defrayed by Mr. Meadows?

Mrs. Phillips. No, I do not. I do not know any thing of that.

Mr. Mansfield. Do you not know, by whom you expect the expence of your support at the Turf coffee-house is to be paid?

Mrs. Phillips. I do not know by whom it is to be paid.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you seen Mr. Evelyn Meadows at the Turf coffee-house?

Mrs. Phillips. I have.

Mr. Mansfield. How often may you have seen that gentleman there?

Mrs. Phillips. I cannot tell.

Mr. Mansfield. Many times, or only once or twice?

Mrs. Phillips. I may have seen him twice or three times.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you not seen him oftener than that, there?

Mrs. Phillips. I have seen him frequently in the yard.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you not had frequent conversations with him?

Mrs. Phillips. Not frequent.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you not conversed with him sometimes at the Turf coffee-house, sometimes at other places?

Mrs. Phillips. No where, but at the Turf coffee-house?

Mr. Mansfield. Who has been present at such conversations?

Mrs. Phillips. My husband.

Mr. Mansfield. Who else?

Mrs. Phillips. No one else.

Mr. Mansfield. Has not Mr. Fozard been present at some of these conversations?

Mrs. Phillips. Never.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you not been at Mr. Fozard's house with Mr. Meadows?

Mrs. Phillips. Never; by accident on Christmas-day I called at his door, and he was there.

Mr. Mansfield. Was you in company with Mr. Meadows at Mr. Fozard's?

Mrs. Phillips. I was.

Mr. Mansfield. Does Mr. Fozard assist Mr. Meadows in the course of this prosecution?

Mrs. Phillips. I know nothing of that.

Mr. Mansfield. Do not you know, that Mr. Fozard has assisted Mr. Meadows in looking out for witnesses?

Mrs. Phillips. I don't know any thing about it.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you not yourself been present at conversations with Mr. Fozard about this prosecution?

Mrs. Phillips. Nothing, but what was merely accidental.

Mr. Mansfield. How often has that accident happened, that you have been present at conversations with Mr. Fozard about this prosecution?

Mrs. Phillips. I never was at Mr. Fozard's but twice.

Mr. Mansfield. Has Mr. Fozard been at the Turf coffee-house with you?

Mrs. Phillips. He came to see Mr. Phillips, when he had the gout.

Mr. Mansfield.

Mr. Mansfield. How often might Mr. Fozard visit you at the Turf coffee-house?

Mrs. Phillips. He came to see Mr. Phillips, but not me.

Mr. Mansfield. How often might he visit Mr. Phillips there?

Mrs. Phillips. About three times.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you ever met Mr. Fozard at any other places besides the Turf coffee-house and his own house?

Mrs. Phillips. Never.

Mr. Mansfield. Do you know of any promise made to you or your husband of any benefit or advantage depending upon the event of this prosecution?

Mrs. Phillips. None in the world.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you never hear of any such promise being made to you or your husband?

Mrs. Phillips. Never.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you never said, that any such promise or offer was made?

Mrs. Phillips. Never, nor it never was.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you never said any thing to that purpose?

Mrs. Phillips. No, never to any body.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you never made any mention of any kind of benefit or advantage you was to receive from the evidence you should give on this prosecution?

Mrs. Phillips. Not in the least; I don't want it, nor wish it.

Mr. Mansfield. Did I understand you right, when you said, that at the time of the entry of the marriage in this register no other entry was made?

Mrs. Phillips. I don't remember that; I remember very well standing at the bed's feet when the register was made.

Mr. Mansfield. Do not you know whether any other entry was made at that time?

Mrs. Phillips. I don't, for I was backwards and forwards in the room.

Mr. Mansfield. How come you then to know, that the register of this marriage was made in the book at that time?

Mrs. Phillips. I saw it.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you read it at that time?

Mrs. Phillips. I heard Mr. Amis read it.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you hear him read any thing else besides the entry of the marriage?

Mrs. Phillips. Nothing but that, for I was going backwards and forwards in the room.

Mr. Mansfield. Do you know nothing at all, whether any thing else was entered besides that at the time of the marriage?

Mrs. Phillips. I did not see any thing but that; though it might, as I was going backwards and forwards.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you see the entry of the marriage in the book?

Mrs. Phillips. I did.

Mr. Mansfield. If you saw that, must not you have seen whether there were any other entries made on the same leaf?

Mrs. Phillips. I heard it read; I never saw it afterwards but when the lady sealed it up.

Mr. Mansfield. Did not you take notice that there were other entries?

Mrs. Phillips. I did not.

Mr. Mansfield. You took notice of nothing upon the paper but the entry of this marriage?

Mrs. Phillips. Of nothing else.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you keep the paper long enough before you, or did the lady at the bar keep the book long enough before her, for her to see whether what she heard read was written on the paper?

Mrs. Phillips. She held it in this manner (describing the manner) open, and I saw it as I stood by her: I did not read it, but heard it read.

Mr. Mansfield. Did all the persons, who were present, hear what was said about the hundred pounds lent by Mrs. Hanmer?

Mrs. Phillips. No, they did not; the lady said she had borrowed an hundred pounds of her aunt Mrs. Hanmer to buy baby things.

Mr. Mansfield. Who did the lady tell that to?

Mrs. Phillips. To Mr. Amis and to me.

Mr. Mansfield. Did she speak it loudly or softly, or how?

Mrs. Phillips. She spoke it as she was sitting by the bed-side talking to Mr. Amis.

Mr. Mansfield. When did you tell any body of such register?

Mrs. Phillips. I really cannot say exactly when, but I have said, I had it in my possession.

Mr. Mansfield. When did you first mention it?

Mrs. Phillips. I cannot tell.

Mr. Mansfield. Was Mr. Merrill present at the time when this entry was made in the register?

Mrs. Phillips. He was.

Mr. Mansfield. Was he in the room the whole time that this conversation passed, that you have mentioned, of lending an hundred pounds by Mrs. Hanmer?

Mrs. Phillips. No, he was not.

Mr. Mansfield. Did Mr. Merrill come with the lady, or the lady before him, or without him?

Mrs. Phillips. The lady before him, for Mr. Merrill was gone to Lainston to his seat.

Mr. Mansfield. When Mr. Merrill came, did not the lady repeat the conversation that had been about the child and the hundred pounds?

Mrs. Phillips. There was nothing of that said before Mr. Merrill.

Mr. Mansfield. Was any thing said about making any other entry in the register, besides that of the marriage?

Mrs. Phillips. Nothing that I heard.

Mr. Mansfield. When did Mr. Merrill come into the room; before the entry was made in the book, or after?

Mrs. Phillips. Before.

Mr. Mansfield. Was Mr. Merrill in the room at the time that it was made?

Vol. XI.

Mrs. Phillips. He was.

Mr. Mansfield. Who was it brought the stamp paper?

Mrs. Phillips. Mr. Merrill.

Mr. Mansfield. Was Mr. Merrill in the room when the lady concealed herself, as you have said?

Mrs. Phillips. He was.

Mr. Mansfield. Who else was in the room?

Mrs. Phillips. No one except myself.

Mr. Mansfield. Now look at the book.

Mrs. Phillips. I know the hand perfectly well.

Mr. Mansfield. Is the whole of that, which is written on that leaf, the writing of your husband?

Mrs. Phillips. It is.

Mr. Mansfield. You have said that you went to Arlington-street; can you name any person that you saw there?

Mrs. Phillips. No one was in the room, when I went, except the lady.

Mr. Mansfield. Can you name any person that saw you there?

Mrs. Phillips. Only a servant for some time, and then a milliner came.

Mr. Mansfield. Can you name those persons?

Mrs. Phillips. I can't; I don't know them.

Mr. Mansfield. Can you name neither of them?

Mrs. Phillips. The servant was Fozard.

Mr. Mansfield. Can you name no other servants that you saw there?

Mrs. Phillips. No; I had an inflammation in my eye, and the lady was exceedingly kind to me: she ordered an egg to be boiled for me, and Fozard brought it, in order that it might be opened and laid on my eye.

Mr. Mansfield. Can you name any other servants whom you saw there?

Mrs. Phillips. I don't remember.

Lord Camden. My lords, I observe in the entry of the register the words 'was married' are struck through with a black line; I want to know of the witness whether she can account for that stroke?

Mrs. Phillips. I cannot.

Mr. Dunning. It is a repetition. There is marriage written in the margin. 'August the 24th, married.' The entry then proceeds, 'The honourable Augustus Hervey, Esq. was married;' which being a repetition, I suppose they struck that through with a black line.

Lord Camden. I believe it is so.

Mr. Dunning. If your lordships please, the next witness to be called is

The Reverend Mr. STEPHEN KENCHEN, who was sworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. You succeeded Mr. Amis in this church at Lainston, I believe?

Mr. Kenchen. I did.

Mr. Dunning. When did you first see that book that he has in his hand, and how did it come there?

Mr. Kenchen. The first time that I saw the book was after the death of Mrs. Hanmer, aunt to Mr. Merrill, who was buried in the vault of that little church.

Mr. Dunning. By whom was that book produced to you, and for what purpose?

Mr. Kenchen. In order to register Mrs. Hanmer's burial.

Mr. Dunning. By whom?

Mr. Kenchen. By Mr. Merrill.

Mr. Dunning. Did you accordingly make an entry of the burial of Mrs. Hanmer?

Mr. Kenchen. I made an entry of the burial of Mrs. Hanmer.

Mr. Dunning. What then became of the book?

Mr. Kenchen. Mr. Merrill carried it back again to his own house.

Mr. Dunning. When did you next see the book?

Mr. Kenchen. At the death of Mr. Merrill.

Mr. Dunning. By whom was the book then produced to you?

Mr. Kenchen. I cannot say; either by Mr. or Mrs. Bathurst, or in the presence of them both.

Mr. Dunning. Did you then make an entry of the burial of Mr. Merrill?

Mr. Kenchen. I did.

Mr. Dunning. What then became of the book?

Mr. Kenchen. I have had it in my possession ever since.

Mr. Dunning. My lords, I shall ask no more questions of this witness.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Wallace, would you ask this witness any questions?

Mr. Wallace. I have no questions to put to this witness.

Mr. Dunning. If your lordships please, we will now call

The Reverend Mr. JOHN DENNIS, who was sworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. Look at that book. Was you acquainted with the hand-writing of the late Mr. Amis? You knew Mr. Amis, I presume?

Mr. Dennis. I knew him perfectly well.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know his hand-writing when you see it?

Mr. Dennis. I have seen his hand-writing often, as succeeding him in the living.

Mr. Dunning. Did you ever see him write?

Mr. Dennis. I have seen him write, but not often.

Mr. Dunning. Look at that hand-writing; tell me whether you believe the two entries in the first page of that book are his hand-writing?

Mr. Dennis. Yes, particularly his name, Thomas Amis, seems very much so.

Mr. Dunning. Do you believe it to be his hand-writing?

Mr. Dennis. I believe the whole to be his hand-writing.

Ordered to withdraw.

Mr. Dunning. I do not know whether, on the part of the prisoner, they mean to put us on the proving, which it is necessary for us to do if they require it, the marriage with the duke of Kingston.

Mr. Wallace. We are ready to admit that fact. There is no doubt of her being married by the licence of the archbishop of Canterbury.

Mr. Dunning. You will give us the date.

Mr. Wallace. Mention what the day is.

S C C

Mr.

Mr. Dunning. The 8th of March 1769, I understand.
 Mr. Dunning. My lords, we are now going to prove a caveat entered by the lady, upon the apprehension of a suit intended to be instituted by Mr. Harpur in the Spiritual Court.

Mr. JAMES, who was sworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know any thing of the caveat entered at Doctors Commons on the part of the lady at the bar?

Mr. James. Yes, the caveat is entered in this book (producing it).

Mr. Dunning. Is that the proper book, in which such entries ought to be made?

Mr. James. It is.

The caveat was read by the clerk, and is as follows: 'The 18th of August 1768. Let no citation, intimation, or other process, or any letters of request for the same, to any other judge or jurisdiction whatsoever, issue under the seal of this court at the suit or instance of the honourable Augustus John Hervey, or his brother, against the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, spinster, of any cause or suit matrimonial, without due notice being given to Mr. Nathaniel Bishop, proctor for the said honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, who, on his being warned thereto before the judge of this court, or his lawful surrogate, will be ready by himself or counsel to shew just cause of this same caveat, and why no such process or letters of request should issue thereupon.'

Mr. Wallace. The witness merely produces the book; he knows nothing of the fact of the entry being made.

Mr. James. I know Mr. Bishop's clerk's hand; this is his hand-writing.

Mr. Dunning. Perhaps the witness may know, that Mr. Bishop was the proctor employed by the lady in the course of that suit?

Mr. James. I have heard so.

Mr. Attorney General. That appears on the record they have put in.

Mr. Dunning. I understand, that it is the pleasure of some of your lordships, that we should go into the proof of the marriage of the duke of Kingston?

Mr. Wallace. It is admitted on the part of the prisoner.

Mr. Dunning. But as some of the lords wish for the proof, we will examine it.

The Reverend Mr. JAMES TREBECK, who was sworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. Be so good as find the register of the marriage of the duke of Kingston.

Points it out; clerk reads. 'No 92. Marriages in March 1769. No 92. The most noble Evelyn Pierrepont, duke of Kingston, a bachelor, and the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh of Knightsbridge, in St. Margaret's Westminster, a spinster, were married by special licence of the archbishop of Canterbury this 8th of March 1769, by me Samuel Harpur, of the British Museum. This marriage was solemnized between us,

KINGSTON,
 ELIZABETH CHUDLEIGH,

In the presence of

MASHAM,	J. ROSS MACKYE,
WILLIAM YEO,	E. R. A. LAROCHE,
A. K. F. GILBERT,	ARTHUR COLLIER,
JAMES LAROCHE jun.	C. MASHAM.
ALICE YEO,

Mr. Dunning. I am desired to apprise your lordships of a fact, which may or may not be proved, if thought necessary. Your lordships have heard in the evidence of the last woman an account of a certain Mr. Spearing, who was present. That Mr. Spearing could not be found. He, though mayor of Winchester, is now found to be amusing himself some where or other beyond sea, God knows where. We have witnesses to give your lordships that account, if your lordships think it necessary. Will your lordships now please to hear the reverend Mr. Harpur?

The Reverend Mr. HARPUR, who was sworn in like manner.

Mr. Dunning. Did you perform the marriage ceremony between these parties?

Mr. Harpur. Yes.

Mr. Dunning. At the time mentioned in the register?

Mr. Harpur. Yes.

Lord High Steward. Have you any more witnesses to produce?

Mr. Dunning. We don't judge it necessary to offer to your lordships any more evidence in this stage of the business. If it should become so, we reserve to ourselves the right of examining them hereafter.

Mr. Wallace. I beg Mrs. Phillips may be called to the bar, that a letter may be produced to her, and that she may say whether it is her hand-writing.

Mrs. PHILLIPS called.

Mr. Wallace. Is that your hand-writing?

Mrs. Phillips. The name is my hand-writing.

Mr. Wallace. Is that your letter?

Mrs. Phillips. It is my letter.

A letter from JUDITH PHILLIPS to her grace the duchess of Kingston read.

MY LADY DUCHESS,

I write your grace this letter.—My heart has ever been firmly attached to your grace's interest and pleasure, and my utmost wish to deserve your favour and countenance. Suffer me not then in my declining years to think I have forfeited that favour and protection, without intentionally giving the most distant cause.

May I intreat your grace to accept this as a sincere and humble submission for any failure of respect and duty to your grace; and permit me most humbly to intreat your grace's kind intercession with my lord duke to continue Mr. Phillips his steward, whose happiness consists only in acting and discharging his duty to his grace's pleasure. This additional mark of your grace's goodness we hope to be happy in; and in return, the remainder of our lives shall be passed in gratitude and duty. The person who carries this will wait to receive your grace's pleasure and commands to her, who remains, with the greatest respect,

My lady duchess,

Your grace's most dutiful servant,

J. PHILLIPS.

November 7, 1771.

Mr. Attorney General. The evidence, your lordships will recollect, given by the witness was in answer to a question, whether her husband had or had not been turned out of his place? pointing the question so as to give your lordships, and to give the witness to understand, that they meant the circumstance of being turned out of his place should go personally to the discredit of her husband, and also imply some memory of that in the mind of the wife. The witness, in answer to that, told your lordships, with respect to such part of it as might be deemed to relate to her husband's credit in the business, that he had resigned his place under the duke. The letters which I have in my hand, and will just state to your lordships, if it be thought necessary before the calling of the witness, is that very correspondence, by which it appears that he did so resign his employment under his grace into his grace's hands. He wrote to his grace at Newmarket from Holm Pierrepont. The letter is dated the 17th of October 1771. And he writes thus:

I Have ever done my duty with the strictest regard to your grace's interest, and with the most perfect respect. I have declined accepting a good settlement, to act conformable to your grace's pleasure, which her grace was pleased to promise should be made up to me, which must have escaped her grace's memory, as I have since had my rent considerably raised, and am much concerned to observe lately your grace's displeasure; and being conscious of a faithful discharge of my duty, I must be unjustly represented to your grace. I hope your grace will be pleased to permit my delivering up the charge of your grace's affairs, which, as an honest man, I can only properly keep, while satisfied myself, and honoured with your grace's approbation, &c.

In answer to which he received this letter:

Mr. Phillips,

Your letter came to me at Newmarket. After what has passed, there is no occasion for many words. Sherin will be at Holm Pierrepont some time next week, with my orders about settling your business, which I flatter myself you will readily comply with.

I am yours, &c. &c.

I believe I may refer to your lordships memory, that Mrs. Phillips mentioned his grace's having looked coolly on her husband, which occasioned his resignation.

A Peer. What is that, Mr. Attorney General, that you have been reading?

Mr. Attorney General. The first is a copy of a letter to the duke; the other, the duke's original answer. If it is thought material enough to trouble your lordships with it, we can easily prove that this is his grace's hand-writing, and this the copy of his grace's letter, which was all that was necessary.

Adjourned to Monday.

Monday, April 22. The fifth and last day.

THE lords and others came from the chamber of parliament in the customary order. Proclamation for silence being made as usual, the duchess of Kingston was conducted to the bar, when her grace addressed the lords in the following terms:

My lords,

This my respectful address will, I flatter myself, be favourably accepted by your lordships: my words will flow freely from my heart, adorned simply with innocence and truth. My lords, I have suffered unheard-of persecutions; my honour and fame have been severely attacked; I have been loaded with reproaches; and such indignities and hardships have rendered me the less able to make my defence before this august assembly against a prosecution of so extraordinary a nature, and so undeserved.

My lords, with tenderness consider how difficult is the task of myself to speak, nor say too little nor too much. Degraded as I am by adversities; my family despised; the honourable titles on which I set an inestimable value, as received from my most noble and late dear husband, attempted to be torn from me; your lordships will judge how greatly I stand in need of your protection and indulgence.

My lords, were I here to plead for life, for fortune, no words from me should beat the air: the loss I sustain in my most kind companion and affectionate husband, makes the former more than indifferent to me; and, when it shall please Almighty God to call me, I shall willingly lay that burthen down. I plead before your lordships for my fame and honour.

My lords, logic is properly defined, and well represented in this high court. It is a talent of the human mind, and not of the body, and holds a key which signifies, that logic is not a science itself, but the key to science. That key is your lordships judicial capacity and wisdom. On the left hand is represented a hammer, and before it a piece of false, and another of pure gold. The hammer is your penetrating judgment, which, by the mercy of God, will strike hard at false witnesses who have given evidence against me, and prove my intention in this pending cause as pure as the finest gold, and as justly distinguished from the sophistry of falsehood.

My lords, your unhappy prisoner is born of an ancient, not ignoble family; the women distinguished for their virtue, the men for their valour; descended in an honourable and uninterrupted line for three centuries and a half. Sir John Chudleigh, the last of my family, lost his life at the siege of Ostend, at eighteen years of age, gloriously preferring to die with his colours in his bosom, rather than accept of quarter from a gallant French officer, who, in compassion to his youth, three times offered him his life for that ensign, which was shot through his heart. A happy death! that saves the blush he would now feel for the unheard-of injuries and dishonour thrown on his unfortunate kinswoman, who is now at the bar of this right honourable house.

His grace the late duke of Kingston's fortune, of which I now stand possessed, is valuable to me, as it is a testimony to all the world how high I was in his esteem. As it is my pride to have been the object of affection of that virtuous man, so shall it be my honour to bestow that fortune to the honour of him who gave it to me; well knowing, that the wise disposer of all things would not have put it in his heart to prefer me to all others, but that I should be as faithful a steward, as I was a faithful wife; and that I should suffer others, more worthy than myself, to share these his great benefits of fortune.

My lords, I now appeal to the feelings of your own hearts, whether it is not cruel, that I should be brought as a criminal to a public trial for an act committed under the sanction of the laws;—an act that was honoured with his majesty's most gracious approbation; and previously known and approved of by my royal mistress, the late princess-dowager of Wales; and likewise authorized by the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Your lordships will not discredit so respectable a court, and disgrace those judges who there so legally and honourably preside. The judges of the Ecclesiastical Court do not receive their patents from the crown, but from the archbishops or bishops. Their jurisdiction is competent in ecclesiastical cases, and their proceedings are conformable to the laws and customs of the land, according to the testimony of the learned judge Blackstone (whose works are as entertaining as they are instructive), who says, 'It must be acknowledged, to the honour of the spiritual courts, that though they continue to this day to decide many questions which are properly of temporal cognizance, yet justice is in general so ably and impartially administered in those tribunals (especially of the superior kind), and the boundaries of their power are now so well known and established, that no material inconvenience at present arises from their jurisdiction. And should an alteration be attempted, great confusion would probably arise, in overturning long established forms, new modelling a course of proceedings that has now prevailed for seven centuries.'—And I must here presume to add, as founded on truth, that that court (of which his majesty is the head) cannot be stopped by any authority whatsoever, while they act in their own jurisdiction.—Lord Chief Justice Hale says, 'Where there has been a sentence of divorce (which is a criminal case), if that sentence is suspended by an appeal to the court of Arches (as a superior court), and while that appeal is depending one of the parties marries again, the sentence will be a justification within the exception of the act of parliament, notwithstanding that the sentence has been appealed from, and consequently may be reversed by a superior court.' And, my lords, how much more reason is there for its coming within the exception of the act in my case, since no appeal had been made?

My lords, I earnestly look up to your lordships for protection, as being now a sufferer for having given credit to the Ecclesiastical Court. I respectfully call upon you, my lords, to protect the spiritual jurisdiction, and all the benefit of religious laws, and me, an unhappy prisoner, who instituted a suit of jactitation upon the advice of a learned civilian, who carried on the prosecution, from which I obtained the sentence that authorized your prisoner's marriage with the most noble Evlyn duke of Kingston; that sentence solemnly pronounced by John Bettefworth, doctor of laws, vicar-general of the right reverend father in God Richard by divine permission lord bishop of London, and official principal of the Consistorial Court of London: the judge thereof, calling on God, and setting him alone before his eyes, and hearing counsel in that cause, did pronounce, that your prisoner, then the honourable Elizabeth Chudleigh, now Elizabeth dowager duchess of Kingston, was free from all matrimonial contracts or espousals, as far as to him at that time appeared, more especially with the said right honourable Augustus John Hervey.

My lords, had this prosecution been set on foot merely for the love of justice, or good example to the community, why did they not institute their prosecution during the five years your prisoner was received and acknowledged the undoubted and unmolested wife of the late duke of Kingston?

My lords, the preamble of the very act on which I am indicted, plainly and intirely precludes your prisoner: it runs thus: 'Forasmuch as divers evil-disposed persons, being married, run out of one county into another, or into places where they are not known, and there become to be married, having another wife or husband living, to the great dishonour of God, and utter undoing of divers honest mens children, and others, &c.' And as the preamble has not been considered to be sufficient in my favour to impede the trial, I beg leave to observe how much your prisoner suffers by being produced before this noble house, on the penalty of an act of parliament, without benefiting by the preamble, which is supposed to contain the whole substance, extent, and meaning of the act.

My lords, upon your wife's refusal on my unhappy case, you will bear in your willing remembrance, that the orphan and widow is your peculiar care; and that you will be tender of the honour of your late brother's name, and see in me his widow and representative, recollecting how easy it may be for a next of kin to prosecute the widows or the daughters, not only of every peer, but of every subject of Great-Britain, if it can be effected by the oath of one superannuated and interested old woman; who declared seven years ago that she was incapable of giving evidence thereon, as will appear in proof before your lordships. And I may further observe to your lordships, that my case is clearly within the proviso of the statute on which I am indicted. In the third clause, it is 'provided that this act shall not extend to any person, where the former marriage hath been, or hereafter shall be, declared by sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court to be void, and of no effect.'

If there is supposed to have been a former marriage, the same must have been a true marriage, or a false one. If a true one, it cannot be declared void; and if a false one, or the semblance of one only, then only, and no otherwise, is it that it can be declared void.—Therefore must this proviso have respect to pretended marriages only, and to none other: and such only it is, that can be the objects of causes of jactitation, the sentence in which is a more effectual divorce and separation of the parties, than many divorces which have been determined to fall within this proviso.—The crime charged in the indictment was not a felony, or even a temporal offence, until the act of James the first: till then, it was only cognizable in the Ecclesiastical Court; and though an indictment could lie for a slight blow, yet the common law did not allow of a criminal prosecution for polygamy until that period: so that if the case comes within the exception of the only statute upon that subject, it is no offence at all; and Dr. Sherlock, bishop of London, has said, in such cases the law of the land is the law of God.

My lords, I have observed, that I had greatly suffered in fame and fortune by the reports of Mr. Hervey; and I beg leave to mention in what manner. Your prisoner was at that time possessed of a small estate in the county of Devon, where Sir George Chudleigh, her father's eldest brother, had large possessions. The purchase of that estate was much solicited in that county; and having frequent opportunities to dispose of it, it was ever made an insuperable objection by the intended purchaser, that I could not make a clear title to the estate on account of Mr. Hervey's claim to your prisoner as his wife.

And your prisoner being also possessed of building lands for a great number of years, for the same reasons she never had the ground covered (valued at 1,200*l.* p. r. annum). And as your prisoner's health declined, and made it necessary for her to seek relief in foreign climes (which increased her expences beyond what her circumstances could support), and her little fortune daily decreased by money taken up on mortgage and bond, as will appear by the evidence of Mr. Drummond; her royal mistress likewise in the decline of life, whose death would probably have deprived her of 400*l.* a-year; the persecutions threatened on Mr. Hervey's side presented but a gloomy prospect for her declining life; your prisoner was induced, as she before observed to your lordships, to follow the advice of Dr. Collier, and instituted the suit of jactitation, your prisoner subscribing entirely to his opinion, and following his advice and instructions, which she presumes alone is a full defence against the charge of felony; for your lordships in your great candour cannot think, that a lady can know more of the civil law, than her learned civilians could point out to her.

And as a criminal and felonious intent is necessary to constitute the offence with which I stand charged, certainly I cannot be guilty in following the advice I received, and in doing what in my conscience I thought an authorized and innocent act.

My lords, though I am aware, that any person can prosecute for the crown for an offence against an act of parliament, yet I will venture to say, that few instances, if any, have been carried into execution without the consent of the party injured: and with great deference to your lordships judgment I venture to declare, that in the present case no person whatever has been injured, unless your lordships candour will permit me to say that I am injured, being now the object of the undeserved resentment of my enemies. It is plain to all the world, that his grace the duke of Kingston did not think himself injured, when in the short space of five years his grace made three wills, each succeeding one more favourable to your prisoner than the other, giving the most generous and incontestable proof of his affection and solicitude for my comfort and dignity. And it is more than probable, my lords, from the well-known mutual friendship subsisting between us, that had I been interested, I might have obtained the bulk of his fortune for my own family. But I respected his honour, I loved his virtues, and had rather have forfeited my life than have used any undue influence to injure the family. And though it has been industriously and cruelly circulated, with a view to prejudice me, that the first-born of the late duke's sister was deprived of the succession to his grace's fortune by my influence, the wills, my lords, made in three distant periods, each excluding him, demonstrate the calumny of these reports.

I must further observe to your lordships, in opposition to the charge against me of interestedness, that had I possessed or exercised that undue influence with which I am charged by the prosecutor, I might have obtained more than a life-interest in the duke's fortune. And though from the affection I bear to the memory of my late much-honoured husband, I have forborne to mention the reason of his disinheriting his eldest nephew, yet Charles, the second son, with his heirs, appear immediately after me in succession; William and his heirs follow next; after him Edward and his heirs; and the unfortunate Thomas, lady Frances's youngest son, is not excluded, though labouring under the infirmities of childhood at the age of manhood, and not able to support himself. For the late noble duke of Kingston repeatedly mentioned to your prisoner, 'I have not excluded him, for he has never offended; and who can say God cannot restore him? Who can say that God will not restore him to health?' My lords, that good man did honour to the peerage, honour to his country, honour to human nature.

His grace the most noble duke of Newcastle appeared with the will, which had been intrusted to his grace for four years by his late dear friend. In honour to the lady Frances Meadows, the prosecutor was requested to attend at the opening of the will. He retired with displeasure, disappointed that his eldest son was disinherited, and unthankful, though the duke's fortune still centered in his four youngest sons and their posterity.

My lords, worn down by sorrow, and in a wretched state of health, I quitted England without a wish for that life which I was obliged by the laws of God and nature to endeavour to preserve; for your prisoner can with great truth say, that sorrow had bent her mind to a perfect resignation to the will of Providence. And, my lords, while your unhappy prisoner was endeavouring to re-establish her greatly-impaired health abroad, my prosecutor filed a bill in Chancery upon the most unjust and dishonourable motives. Your prisoner does not complain of his endeavouring to establish a right to himself; but she does complain of his forming a plea on dishonourable and unjust opinions of his late noble relation and generous benefactor, to the prejudice and discredit of his much-afflicted widow: and not satisfied with this prosecution, as a bulwark for his suit in Chancery, he cruelly instituted a criminal prosecution, in hopes, by a conviction in a criminal cause, to establish a civil claim; a proceeding discountenanced by the opinion of the late lord Northington.

My lords, I have heretofore forbore, from the great love and affection to my late noble lord, to mention what were the real motives that induced his grace to disinherit his eldest nephew; and when my plea and answer in Chancery were to be argued, I particularly requested of the counsel to abstain from any reflections upon my adversaries, which the nature of their prosecutions too much deserved; and grieved I am now, that I must no longer conceal them. For as self-preservation is the first law of nature, and as I am more and more persecuted in my fortune and my fame, and my enemies hand about pocket-evidence to injure me in every company, and with double tongues they sting me to the heart, I am reduced to the sad necessity of saying, that the late duke of Kingston was made acquainted with the fatal cruelty with which Mr. Evelyn Meadows treated an unfortunate lady, who was as amiable as she was virtuous and beautiful; to cover which offence, he most ungratefully and falsely declared, that he broke his engagements with her for fear of disobliging the duke, which he has often been heard to say. This, with his cruelty to his sister and mother, and an attempt to quit actual service in the late war, highly offended the duke; and it would be difficult for him, or his father, to boast of the least friendly intercourse with his grace for upwards of eighteen years.

My lords, in a dangerous state of health, when my life was despaired of, I received a letter from my solicitor, acquainting me, that if I did not return to England to put in an answer to the bill in Chancery within twenty-one days, I should have receivers put into my estates; and also, that if in contempt of the indictment I did not return, I should be outlawed. It clearly appeared to me, my lords, as I make no doubt it does to your lordships, that if in the inclemency of the weather I risked to pass the Alps, my life would probably be endangered, and the family would immediately enter into possession of the real estates, and if female fears should prevail, that I should be outlawed. Thus was I to be deprived of life and fortune under colour of law. And that I might not return to these persecuting summonses, by some undue and cruel proceedings my credit was stopped by my banker for £4,000, when there remained an open account of £75,000, and at that instant upwards of £6,000 was in his hands, my revenues being constantly paid into his shop to my credit. Thus was I commanded to return home at the manifest risk of my life, and at the same time every art used to deprive me of the means of returning for my justification. Conscious of the perfect innocence of my intention, and convinced that the laws of this country could not be so inconsistent as to authorize an act, and then defame and degrade me for having obeyed it, I left Italy at the hazard of my life. It was not for property I returned, but to prove myself an honourable woman. Grant me, my lords, but your good opinion, and that I stand justified in the innocence of my intention, and you can deprive me of nothing that I value, even if you should take from me all my worldly possessions; for I have rested on that seat where the poor blind Belsharius is said to have asked charity of every passer, after having conquered the Goths and Vandals, Africans and Persians; and would do the same without murmuring, if you would pronounce me, what I hope your lordships will cheerfully subscribe to—that I am an honourable woman.

My lords, your late brother, the truly honourable duke of Kingston, whose life was adorned by every virtue and every grace, does not his most respectable character plead my cause and prove my innocence?

My lords, the evidence of the fact of a supposed clandestine marriage with Mr. Hervey depends entirely upon the testimony of Ann Cradock.

I am persuaded your lordships, from the manner in which she gave her evidence, already entertain great suspicions of the veracity of her testimony. She pretends to speak to a marriage ceremony being performed, at which she was not asked to be present, nor can she assign any reason for her being there.—She relates a conduct in Mrs. Hanner, who she pretends was present at the ceremony, inconsistent with a real marriage. She acknowledges that she was in or about London during the jactitation suit, and that Mr. Hervey applied to her on that occasion; and swears that she then and ever had a perfect remembrance of the marriage, and was ready to have proved it, had she been called upon, and never declared to any person that she had not a perfect memory of the marriage, and that she never was desired either to give or withhold her evidence; and from Mr. Hervey's not calling on this woman, it is insinuated he obtained from the proof by collusion with me. She also swears, that I offered to make her an allowance of twenty guineas a-year, provided she would reside in either of the three counties she has mentioned, but acknowledges she has received no allowance from me. Can your lordships believe, that if I could have been weak enough to have instituted the suit, with a conviction in my own mind of a real lawful-marriage between Mr. Hervey and myself, that I would not, at any expence, have taken care to have put that woman out of the way? But, my lords, I trust that your lordships will be perfectly satisfied, that great part of the evidence of this woman is made for the purpose of the prosecution. Though she has denied she has any expect-tation from the event, or ever declared so, yet it will be proved to your lordships, that her future provision (as she has declared) depends upon it; and notwithstanding she has now brought herself up to swear that she heard the ceremony of marriage performed, yet it will be proved that she has declared she did not hear it. And it will be further proved to your lordships, that Mr. Hervey was extremely solicitous to have established a legal marriage with me for the purpose mentioned by Mr. Hawkins, and that this woman was actually applied to, and declared to Mr. Hervey's solicitor, that her memory was impaired, and that she had not any recollection of it, which was the reason why she was not called as a witness.

My lords, if she is thus contradicted in these particulars, and appears under the influence of expectations from this event of the prosecution, your lordships will not credit her evidence, that the complete ceremony of marriage was performed, or any other particulars which rest upon her evidence.

My lords, with respect to what your lordships have heard from the witnesses, of my desire at times to be considered as the wife of Mr. Hervey, your lordships in your candour will naturally account for that circumstance, after the unfortunate connection that had subsisted between us.

My lords, I call God Almighty, the searcher of hearts, to witness, that at the time of my marriage with the duke of Kingston, I had, myself, the most perfect conviction that it was lawful. That noble duke, to whom every passage of my life had been disclosed, and whose affection for me, as well as regard for his own honour, would never have suffered him to have married me, had he not as well as myself received the most solemn assurances from doctor Collier, that the sentence, which had been pronounced in the Ecclesiastical Court, was absolutely final and conclusive, and that I was perfectly at liberty to marry any another person. If therefore I have offended against the letter of the act, I have so offended without criminal intention. Where such intention does not exist, your lordships justice and humanity will tell you there can be no crime; and your lordships, looking on my distressed situation with an indulgent eye, will pity me as an unfortunate woman, deceived and misled by erroneous notions of law, of the propriety of which it was impossible for me to judge.

My lords, before I take my leave, permit me to express my warm and grateful sense of the candour and indulgence of your lordships, which have given me the firmest confidence that I shall not be deemed criminal by your lordships for an act, in which I had not the least suspicion that there was any thing illegal or immoral.

My lords, I have lost, or mislaid, a paper, where I had put together my ideas to present to your lordships. The purport was to tell your lordships, that my advocate doctor Collier, who instituted this suit of jactitation, is now in a dangerous state of health. He has had two physicians to attend him, by my order, yesterday, to insist and order his attendance to acquaint your lordships, that I acted entirely under his directions; that it was by his advice I married his grace the duke of Kingston, assuring me that it was lawful; that he had the honour of going to his grace the archbishop of Canterbury to obtain a licence, and to explain every part that regarded the cause; that his grace was so just, so pious, and so good, as to take time to consider whether he would grant us a special licence for the marriage. After mature consideration and consultation with great and honourable persons in the law, he returned the licence to doctor Collier, with full permission for our marriage. Doctor Collier was present at the marriage; doctor Collier signed the register of St. George's church. Mr. La Roche has frequently attended the duke of Kingston to doctor Collier, where he heard him consult the doctor if the marriage would be lawful: he said it would, and never could be controverted.

Under these circumstances, I wished to bring my advocate forth to protect me. He, my lords, is willing to make an affidavit, to be examined by the enemy's counsel, to submit to any thing that your lordships can command, willing to justify his conduct; but he has had the misfortune, my lords, ever since the latter end of August, or the first week in September, I do not well remember which, never to have been in bed. I apprehended, from seeing him yesterday, with your lordships indulgence, that he had the faint Anthony's fire: but my physicians, who have been with him, can give a better account, if you will permit them, of the state of his health, that your lordships may not imagine that he keeps back, or that I am afraid to produce him. If it is not to avail me in law, I ask no favour: but I petition your lordships, and would upon my knees, that you will hear the evidence that he will give to the justification of my honour, though it does not avail me in law.

My lords, I do request that doctor Collier may be examined in the strictest manner, and by every enemy that I have in the world. My physicians saw him last night; and they can, previous to his examination, inform your lordships in what state they apprehend him to be.

Lord Ravensthorpe. After what I have just heard from the prisoner at the bar, it is impossible not to feel equally with the rest of your lordships: and, my lords, what came last from the prisoner at the bar I own strikes me with the necessity of permission being given, if it could be done, to have doctor Collier examined.

Lord Camden. I am really, my lords, at some loss to know, upon what ground it is your lordships stand at this moment with respect to the evidence of doctor Collier. I do not understand yet, that doctor Collier is called by the prisoner or by her counsel. I do not yet understand, that in consideration of the infirm state of his health, the prisoner or her counsel do require from your lordships any specific particular mode of examination, by which your lordships might be apprised of the substance of his evidence. I understand neither of these things to be moved to your lordships: if they were, matter of debate on either one or the other might probably arise; and then this is not the place for your lordships to enter into a consideration of it. With regard to the case itself, which the noble prisoner has made for one of her most material witnesses, it is undoubtedly such as would touch your lordships with a proper degree of compassion, as far as the justice of the court can go, and your feelings are able to indulge; beyond that it is impossible, let your lordships desire be what it may: for you to transgress transgress the law of the land, or to go beyond the rules prescribed by those laws, is impossible. A witness so infirm that he is totally incapable of attendance! Your lordships, if you are to lose his evidence, will lament the want of it: justice cannot be so perfect and complete without the examination of a necessary and material witness, as if you had it. But if a greater evil than that should happen (and it has frequently happened in the course of causes), which is death itself, which shuts up the mouth in everlasting silence, if this should arrest the witness before he could be produced, his evidence is lost for ever. If this witness should by his infirmity be totally unable to attend whilst this cause lasts, I am sorry to say your lordships must go on without him; it is impossible to wait until that witness can be produced. While the cause lasts (and your lordships will precipitate nothing in the course of justice) if he can be brought, you will make every accommodation to receive him, you will take every means in your power to make the attendance safe and convenient for him, you will receive him in any part of the cause, even at the last moment before it is concluded. So far your lordships may go; beyond that, I doubt, you cannot. But, my lords, I have now been speaking without a question, without a motion, without any thing demanded of your lordships by the prisoner or by her counsel.

Lord Ravensworth. I would beg leave to put it to those noble lords who sit upon the bench, whether there ever was an instance in a criminal cause of a witness being examined otherwise than in open court?

Lord Camden. The noble lord is pleased to put a question particularly pointed to such of your lordships as have been educated in the profession of the law, to know 'whether any instance can be produced where a witness, not attending at your bar to be examined viva voce, has been permitted by commission, by delegation, or any other manner whatever, to give his evidence out of court, so that that evidence, so given out of court, might be reported into the court, and stand as evidence on the trial?' I presume that is the point, in which the noble lord desires to know if any precedent can be produced. When that question is asked, and the answer is to be a negative, your lordships easily conceive how much the modesty of the answerer is to be affected, if he gives a full, a positive, and a round negative to that question. I therefore beg to be understood as confining the answer to my own knowledge. Within the course of my own practice and experience, I never did know of such an instance; I never have, to the best of my memory, read of such an instance; I never heard of such an instance: I speak in the presence of those who are better-versed in this kind of knowledge than myself; I speak before the law of the land, which is now upon your lordships' wool-sacks. My lords, if any such case occurs to them, it will be easy for your lordships to apply to them; I know of no such; and if I might add briefly one word on the subject, I hope I shall never see such an instance so long as I live in this world. What, my lords! to give up, and to part with, that noble privilege in the mode of open trial, of examinations of witnesses viva voce at your bar, with a cross examination to confront them in the eye of the world, and to transfer that to a private chamber on a few written interrogatories! I go too far in arguing the point: I never knew an instance. I am in the judgment of the house, and of the learned judges that hear me; if there ever was an instance, let it be produced, and in God's name let justice be done.

The lords then proceeded to hear the witnesses.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Wallace, you may proceed to call your witnesses.

Mr. Wallace. The first witness I would call is

Mr. BERKLEY, who was sworn in like manner.

Mr. Berkley. My lords, what knowledge I had of this business arose from my being attorney to lord Bristol; and I must leave it to your lordships, whether I ought to be examined as being attorney for lord Bristol, consistent with honour to myself and the duty I owe to him.

Mr. Wallace. I know the delicacy of the situation of an attorney: I merely call Mr. Berkley to what passed between him and Mrs. Craddock, being sent to get her to attend and prove the marriage.

Lord Mansfield. With regard to the demurrer put in by Mr. Berkley to the question that is asked him, when they make him a witness, they subject him to cross examinations; but the point is, whether he, as being concerned as solicitor for my lord Bristol, can demur to the question put to him to know, what this woman said when he went to desire her to come to give evidence? And as to that, there seems to be no colour to the demurrer; for the protection of attorneys is as to what is revealed to them by their client, in order to take their advice or instruction with regard to their defence. This is no secret of the client, but is to a collateral fact, what a party said to him upon such an application; and it has been often determined, that as to fact an attorney or counsel has no privilege to withhold his evidence, if there is a doubt: even if he swears to an answer in Chancery, he cannot protect himself from swearing, whether that is his client's hand or not, or to his having sworn it, or the execution of a deed: it does not come within the objection to an attorney revealing the secrets of his client. I suppose it is only mentioned to your lordships for a justification. If none of your lordships are of a different opinion, it will save time, and the witness will understand it to be the opinion of all your lordships.

Mr. Wallace. I beg to know, whether you ever made any application to Mrs. Craddock relative to her being a witness to the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. I did.

Mr. Wallace. At what time?

Mr. Berkley. It was after my lord Bristol was served with a citation to Dollers Commons.

Mr. Wallace. For what purpose did you apply to her?

Mr. Berkley. To know, what she knew relative to the marriage between lord Bristol and Miss Chudleigh.

Vol. XI.

Mr. Wallace. What answer did Mrs. Craddock give to that?

Mr. Berkley. My lord Bristol was present. She said she was very old, very infirm, and the transaction happened many years ago, and she could not at that distance of time remember any thing of the matter: upon which my lord Bristol seemed vastly surprized, and said, How can you say so? or to that effect.

Mr. Wallace. Did she persist in not remembering any thing of the transaction?

Mr. Berkley. She did, and said she remembered nothing of the matter; and that was the only time I ever saw her.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I shall ask Mr. Berkley no more questions.

Mr. Attorney General. Was you sent to her as a person that was present at the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. I was employed in order to collect evidence from different people, whom my lord Bristol directed me to go to, and other people, with respect to the marriage, as his lordship wanted to have a divorce; and in that way I saw Mrs. Craddock.

Mr. Attorney General. Did lord Bristol explain his want of a divorce at the time he sent you to the witness?

Mr. Berkley. The direction I had from my lord was in May 1768.

Mr. Attorney General. Was it at that time that my lord Bristol told you he wanted a divorce?

Mr. Berkley. It was.

Mr. Attorney General. What you have said was after the citation?

Mr. Berkley. When I saw the witness, as well as I remember, it was after the citation.

Mr. Attorney General. Did lord Bristol describe the witness to you as present at the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. He did. My lord said, that she could prove the marriage.

Mr. Attorney General. When lord Bristol expressed himself surprized at that disappointment, did he then express to you, that she was one of those present at the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. I do not know that my lord did.

Mr. Attorney General. Was she never represented to you as a person present at the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. I understood, as she was represented to me, that she was present at the marriage.

Mr. Attorney General. Was her husband, Mr. Craddock, ever represented as being present at that marriage?

Mr. Berkley. Mr. Craddock has often told me, that he was not.

Mr. Attorney General. The question that I mean to put upon that is, why was the husband called who was not present at the marriage, and the wife not called who was represented to be present at the marriage?

Mr. Berkley. I know nothing of that; it went out of my hands afterwards to Dollers Commons.

Mr. Attorney General. Did you decline that part of the business in respect to Dollers Commons?

Mr. Berkley. I apprehend, I could not act there.

Mr. Wallace. Are you an attorney or a proctor?

Mr. Berkley. An attorney, not a proctor.

Ordered to withdraw.

Mr. Mansfield. My lords, we are now going to call Mrs. Ann Pritchard to contradict part of the evidence of Ann Craddock. We beg the clerk may read the part alluded to.

The clerk of the parliament was ordered to read that part of the evidence; but not having taken it down, Mr. Gurney was ordered to produce his notes. When they were produced, the part alluded to could not be found; and

Mr. Mansfield addressed himself to the lords thus: This witness, Ann Pritchard, is called to contradict Mrs. Craddock. In the first place, to prove that she has told this Mrs. Pritchard, that she had some expectations of advantage from this prosecution; and likewise, that she did tell this witness, that she did not hear any part of the ceremony read at the time when she said the lady at the bar and lord Bristol were married, though she has repeatedly told your lordships that she had no view of advantage from this cause, and that she had heard the whole of the ceremony read.

ANN PRITCHARD, who was sworn in like manner.

Mr. Mansfield. Do you know Mrs. Craddock?

Ann Pritchard. Yes.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you ever had any conversation with Mrs. Craddock concerning the reading the marriage ceremony between the lady at the bar and lord Bristol?

Ann Pritchard. No, I never had.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you ever hear Mrs. Craddock say any thing concerning that ceremony, or her having heard it, or not heard it?

Ann Pritchard. Never, before she was examined.

Mr. Mansfield. What do you mean, before she was examined?

Ann Pritchard. Before a master in Chancery.

Mr. Mansfield. When was that?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot particularly say the time; it was about a month after I was examined, to the best of my knowledge.

Mr. Mansfield. When was you examined?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot particularly say the time when she was examined.

Mr. Mansfield. Can you recollect how many months ago?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot indeed; it might be a year and an half ago.

Mr. Mansfield. What did Mrs. Craddock say to you in that conversation, which she had with you, about her having heard or not having heard the marriage ceremony?

T t t

Ann

Ann Pritchard. She related her examination before the master in Chancery concerning her grace's marriage.

Mr. Mansfield. In that conversation, did Mrs. Cradock say whether she had or had not heard the marriage ceremony read?

Ann Pritchard. I never heard her relate any thing concerning the marriage ceremony. I understand the question now: I did not before. She told me, she did not hear the marriage ceremony.

Lord High Steward. Let the last question be asked over again.

Mr. Mansfield. Whether Mrs. Cradock did or did not say to you, Mrs. Pritchard, that she did or did not hear the marriage ceremony read?

Ann Pritchard. She told me, she did not hear the marriage ceremony read.

Mr. Mansfield. Had you any conversation with Mrs. Cradock about any advantage which she expected from this prosecution?

Ann Pritchard. I had.

Mr. Mansfield. What did Mrs. Cradock say to you in that conversation?

Ann Pritchard. She told me she was to be provided for, but in what manner she could not say, till after the affair was over, lest it should be deemed bribery.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you hear any thing more said by Mrs. Cradock relating to that subject?

Ann Pritchard. Not at that time, but at another time I have.

Mr. Mansfield. What did you hear from her at the other time?

Ann Pritchard. I gave her an invitation to come to see me. She told me, it would not suit her until this affair was over; and then if she should get a good fortune, she might come and live with me.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you hear from Mrs. Cradock any thing said of any particular provision to be made for her, or any place to be got?

Ann Pritchard. Her brother applied to my husband at the Custom-House, desiring him in case he heard of a vacancy to let him know.

Mr. Attorney General. This is not evidence in the question now proposed. I know nothing of what will be brought; but this is not evidence.

Mr. Mansfield. Nothing that passes, unless it comes home to Mrs. Cradock, will be evidence, to be sure. The witness must relate it in her own manner.

Mr. Attorney General. I object to the witness relating either in her own or in any other manner whatever, a conversation to which Mrs. Cradock is not a party.

Mr. Mansfield. It is under an apprehension that it will come to Mrs. Cradock, or it would not be asked.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you tell to Mrs. Cradock what you heard from her husband?

Ann Pritchard. I told her myself, that her brother had been at the Custom-House to desire my husband, when there was a vacancy in the house, to let him know of it, as Mr. Meadows had promised to get him a place.

Mr. Mansfield. What did Mrs. Cradock say to you upon your telling her this?

Ann Pritchard. She had never heard any thing about it.

Mr. Mansfield. Did Mrs. Cradock say any thing more to you about this place?

Ann Pritchard. Her answer was, it was more than she knew, but that it would be equally the same.

Mr. Mansfield. What was meant by being equally the same?

Ann Pritchard. She thought her brother was to provide for her out of it, or at least allow her something.

Mr. Attorney General. How long have you been acquainted with Mrs. Cradock?

Ann Pritchard. Five years.

Mr. Attorney General. How long with the prisoner?

Ann Pritchard. From the 2d of February last.

Mr. Attorney General. I wish to know whether any body was present at any of the conversations which you had with Mrs. Cradock, but yourself?

Ann Pritchard. No.

Mr. Attorney General. I wish you would tell where they were?

Ann Pritchard. Once at my own house at Mile-End.

Mr. Attorney General. At what time was that conversation held at your house at Mile-End?

Ann Pritchard. It was on a Sunday, but I cannot particularly tell the month.

Mr. Attorney General. How long ago was that Sunday?

Ann Pritchard. It was a very little time after she had been subpoenaed.

Mr. Attorney General. Do you know if it was a week, or more time, or less, after she had been subpoenaed?

Ann Pritchard. It might be more than a week, I cannot tell particularly.

Mr. Attorney General. What reason have you to know, that it was within some short time after she had been subpoenaed?

Ann Pritchard. As we were very intimate acquaintances, she came to dine with me. She told me, she longed to tell me what had happened since the last time she saw me.

Mr. Attorney General. But how long was that last time she saw you before that last time that she came to you again?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot particularly say.

Mr. Attorney General. As near as you can go; was it a fortnight?

Ann Pritchard. It might be a quarter of a year.

Mr. Attorney General. Have you any means of recollecting within a week or a fortnight of the time of her having been examined upon the subpoena?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot possibly recollect, as not expecting ever to be called upon.

Mr. Attorney General. Does your intimacy continue with Mrs. Cradock?

Ann Pritchard. It always did, until she has been confined at Mr. Beauwater's.

Mr. Attorney General. Did you ever mention this conversation to Mrs. Cradock, since the time it happened?

Ann Pritchard. No, never.

Mr. Attorney General. Will you give an account to their lordships of the whole conversation which Mrs. Cradock held upon the subject of that marriage; whether she told you the whole story of the marriage?

Ann Pritchard. She told me a great deal of it. I do not know the particulars.

Mr. Attorney General. It is important, that you should recollect as many particulars as you can, that Mrs. Cradock told you of that marriage. What particulars did Mrs. Cradock tell you of that marriage?

Ann Pritchard. She told me that she had been examined by a master in Chancery, who asked her if she knew of the marriage between Augustus John Hervey and Miss Chudleigh? They asked her if she was in the church? She answered, she was. They asked her who was in the church? She told them, herself, Mr. Merrill and Mrs. Hanmer. They asked her, if she heard the ceremony? She told him, she did not. That was all the particulars I heard her relate.

Mr. Attorney General. Had not you the curiosity yourself to enquire after some more particulars?

Ann Pritchard. I had not.

Mr. Attorney General. Did she ever tell you at what time of night it was?

Ann Pritchard. Never.

Mr. Attorney General. Was any body present at the conversation about the reward that the witness expected?

Ann Pritchard. No.

Mr. Attorney General. At what time was that conversation had?

Ann Pritchard. It was after dinner, it might be at two o'clock on the Sunday; it was summer-time I know, but I cannot particularly say the month.

Mr. Attorney General. Was it the same Sunday that the former conversation passed?

Ann Pritchard. No.

Mr. Attorney General. Whether, when the witness proposed, on her having a great fortune coming to her, that she should live with Mrs. Cradock, or Mrs. Cradock live with her?

Ann Pritchard. Mrs. Cradock live with me.

Mr. Attorney General. What are you?

Ann Pritchard. In a very creditable situation, and a pretty fortune. I live at Mile-End.

Mr. Attorney General. Do you carry on any business at Mile-End?

Ann Pritchard. No.

Mr. Attorney General. Are you married?

Ann Pritchard. Yes.

Mr. Attorney General. Has your husband any business?

Ann Pritchard. Yes; a place in the Custom-House.

Lord Grosvenor. What do you mean by Mrs. Cradock's being confined at Mr. Beauwater's?

Ann Pritchard. I went to enquire for her: I was not permitted to see her.

Lord Denbigh. I beg to know upon what account you saw the prisoner in February last?

Ann Pritchard. By an invitation to her house-keeper.

Lord Denbigh. Did you see the prisoner herself at that time?

Ann Pritchard. I did.

Lord Denbigh. What passed between you and the prisoner?

Ann Pritchard. I cannot particularly relate it; nothing material.

Lord Denbigh. Did nothing pass relative to this trial?

Ann Pritchard. Nothing.

Lord Denbigh. Did nothing pass relative to the conversations between you and Mrs. Cradock?

Ann Pritchard. I do not recollect there was.

Lord Weymouth. I think the witness has said, that Mrs. Cradock told her that she did not hear the ceremony read, and Mrs. Cradock has likewise told your lordships, that she was present when the ceremony was read: I should be glad to ask whether Mrs. Cradock gave any reason for not having heard the ceremony? whether, that she was at a distance in the church, or the clergyman did not speak loud enough?

Ann Pritchard. She was at too great a distance in the church.

Duke of Richmond. Did Mrs. Cradock tell you, that she had in her examination before the master in Chancery said, that she did not hear the ceremony read?

Ann Pritchard. She told me, she did.

A Lord. The counsel may produce that examination.

Lord Camden. I have been asking the same question, conceiving it would give light to your lordships, if it could be produced. I find that it is an examination de bene esse. Publication is not made, and the examinations are sealed up.

Ordered to withdraw.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I shall call witnesses now to prove the consultation of Dr. Collier; and I shall follow that, my lords, with a proof of what advice he gave to the noble lady at the bar and the duke of Kingston in the presence of a witness I have to produce. My lords, we have sent, but find there is no possibility of bringing Dr. Collier, or he should have been here.—We will now call

Dr. WARREN, who was sworn in like manner.

Mr. Wallace. I wish Dr. Warren would inform your lordships, whether he has lately seen Dr. Collier.

Dr. Warren. I visited Dr. Collier yesterday, about eight o'clock in the afternoon, and found him very ill under a variety of complaints, particularly a St. Anthony's fire in his head and face, by which one side of it was so much swelled, that the eye was almost closed up. It appeared to me that he could not venture out without great hazard.

Mr. Attorney General. I beg Dr. Warren may be asked, whether he thinks thinks Dr. Collier's condition such, that he could not stir out without danger?

Dr. Warren. I said so, my lords.

Mr. Attorney-General. What sort of danger do you mean, when you speak of the danger under which he would come out?

Dr. Warren. I think that he is in danger. I cannot say that it would certainly kill him, but it would be very imprudent in me to advise him to come out.

Ordered to withdraw.

Mr. Mansfield. The witnesses now intended to be produced to your lordships is Mr. Laroche. The purpose for which he is to be produced, is to tell your lordships, that he saw Dr. Collier frequently with the lady at the bar and the late duke of Kingston, during the suit in the Ecclesiastical Court; that he has himself heard Dr. Collier assure both the parties, the late duke of Kingston and the lady at the bar, after that sentence in the Spiritual Court, that they were perfectly free to marry, and might marry any one they pleased.

Mr. LAROCHE, who was sworn in like manner.

Mr. Laroche. My lords, I did not know, until within these few minutes, that it would be necessary to call me. I will endeavour to recollect to the best of my knowledge. I have got some memorandums in my pocket, and I hope I may be at liberty to refer to them.

Lord High Steward. Are they in your own writing?

Mr. Laroche. A copy of it, and it has been in my possession ever since it was copied.

A Lord. Copied by his desire?

Mr. Laroche. Yes, from my own notes, and in my presence, and has been in my own custody ever since.

Mr. Mansfield. Did you know the late duke of Kingston? and do you know Dr. Collier?

Mr. Laroche. Yes, I both knew his grace the duke of Kingston and Dr. Collier.

Mr. Mansfield. Was you present at the marriage of the lady at the bar and the duke of Kingston?

Mr. Laroche. I was.

Mr. Mansfield. Was Dr. Collier present also at the marriage?

Mr. Laroche. He was.

Mr. Mansfield. Do you know, that Dr. Collier was consulted by the lady at the bar and the duke of Kingston, while the suit was depending in the Spiritual Court?

Mr. Laroche. I do know, that I have frequently walked with his grace the duke of Kingston to Doctors Commons in a morning to Dr. Collier. I have gone also with the duchess in her coach, and the duke likewise, to Dr. Collier.

Mr. Mansfield. Has this happened frequently?

Mr. Laroche. Many times.

Mr. Mansfield. Was you ever present with Dr. Collier and the duke of Kingston and the lady at the bar, after that sentence had been given in that court?

Mr. Laroche. I was several times at Dr. Collier's chambers after the suit had been determined.

Mr. Mansfield. Was you present when Dr. Collier gave to the lady at the bar, or the late duke of Kingston, or both of them, any opinion concerning the effect of that sentence?

Mr. Laroche. I was many times at Dr. Collier's chambers, and in conversation I have heard Dr. Collier tell the duke, that he might with safety marry the duchess of Kingston, Miss Chudleigh as she then was.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you heard that opinion, or to that effect, given more than once?

Mr. Laroche. I cannot be exact: I have heard it said from Dr. Collier to the duke.

Mr. Mansfield. Have you heard that said also in the presence of the lady at the bar by Dr. Collier?

Mr. Laroche. I think I have, to the best of my recollection. I went with the duke of Kingston, I breakfasted with him, as well as I can recollect, the morning that he was married: we then agreed to dine together at the Thatched-House Tavern. I went into the city with his grace first of all to Dr. Collier's to get the licence. Dr. Collier, when we came there, was not at home, but was gone to his grace's house with the licence in his pocket.

Mr. Mansfield. My lords, these are all the questions I have to ask Mr. Laroche.

Mr. Dunning. My lords, I should be glad to ask Mr. Laroche, what the occasion was of taking these opinions of Dr. Collier? whether it arose about any doubt entertained by the duke or the lady, or both, whether they were at liberty to marry?

Mr. Laroche. The duke certainly had a doubt upon his breast, until the suit of jactitation was over. In consequence of that sentence, at the decree of which I was present, and which declared her a single woman, he applied to Dr. Collier to know whether there was any thing further to go on that might impede his marriage? He was told, No, that she was a single woman, and he might marry her.

Mr. Dunning. Were these conversations pending the suit, or after the suit was determined?

Mr. Laroche. The last conversation was after the suit was over. During the time of the suit, I have frequently, I suppose when I was in town I walked five days out of six into the city with the duke, and then we talked there to know how the suit went on.

Mr. Dunning. Do you recollect how long the suit had been determined before the marriage with the duke of Kingston?

Mr. Laroche. I should think, to the best of my recollection—I believe within three weeks. There were fourteen days to put in an appeal; the appeal was revoked, and I believe they married the week after.

Mr. Dunning. Did the duke's doubt continue until the day of the marriage?

Mr. Laroche. He had no doubt after he had applied for the licence, and the licence had been granted.

Mr. Dunning. What was the occasion of the conversation that passed upon the morning of the marriage between the duke and Dr. Collier?

Mr. Laroche. There was no conversation upon it, as I remember, between them upon the morning of the marriage?

Mr. Dunning. When did Dr. Collier inform the duke, that he might marry?

Mr. Laroche. It was, I believe, after the revocation of the appeal—but it was after the sentence was obtained.

Mr. Dunning. Will you be so good as to fix the time as nearly as you can, when both these conversations passed between Dr. Collier and the duke, and Dr. Collier and the duchess?

Mr. Laroche. As for ascertaining a time, I cannot; but it was from the meeting of the parliament in the month of October 1768. If I remember right, it was the beginning of the sessions of parliament before last; and during that time I used often to walk with the duke to Dr. Collier's.

Mr. Dunning. How many days was it before the marriage, if I am mistaken in supposing you said the day of the marriage?

Mr. Laroche. It might be three or four days, or within a week.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know that Dr. Collier had been in fact informed, that there had been a marriage between the lady and Mr. Hervey?

Mr. Laroche. I know nothing at all of that.

Mr. Dunning. Was you yourself informed at this time that there had been in fact a marriage between the lady and Mr. Hervey?

Mr. Laroche. I never knew that there had been a marriage.

Mr. Dunning. Had you been so informed, was my question?

Mr. Laroche. From hear-say, and nothing else. I heard there was a suspicion of a marriage, and that she had put him upon the proof of that marriage, and that he had failed in his proof.

Mr. Dunning. Had you, or had you not, been informed of the marriage by the lady herself?

Mr. Laroche. Never.

Mr. Dunning. Can you enable their lordships to judge, what was the occasion that drew the duke and duchess to make this application to Dr. Collier so recently before the marriage, and so long after the sentence?

Mr. Laroche. I suppose, the meaning of the duke's going there was to ask Dr. Collier, who had the whole management of the affair, whether he could with safety marry the duchess.

Mr. Dunning. Do you know whether any body had or had not suggested a doubt upon the subject?

Mr. Laroche. There had been a doubt before the sentence, but after the sentence there was no doubt; but still he thought proper to ask him, because there was an appeal: that appeal was revoked, and after that appeal he married.

Mr. Mansfield. If your lordships will permit me, I will ask one question of Mr. Laroche. Whether in the opinion that Dr. Collier gave to the duke of Kingston in his hearing, Dr. Collier founded his opinion upon the effect of that sentence which had passed?

Mr. Laroche. He certainly did, in my conception of the matter.

Mr. Dunning. I should be glad to know, whether the witness meant to have it understood upon what Dr. Collier founded his opinion, that such a marriage, if it had been lawful, could be set aside by those proceedings?

Mr. Laroche. The words I heard were these: You may safely marry Miss Chudleigh, my lord, for you neither offend against the laws of God or man.

Lord Fauconbridge. After this had they any doubt that they might lawfully marry?

Mr. Laroche. After the sentence pronounced in the Ecclesiastical Court, I am firmly of opinion, that neither of them had a doubt as to the legality of the marriage.

Mr. Wallace. My lords, I have many witnesses to prove facts, which I believe will be admitted by the gentlemen on the other side, because they have already been proved in another place: they are such, as the lady at the bar living continually in the state of a single woman, and transacting in that character matters of consequence relative to property: they are already contained in depositions in another place, and I shall offer to your lordships now that sentence which has been pronounced in Doctors Commons: the officer swears he brought it from Doctors Commons. Your lordships are in possession of it.

Mr. Attorney General. I have already stated to your lordships the measure which was observed in giving evidence in that case in Doctors Commons, both upon one side and the other; and I stated the measure observed upon the part of the prisoner in Doctors Commons to be that of her having given evidence, that she acted as a single woman in a great many transactions.

Mr. Wallace. Then, my lords, I call no more witnesses.

Lord High Steward. Mr. Solicitor General, you will please to reply.

Mr. Solicitor General. My lords, the custom which has prevailed in trials at your lordships bar, authorizes the counsel on the part of the prosecution to observe upon the evidence that has been laid before your lordships, and to apply that evidence to the charge. In the present case, wishing to discharge my duty as counsel in a public prosecution without the least degree of unnecessary severity, or occasioning a momentary reflection of pain to the adverse party who stands at your lordships bar; reflecting on the whole course of the evidence that has been given; being in my own mind so clearly convinced as I am, that the evidence offered in support of the prosecution has not in the least degree been answered by any evidence that has been offered in defence; but, on the contrary, that the nature of the defence attempted supports, confirms, and gives credit to the charge; I find nothing on which I could with propriety observe in this period of the business at your lordships bar, but the speech which has been made by the prisoner in defence. And I trust, your lordships will think that it is in no degree abandoning the duty I owe unto the credit and weight weight of a public prosecution, if I decline entering into observations, in reply to a mere argumentative defence, offered to your lordships by a prisoner in person. I therefore hope that your lordships will think, that I have not failed in my duty, in declining to trouble your lordships any farther upon this matter.

Mr. Solicitor General having finished his replication on the part of the prosecution, the duchess of Kingston was ordered from the bar.

The house was then adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

The lords, and others, returned to the chamber of parliament in the customary order, and after some time, the house was adjourned again into Westminster-Hall.

The peers being seated, the lord high steward in his chair, and the house resumed, the serjeant at arms made proclamation for silence, as usual.

Lord High Steward. Your lordships have heard the evidence, and every thing that has been alledged on both sides; and you have also heard the opinion of the learned and reverend judges upon the questions stated to them; and the solemnity of your proceedings requires that your lordships opinions on the question of Guilty, or Not Guilty, should be delivered severally in the absence of the prisoner, beginning with the junior baron; and that the prisoner should afterwards be acquainted with the result of those opinions by me. Is it your lordships pleasure to proceed now to give your opinions upon the question of Guilty or Not Guilty?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Then the lord high steward stood up uncovered, and beginning with the youngest peer said,

John Lord Sundridge (Duke of Argyle in Scotland), what says your lordship? Is the prisoner Guilty of the felony whereof she stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Whereupon John Lord Sundridge, standing up in his place uncovered, and laying his right hand upon his breast, answered, GUILTY, upon my honour.

In like manner the several lords aftermentioned, being all that were present, answered as followeth:

Henry Lord Digby. Guilty, upon my honour.

William Earl of Dartmouth, Lord Privy Seal. Guilty, upon my honour.
Granville Leveson Earl Gower, Lord President of the Council. Guilty, upon my honour.
His Royal Highness Henry Frederick Duke of Cumberland and Strathern. Guilty, upon my honour.

Then the lord high steward, standing uncovered at the chair, laying his hand upon his breast, said, Lord High Steward. My lords, I am of opinion that the prisoner is Guilty, upon my honour.

Lord High Steward. My lords, all your lordships have found the prisoner guilty of the felony whereof she stands indicted, one lord only excepted; who said, that she was guilty—erroneously, but not intentionally—is it your lordships pleasure that she should be called in and acquainted therewith?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Proclamation was then made for the deputy-usher of the black rod to bring her grace the duchess of Kingston to the bar; which was done. Afterwards proclamation was made for silence, as usual.

Lord High Steward. Madam, the lords have considered the charge and evidence brought against you, and have likewise considered of every thing which you have alledged in your defence; and, upon the whole matter, their lordships have found you guilty of the felony whereof you stand indicted. What have you to alledge against judgment being pronounced upon you?

The duchess of Kingston delivered a paper, wherein her grace prayed the benefit of the peerage according to the statutes.

Then his grace the lord high steward asked the counsel for the prosecution, whether they had any objection to the duchess's claim of the benefit of the peerage?

Mr. Attorney General. My lords, not expecting to be called upon, I did not attend to the form of words used by the prisoner. However, I understand, that she claims the benefit of the statutes; not confining herself, I suppose, in the form of her claim, to one statute; but, alledging herself herself to be a peeress, claims the benefit of both; meaning to insist, that the act, which exempts women from judgment of death, is to be construed with reference to that, which allows clergy to lords of parliament.

My lords, upon this claim I suppose two questions will naturally arise; one, whether it be competent in her situation to claim that judgment, or an analogous judgment to that, which would have been pronounced upon a lord in parliament convicted of the like offence; the other, what would be the extent, or possible extent of that judgment upon a lord of parliament, so convicted.

My lords, I speak to both these questions; because I conceive, that, without aggravating the offence, I may fairly assume, that all the qualifications, which were put upon it, have been fully and effectually proved; the marriage; the issue of that marriage; the fraud upon public justice; the additional aggravation, that it was no less a surprize upon the duke of Kingston, than a scandal to the rest of the world.

This being the true state of the case, it must occur to every noble lord's mind, that the laws of this country would be considerably disgraced, if it were possible to state to such a court such a crime, attended with all its circumstances and qualifications, as an object of perfect impunity.

In this point of view, I shall take it for certain, that, if I can establish in the judgment of your lordships my own firm persuasion, that this claim to avoid judgment of death cannot be made under the statute of Edward VI. or with any reference to it, but must resort to the act of William and Mary, I shall then have laid before your lordships that opportunity, which justice, undoubtedly, will be desirous to lay hold on, of pronouncing a judgment somewhat more adequate to the offence; though perhaps, in the opinion of many, far enough from adequate. Or, if, contrary to my present thoughts, she may claim any benefit from the first statute, yet the act of Elizabeth will enable your lordships to make some slight satisfaction to the law for so enormous a violation of it.

My lords, this I take to be a clear proposition, that, from the beginning of time to this hour, clergy was never demandable by women. By the ancient law of the land this privilege was so favourably used, that reading was sufficient proof of clergy; and all were taken to be clerks, who lay under no indispensable impediment to receive orders. This rule is laid down in all the books. Several statutes, nay the Provincial Constitution of 1531, adopt the distinction thus made between persons in holy orders, and other clerks, or lay clerks. But women were under this indispensable impediment. They might be professed, and become religious; but even a nun could not claim this privilege. This is proved by the same books: and lord Hale puts the case of manslaughter, where the husband shall have his clergy, and the wife no privilege. The statutes, which exempt women from judgment of death, expressly recite, that they were not intitled to clergy; and distinctly provide a new and different species of exemption.

Having reminded your lordships of this clear rule in the law, I shall take up the statutes, which are material to this argument, in their order of time. This will lead me to consider; first, what is the true nature and extent of that exemption from capital punishment, which his clergy gives to a lord of parliament, by the first of Edward the sixth, and the eighteenth of Elizabeth; secondly, whether the twenty-first of James, or the third and fourth of William and Mary, contain any reference to those other laws.

In order to explain the true effect of the statute of Edward the sixth, I shall consider the situation, in which the peerage stood with respect to clergy, at the time of making it. I say, the situation of the peerage as to clergy; because it will not be doubted, I suppose, that they were intitled to this valuable privilege in common with others. So peculiar and cruel a distinction could not have remained in perfect silence for such a number of years. Nor, if they had been intitled to claim it upon peculiar terms, would those have been unnoticed. Besides, if there be no evidence of such a privilege at any time, how can it be claimed now?

Although the allowance of clergy was setting aside the conviction as to the person of the offender, his goods remained forfeit, and the king seized his lands under the record. By the 4th of Hen. VII. c. 13, it was to be allowed but once; and the convict was to be branded in open court, before the judge. And in the very year of the statute now under consideration, a long list of offences was deprived of it; and, even where it remained, slavery, with an iron yoke, was inflicted on the convict, as a vagabond.

It was thought too much to leave the lords of parliament exposed to those cruel and shameful stigmas; especially in cases, where they might make purgation, and so be restored to the exercise of their high functions. Nay, in such instances even forfeiture was thought too much. It was also conceived by their lordships, that, in their case, capital punishment had extended too far. It was also thought proper to deliver a lord of parliament from the necessity of proving his title to clergy in the ordinary way. Therefore by the 1 E. VI. c. 12, s. 14, it was enacted, 'That in all and every case and cases, where any of the king's majesty's subjects shall and may, upon his prayer, have the privilege of clergy, as a clerk convict, that may make purgation; in all those cases and every of them, and also in all and every case and cases of felony, wherein the privilege and benefit of clergy is restrained, excepted, or taken away by this statute or act (wilful murder and poisoning of malice prepensed only excepted) the lord and lords of the parliament, and peer and peers of the realm, having place and voice in parliament, shall, by virtue of this present act, of common grace, upon his or their request or prayer, acknowledging that he is a lord or peer of this realm, and claiming the benefit of this act, though he cannot read, without any burning in the hand, loss of inheritance, or corruption of his blood, be adjudged, deemed, taken, and used, for the first time only, to all intents, constructions, and purposes, as a clerk convict, and shall be in case of a clerk convict, which may make purgation, without any further or other benefit or privilege of clergy to any such lord or peer from thenceforth at any time after for any cause to be allowed, adjudged, or admitted; any law, Vol. XI.

statute, usage, custom, or any other thing to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding.' More shortly thus--At present, men prove their clergy by reading; and must forfeit, and be branded, before it may be obtained. For the future, in all cases, where any of the king's subjects may now obtain privilege, as a clerk convict, who may make purgation, a lord of parliament, without reading, burning, or forfeiture, shall be adjudged and used as a clerk convict, who may make purgation. All that was harsh in the law, was taken off the peerage: all that was left, was privilege. The trial by the bishop and his clerks (which differed from trial by peers, no more in the case of a lord than of a commoner) was not substituted in the place of legal trial, but superadded to it, for his advantage. This was the only way, which had then been thought of, in any case, to avoid judgment of death. The reason of the thing, and the express letter of the statute unite to prove, that, till the eighteenth of Elizabeth, a lord of parliament, convicted of a clergyable crime, and being capable of purgation, must have been deemed and treated as a clerk convict, who might make purgation, and delivered over to the ordinary for that purpose.

The learned and laborious Staunford, our ablest writer, at least on this branch of the law, treats it as a thing without question. Fol. 130. A lord shall have privilege of clergy, where a common person shall not have it. He ought to make purgation; and if so, he must be delivered to the ordinary, to be kept, till he has made his purgation. If he confesses, abjures, or is outlawed, he cannot have the benefit of this statute; because he cannot make purgation. Staunford flourished when this statute was made; wrote a few years after; and died before the eighteenth of Elizabeth. His therefore is a contemporary exposition of it, unentangled with the casual phrase of any subsequent act.

Hale, in his second volume, fol. 376, where he seems to differ from Staunford, as to the extent of the statute, agrees with him as to the nature of the privilege; which he calls The Clergy of Noblemen. At one time, judges would not deliver clerks to the ordinary, who had become incapable of purgation, by confession or otherwise. The church alledged, that nothing done before an unlawful judge was sufficient to sustain their process, or sentence. Whereupon the articuli cleri provided, that all clerks shall be delivered to their ordinaries. But they were delivered, in the instances mentioned by Staunford, absque purgatione faciendâ. Now the case put in the statute is, where any man may have the privilege of clergy, as a clerk convict that may make purgation. And a lord of parliament, being in the same predicament, was put in the case of a clerk convict that may make purgation, without reading or undergoing the pains which attended a commoner under those circumstances. Staunford therefore thought, that these exemptions did not reach to the case, where, before the statute, there could be no purgation for any man. And the opinion was so probable, at least, that a very eminent lawyer, of unexceptionable character, in the time of the great rebellion, actually burnt a peer, who confessed. Hale doubts; especially at this day, when delivery to the ordinary and purgation are both taken away by the eighteenth of Elizabeth. It is not obvious what difference that makes. I think, says he, it was never meant, that a peer of the realm should be put to read, or be burnt, where a common person should be put to his clergy. Both agree, that the peer should have had his clergy, and have been delivered to the ordinary, and have made purgation, exempt from the concomitant penalties; in some cases, says Staunford; in all, says Hale. But even Hale makes no doubt of peers being liable to imprisonment.

In the trial of lord Warwick, the chief justice lays it down, That the statute of Edward VI. exempted peers from the penalty of burning, and repealed the statute of Henry VII. as to so much. Then a peer was liable to burning before; and by the act of Henry VII. which, in terms, puts it upon persons admitted to their clergy. But how could it be seriously argued, that a thing so anxiously repealed never existed? I have consulted on this occasion as many books, as I could think of referring to; and I do not recollect one, which supposes a time when a peer had not the benefit of his clergy.

Nothing, it must be confessed, could be more unprincipled, and incongruous, than to suffer the truth or justice of a conviction at common law to be questioned in the Ecclesiastical Court. But the church had not then lost its hold upon men's minds; nor would, probably, for some ages, but for its own glaring misconduct.

The trial called purgation, as it was had in the Bishop's Court, was a ridiculous mockery of justice; or became serious, only by the perjury which it produced. It was therefore abolished. But simply to abolish it would also have cut off that imprisonment, which followed a conviction in the Bishop's Court, and which (it should have been presumed) would always follow actual guilt. To remedy which, it was thought fit to give the court authority to punish by imprisonment for any time less than a year. This was proper in all cases; but particularly so in the cases of peers, and persons in holy orders, who were not liable to burning in the hand. It was therefore enacted by the eighteenth of Elizabeth, c. 7. s. 2, and 3.

'That every person and persons, which at any time, after this present session of parliament, shall be admitted and allowed to have the benefit or privilege of his or their clergy, shall not thereupon be delivered to the ordinary, as hath been accustomed; but, after such clergy allowed, and burning in the hand according to the statute in that behalf provided, shall forthwith be enlarged, and delivered out of prison, by the justices, before whom such clergy shall be granted, that cause notwithstanding.'

'Provided, nevertheless, and be it also enacted, that the justices, before whom such allowance of clergy shall be had, shall and may, for the further correction of such persons, to whom such clergy shall be allowed, detain and keep them in prison, for such convenient time, as the same justices in their discretion shall think convenient; so as the same do not exceed one year's imprisonment; any law or usage, heretofore had or used, to the contrary notwithstanding.'

The effect of these words, shall forthwith be enlarged and delivered out of prison, that cause notwithstanding, is to give the person so enlarged exactly the same state and condition which he would have obtained, under the former dispensation of law, by going through the process of purgation, and so being delivered from the offence. This part of the act carries a great effect effect upon the construction of the whole. In conversation, I have heard the words, after burning in the hand, supposed to be the phrase, upon which some doubt might turn, whether peers are included in the act. But, in the construction of such a statute, it is not enough to find a phrase, upon which some doubt might turn. It would be fitter for those who conceive the doubt, to proceed at least one step further; and state, to what extent their doubt goes. Is it doubted, whether purgation be taken away in the case of a peer, and the peer be restored to his law without it? Will any gentleman argue, that, at this day, a peer convicted of a clergyable crime, shall not be forthwith enlarged; but must be delivered to the ordinary to make his purgation? This point, I believe, never has, nor ever will be argued. If he is not to undergo purgation, quo jure is he exempt? Does any other statute exempt a peer from his purgation, or discharge him from his attainder, but this general statute of the eighteenth of Elizabeth; which, in its large phrase, comprehends every body? I protest I know of none. Or, does this statute exempt any, but those, who shall be thereafter admitted to Clergy? The words, after burning in the hand, do not make an essential or necessary article in the description of the persons to be discharged; nor create any term, or condition, upon which the discharge is to obtain. The description of the persons to be discharged is absolved in these words, all persons who shall be allowed the benefit of their clergy. They are to be discharged absolutely. But when? and in what manner? Why, after the allowance of clergy, and burning in the hand according to the statute; which is to say, in the cases provided by the statute; of which the case of a peer is not one.

The whole consequence is no more than this, that, in a case circumstanced like the present, where the honour of the law and the purity of manners require some example to be made, your lordships may follow the bent of your discretion, by resorting to the last clause in the eighteenth of Elizabeth. This I say, upon a supposition, that some peer stood convicted of the like offence, with similar aggravation; or that, upon the rest of the argument, it will be possible to give any woman the benefit of any statute, pari ratione, as peers have the benefit of clergy, under the first of Edward VI. But I hope to prove soon, that it is impossible to construe the subsequent statute in that manner. Consequently there will be due to this crime a very different sort of punishment than that which I have alluded to.

It will hardly be said, that these statutes relate to women of any condition. The expression excludes them distinctly enough. If that had been more general, the subject matter excludes them absolutely. They are no more clerks, than lords of parliament. They never underwent purgation; nor were delivered to the ordinary; they were therefore incapable of receiving these privileges: for these acts were merely to regulate an old right, not to give a new one. Both the statutes, which give them their exemption, recite it as a general proposition, that women were not entitled to clergy. Nor have I even seen any statute, case, or book, wherein any condition of women is supposed exempt, but by virtue of the laws I shall state presently. It remains then to be considered, whether the exemption provided by those laws, has any reference to the statute of Edward VI.

The first statute, which exempts women from capital punishment in any case of felony, is the twenty-first of James I. c. 6, which runs thus:—
‘Whereas, by the laws of this realm, the benefit of clergy is not allowed to women convicted of felony; by reason whereof many women do suffer death for small causes; be it enacted by the authority of this present parliament, that any woman, being lawfully convicted by her confession, or by the verdict of twelve men, of, or for the felonious taking of any money, goods, or chattels above the value of twelve-pence, and under the value of ten shillings; or as accessory to any such offence; the said offence being no burglary, nor robbery in or near the highway; nor the felonious taking of any money, goods, or chattels, from the person of any man or woman privily, without his or their knowledge, but only such an offence as in the like case a man might have his clergy, shall, for the first offence, be branded, and marked in the hand, upon the brawn of the left thumb, with a hot burning iron, having a roman T upon the said iron; the said mark to be made by the gaoler, openly, in the court, before the judge; and also to be further punished by imprisonment, whipping, stocking, or sending to the house of correction, in such sort, manner, and form, and for so long time (not exceeding the space of one whole year) as the judge, judges, or other justices, before whom she shall be so convicted, or which shall have authority in the cause, shall, in their discretion, think meet, according to the quality of the offence, and then to be delivered out of prison for that offence; any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.’

This statute, at least, excludes all colour of reference to the first of Edward VI. Any woman convicted of grand larceny (if it be but a simple felony, clergyable in a man) shall be burnt. She was not put to demand benefit of the statute; to pray her clergy would have been too absurd; but, the larceny being stated in the record to be committed by a woman, judgment was forthwith entered of burning, and so forth. The statute is, moreover, confined to such larcenies, where, in the like case, a man might have his clergy. I take notice of these words at present, only for the sake of remarking that, in this statute, at least, they must relate to the quality of the offence, not to the condition of the offender.

My lords, the only statute, of which the prisoner can claim the benefits against judgment of death, is the third and fourth of William and Mary, c. 9. f. 6. which runs in these words: ‘And whereas, by the laws of this realm, women convicted of felony, for stealing of goods and chattels of the value of ten shillings, and upwards, and for other felonies, where a man is to have the benefit of his clergy, are to suffer death; be it therefore enacted and declared by the authority aforesaid, that, where a man, being convicted of any felony, for which he may demand the benefit of his clergy, if a woman be convicted for the same or like offence, upon her prayer to have the benefit of this statute, judgment of death shall not be given against her upon such conviction; or execution awarded upon any outlawry for such offence; but shall suffer the same punishment as a man should suffer that has the benefit of his clergy allowed him in the like case; that is to say, shall be burnt in the hand by the gaoler, in open court, and be further kept in prison for such time as the justices in their discretion shall think fit, so as the same do not exceed one year’s imprisonment.’ Under this act, to avoid judgment of death, the prisoner must pray the benefit of this statute.

I collect from conversation, perhaps too idle to be referred to, that the argument will be laid thus. A woman convicted of a felony which would be clergyable in a man, shall suffer the same punishment as a man would do in the like case, that is, as a man of the same condition with herself: but a peer would suffer no punishment: therefore a woman of that condition shall suffer none.

The words, in the like case, must mean the same here, as in the twenty-first of James, convicted of the like offence. And the words of the same condition must be wholly superadded, if they are admitted at all. But it is impossible to conceive, that, if the legislature had meant to create so important a distinction between different orders of women, it would have used no words for that purpose. Nor, indeed, can such a distinction be so created by any operation of law.

If, in favour of the prisoner, the slightest degree of punishment, which any man can suffer in the like case, is to be intended, every woman would claim exemption from burning, because inferior ecclesiasticks are not burnt; and from forfeiture, because lords of parliament are neither burnt nor forfeit. But this absurd construction happens to be thrown out by the act itself, which appoints the punishment, it means, to be burning and imprisonment. The statute therefore will not suffer it to be understood, that any woman, convicted of any felony, shall suffer no other punishment, than those who, it is now contended, are to suffer no punishment at all.

Upon these grounds I submit to your lordships, that the judgment to be pronounced upon every woman, of whatever quality or denomination, is that, which is prescribed by the third and fourth of William and Mary; and that there is no ground or warrant of law to insist, that a peeress can avoid judgment of death upon any other terms.

My lords, the whole question is upon burning. The imprisonment is the same either way. Now, if there be prudence or propriety of any sort in establishing such an exemption for peeresses, let that prudence or propriety be stated, where by the constitution of this country such an application ought to be made to parliament. If the parliament should think fit to create new privileges, or add new distinctions to any order of men, or women, they are competent to do it. But it would be assuming too much for any court of justice. Your lordships sit here merely as a court of justice, not as a house of legislature. To do that by forced and arbitrary interpretation of law, which ought only to be done by act of legislature, is too much enhancing the prerogative of the judge; and too much confounding those authorities, which ought to have plainer marks and broader limits set between them.

Mr. Wallace.

My lords, I did not suppose it would have fallen to my share to give your lordships any trouble upon this subject; and therefore I have not very lately looked into the statutes which have been mentioned; but I will state to your lordships in general, what I understand to be the privilege of peeresses at this day.

By the 20th Hen. VIth, chap. 9. to obviate doubts which had arisen upon Magna Charta, peeresses are put upon a footing with peers with respect to trial and punishment; and by an equitable construction, peeresses by titles since created, as marchionesses and viscountesses, are within the act.

At the time of passing the act of Edward VIth, the lords of parliament are mentioned, which at that time of day comprehended the whole peerage. In this situation were peers at the time of passing the statute of the 18th of Elizabeth, which statute cannot relate to them. Every person, who is to be admitted or allowed to have the benefit or privilege of clergy, should not after burning in the hand be delivered to the ordinary, as has been customary, but may be detained in prison. This provision clearly refers to the situation of commoners, and not of peers: it refers to those who were at the time of making the act liable; whereas peers were not in that condition; they were not to pray their clergy, but the benefit of that act, and to be delivered out without burning in the hand. The direction given by the act is to justices: an expression never applied, I believe, in any act to the lords in parliament sitting in their judicial capacity as a criminal court: the justices are to keep such persons in prison after they are burnt in the hand; which is a demonstration that inferior courts are alluded to; and it is under this statute imprisonment is inflicted upon persons intitled to their clergy.

At the time of passing the statute of the 3d and 4th of William and Mary, peers were exempt from burning in the hand and imprisonment in clergyable cases, which commoners were subject to. By this law women are put on the same footing with men, and the courts before whom they are tried are to inflict the same punishment as they are authorized to do upon men. These provisions make it, in my apprehension, extremely clear, that the peeresses were intended to be placed in the same condition with peers, as they were by Magna Charta, explained by the statute of Edward VIth. Would it not be the most harsh and cruel interpretation, if the act was even doubtful, to subject a peeress to a punishment for the same crime which her husband is exempt from? The conditions of persons create distinctions in the construction of laws; but the attempt now made is to confound all ranks, and by supposed literal interpretation to involve one of your lordships own situation in the punishment, which the legislature has been so anxious to extricate you from.

Mr. Mansfield.

It is not till this moment, that I had any apprehension myself, that any question of this sort would be agitated before your lordships; and therefore therefore I can only speak of the several statutes referred to from my general memory of them; but I apprehend that the construction of these statutes will not, cannot be such as is now contended for on the part of the prosecutor. The object of the construction wished by the prosecutor is this: that the laws of this country are to make a difference between one sex and the other; that they are now at this time of day to be so determined as to inflict a more severe, a more cruel punishment upon a woman than on a man, though the offence committed be the same. Now, such a construction your lordships would never suffer, nor any court of justice in this country would suffer to take place, unless there should something be found in the law which necessarily requires it: and taking the several statutes together relating to this subject, I apprehend your lordships will be of opinion, that these statutes do not only not require, but that they exclude, such absurdity, such inhumanity.

My lords, the statute upon which the whole must be founded, as I conceive, is that of the 20th of king Henry the VIth, which, as well as I recollect from my memory, is chap. 11. which first provides expressly, though I believe it is considered only as a declaration of the common law, but provides, that peeresses should be tried, and, if I recollect the words rightly, should not only be tried, but should be judged in the same manner as peers: and remembering what has happened upon that statute, I must put your lordships in mind, that such has been the benignity of the construction upon it, that though only three ranks of peeresses are named, it has been clearly held in construction to extend to all. The three that are mentioned, I think, are duchesses, countesses, and baronesses. The construction is, that it extends to marchionesses and viscountesses, because they are intitled in the spirit and meaning of the law to the same privilege which is given to the other ladies by name. The clear result and effect of this statute is, to say in general terms, that women of that high rank should be tried and should be judged in the same manner as men. The terms used in the act are general. Whoever reads that law, will be astonished to hear any man contending, that in imposing judgment upon a peeress, your lordships are to be guided by a different rule from that which you would follow if you were passing judgment upon a peer. The next statute to be considered after this, as a general statute upon the subject, is that of the 3d and 4th of king William the third. Did that statute mean,—were the legislators that made it so forgetful of what was due to humanity, and to themselves and their own characters, as to mean, that a distinction in punishment should prevail between one sex and the other, to the prejudice of that which is intitled to the greater indulgence and compassion? Most certainly not; because the express provision of that statute is, that women convicted of offences intitled to the benefit of clergy should suffer in the same manner as men would suffer convicted of the same offences.

My lords, no man, who can read that statute, and reason upon it, can help concluding that it was the object of that law to say, that where women were convicted of clergyable offences, they should be in as good a situation as men who were convicted of the like.

My lords, taking these two statutes of the 20th of Henry the sixth providing for the trial and judgment of peeresses, and the general statute of the 3d and 4th of William the third giving the benefit of clergy to women, I should think it impossible to say, that peeresses convicted of a clergyable offence were not to have precisely the same privileges as peers convicted of such offences.

My lords, if there be any rule of construction in the law, which is indisputable, for expounding statutes, it is this; that statutes, as we say, in pari materia, relating to one subject, are to be considered as one law, taken and interpreted together as throwing light one upon the other: no rule of construction is better established. Follow that rule of construction here. Take first the general law for the trial of peeresses and the judgment of peeresses in the same manner as of peers; then take the general law, giving the benefit of clergy to women in the same manner as to men; and who will not say, that that rule of construction does not necessarily tend to put both, upon the rank of men and women, in the same condition, when convicted of the same species of offence? But what are the particular acts of parliament, which have been referred to as requiring a different construction? By the first of Edward the sixth, it is extremely clear, that peers are not to undergo the ignominious punishment of burning. The statute that follows that of Edward the sixth, is the 18th of Elizabeth, which takes away the delivery to the ordinary, substitutes burning in its place, and then gives a power to imprison. Whoever reads that act, will see that it certainly was confined to cases, where punishment was to be inflicted by justices upon persons of an ordinary description, not persons of the rank of peers; and the statute strictly and clearly relates only to persons so having clergy allowed, as is prescribed by that statute: and if the 18th of Elizabeth is to have the construction which is contended for, I understand it must have effect also to inflict the punishment of burning upon peers. So much, my lords, for the statute of the 18th of Elizabeth. The 21st of king James was mentioned as first in part giving clergy to women: the 3d and 4th of king William the third is mentioned as alluding to it. It does so, but the provisions of the 3d and 4th of king William the third are general, that is, a general law extending the benefit of clergy to women in all cases. Now it is said there, that they shall have the same punishment as men; they are to be in the like situation as men. Then the act goes on to say, that is to say, burning and imprisoning.

My lords, what is the fair construction of this law? Why, that women shall be in the same situation as men; and where men are of such condition, that they would be burnt in the hand, that they would be liable to be imprisoned, women in like manner should be subject to burning in the hand, and should be subject to imprisonment: but no one ever heard, that the severe part of a law inflicting a punishment should be extended so by construction, where it was not so express. Now you must act against the clear provision of that law, that women should be in the same situation as men, if you were to say, that a peeress convicted of a clergyable offence should either undergo the punishment of burning, or the punishment of imprisonment. No one can say upon the statute of Edward the sixth, that they are subject to either. The object of the statute of William the third was to make the punishment of such offenders precisely the same with regard to one sex as the other; and the true spirit and great object of that law must be directly acted against, if a peeress was to be put in a different situation than a peer, and to have a more severe and cruel punishment inflicted upon her, than would be upon him. These are the only general observations that occur to me now in taking the whole scope of the law: I therefore submit to your lordships, that the noble lady at the bar is intitled to the benefit of these statutes.

Mr. Attorney General.

My lords, concerning the point which is now depending before the house, I fairly confess, that, when your lordships first called upon me to give my reasons why judgment of death should not be suspended upon the prayer of the prisoner, made in the manner in which that prayer was conceived; and upon the effects and consequences of allowing her the benefit of the statute in a more regular course; I would rather, if I might, have been excused from laying my thoughts before your lordships. I had heard a rumour, that men, whose learning and authority I greatly reverence, held a different opinion. This would not fail to raise much distrust of my own conclusions; although I had thoroughly considered the subject; and although I never read any proposition with more perfect conviction of the truth of it, since I learnt to read.

My lords, that idea, the only one I have been able to form, or adopt, is now very much strengthened. That cloud, which came over it from the rumoured prevalence of contrary notion, is very much removed. Because, if there be no opinion to the contrary, but what is to be founded on the argument I have heard to-day from those who are best able to sustain the contrary opinion, I am perfectly satisfied, it is impossible this should pass as a point of law, or receive the sanction of your lordships concurrence.

My lords, what are the arguments? First, it is utterly inconceivable, that the law should put such difference between the two sexes. My lords, if the subject was laid by for a moment, only to make a handsome compliment to a very respectable part of this assembly, which well deserves all the attention it commands, it is impossible to quarrel with a turn of gallantry. But, resuming the subject, we are all agreed, that the law did actually put that very difference between the sexes for many centuries. And this uncourtly statute of Edward the sixth, proceeding upon the law as it found it, did not think of abolishing the distinction. It was quite beside the purpose of that act, which did not mean to qualify the severity of the criminal law in general, much less to make an equal distribution of it among the subjects at large. But, taking the law as it stood, it was found inconvenient, incompatible, and shocking to reason, that lords of parliament, who were to give their voices upon the most arduous affairs of a great empire, should do so under apparent stigma and circumstances of open infamy. I don't rely on the gender of the words, but on the purpose of the act. Women are excluded by both. They were neither liable to the stigma, nor held the high office which made them intolerable. Therefore bishops, whom the twenty-eighth and thirty-second of Henry the eighth had, at that time, made liable to the whole case of other clerks convicted, were included: women certainly not. The privilege was given, not to the peerage, but to the house of parliament, to be claimed by the members as such. It was not substantive; but an ingraftment on the right to clergy, which women never had. In truth, I have not heard a hint from the counsel on the other side to question the existence of this difference down to the third and fourth of William and Mary, upon which act they have chiefly relied in argument. They lay it down, that peers convicted of clergyable crimes are exempt from all punishment, not being within the eighteenth of Elizabeth; that peeresses are to be tried and judged like peers; that the third and fourth of William and Mary puts women convicted in the same condition as men; and that by some tacit reference to the former statutes, peeresses convicted are not to be punished at all.

I have troubled your lordships already with my reasons for thinking, that, in old time, peers enjoyed the benefit of clergy in common with other men, and upon the same terms; that in the fourth of Henry the seventh, burning was inflicted upon them as lay-clerks; that the statute of Edward the sixth, in the very moment of exempting them from the penalties incurred at law by conviction, adjudges them clerks, and delivers them for purgation in the Bishop's Court; that the statute of Elizabeth delivers all, who shall thereafter be admitted to clergy, from purgation, and discharges them, subject to such correction by imprisonment for less than a year, as the court shall think fit.

It is not denied, that these words, in their plain and natural sense, embrace the case of peers. But, in this context, it is supposed they do not, because the clerks convicted are to be discharged after allowance of their clergy, and after burning in the hand according to the statute. This last provision, they say, cannot refer to peers. Nay, one learned gentleman thought, that, if it should be construed to include peers, they must, by force of these words, be burnt in the hand.

I cannot follow this idea. I have no way of conceiving, how an act which inflicts, or rather reserves a penalty, according to the law as it then stood, can be interpreted to create a new penalty; or, by what chain of reasoning it is concluded, that where all convicts are to be discharged upon the allowance of clergy, and such burning as the law directs, those are not to be discharged at all, for whom the law has not directed burning. Suppose the king should pardon the burning: it was thought, in lord Warwick's case, that would be a perfect discharge. Burning was not substituted in the place of purgation: that was a mere slip: it is contrary to the history: burning existed before the eighteenth of Elizabeth, in just the same extent as after. Imprisonment, at the discretion of the temporal judge, was the substitute for purgation; and is extended expressly to all, who are discharged from purgation. But it seems too late to argue this. Was it not expressly decided in the case of Searl and Williams, when prohibition went to stay the deprivation of a parson, who had been convicted of manslaughter, and discharged under the eighteenth of Elizabeth, although he could not be burnt? 'For when the statute says after burning, it imports, where burning ought to be; otherwise the statute would do no good to clerks, for whom it was most intended.' The case is reported in Hobart. The statute speaks universally of every body, those who were, and those who were not liable to burning; and discharges them all, after allowance of clergy, and burning according to law, as it had stood before; that is, reddendo singula singulis.

The next objection is, that the word justices will not apply to your lordships, even while you are sitting merely in the characters of judges. Therefore a statute, which is to be executed by justices, cannot relate to a peer, who is not triable by justices.

Is it then seriously contended, that your lordships, exercising your jurisdiction in the trial of a peer, will not do all the same acts of justice, which judges must do in the trial of a commoner? Upon reading many acts of parliament, your lordships will find, either, that you have no jurisdiction at all, or that you must exercise it under the character and denomination of justices. The same objection might have been made to lord Ferrers's execution; the same to the burning a peer under the statute of Henry the seventh. By the word justices I understand, in our law, all manner of officers who are intrusted with the administration of justice. So Spelman defines the word. In high antiquity, the name went to the greatest subject in this country; for I take the Justitia totius Angliæ to have been above the Seneschallus Regis. Your lordships therefore will not disdain the name; for you sit here in no higher character than that, which, by just and natural construction, is attributed to the word justices. Therefore, if no better objections can be raised than these, I apprehend the words of the statute sufficiently comprize the peerage. This also was laid down in the trial of lord Warwick.

But, my lords, if these are objections, whither do they go? Not only to subvert the statute of Elizabeth, in this most reasonable particular of giving some convenient correction, as the statute calls it, to a criminal found so upon record; but to restore a law, which has now for many ages been understood to be at an end; and I flatter myself, considering the account which the books all give of it, that purgation is at an end.

But I am called upon to look at the 20th of H. VI. c. 9. This was a mere declaratory law; reciting the 29th chapter of Magna Charta, nullus liber homo, and so forth, and a very absurd doubt, whether homo included both genders; and declaring, that 'ladies shall be put to answer, and judged before such judges and peers' (here by the way judges and peers are synonymous) 'as peers should be.' But though, by Magna Charta, peeresses were to be tried by their peers, as other women were by theirs, there the privilege ends. All were, upon conviction, to receive the like judgment and execution: and, in the exemption from death, the difference was not between the ranks, but the sexes, of the convicts. And so the law undoubtedly continued, notwithstanding this statute.

But it was said, that, by the equity of this statute, marchionesses and viscountesses were included, though not named. This was to give countenance to the rule, that all statutes in pari materia shall be construed alike. There is great good sense in the rule. Marchionesses and viscountesses were clearly within the law declared; and consequently within the reason of declaring it: therefore duchesses, countesses, and baronesses were, by a sort of synecdoche, put for all peeresses. So where a privilege is saved to certain denominations of people, all others, who were before within the same privilege, will be within the saving, if there be nothing in the context to raise a distinction against them; particularly, if the saving be only declaratory, and not a positive exception. Nay, in a new law, things, equally within the reason of it, have been comprized in it by construction. But this borders upon arbitrary: parliament seems the properest judge of this reason. If peers, disqualified to vote, should claim the benefit of the first of Edward the sixth, it might be argued with some plausibility, that they are within the reason of the act. They are so certainly, in every point, except that of voting; and yet I should think it too much to overlook so material a distinction made by the statute itself. But if women, who were not concerned in any part of the subject matter, make the same claim, it would be making a perfectly new law to include them. Where then is the paritas materiae between the act of William and Mary, for exempting women from capital punishment, and the twentieth of Henry the sixth, which had nothing to do with punishment; or the first of Edward the sixth, which had nothing to do with women?

I did propose two statutes to be considered in pari materia, the acts of James and of William and Mary; the only two, which confer upon any woman any exemption from capital punishment. I have not heard it denied, that if a peeress had stood convicted of the crimes mentioned in the first act, the punishment there specified must have ensued. This fixes the sense of these words, in the like case. I am possessed therefore of this ground, that the act of Edward the sixth did not touch the difference put by the law of clergy between the sexes; nor that of James make any difference as to the quality of the offender. We go intirely upon the act of William and Mary. It is inaccurate to say, this acts puts women into the same condition with men; and still more, with men of the same quality respectively. There is nothing in it about the condition of the person. Where a man, convict of any felony, has clergy, a woman, convict of the like offence, shall not have judgment of death, but suffer the same punishment as a man would suffer, with clergy, in the like case. These words refer altogether to the quality of the offence. That very crime, which in one record, applied to a man, infers judgment of death, avoidable by his claim of clergy, applied in another to a woman, infers the specific judgment prescribed by the act. Nor are the two sexes put into the same condition, even as to punishment. All women avoided judgment of death; not so of all men. Some were indispensably incapable of holy orders: such cannot have their clergy at this day; nor had any other exemption from death before the fifth of Anne. Some could not prove their title to clergy by reading. Men could have their clergy but once; women the benefit of this statute toties quoties, till a subsequent act altered the law in this respect.

Still less can the words be twisted to create a difference as to rank of the offender. It is hard, says a learned gentleman, to put the severest construction upon an act of this sort. The act is not penal. But the shorter answer is, there are not two constructions to chuse between. If the phrase had been left general, the same punishment as a man should suffer that had his clergy in the like case, it might have been thought uncertain what that punishment should be; because different orders of men were liable to different measure of punishment in the like case; the bulk of men to forfeiture, burning, and discretionary imprisonment; inferior ecclesiasticks to forfeiture and imprisonment; lords of parliament to imprisonment only. In such a text there might have been room to contend for a favourable construction; and yet, even then, I should have thought that the measure of punishment allotted to the bulk of mankind, undistinguished by peculiar privileges, must have been deemed the meaning of the legislature. But whatever might have been the construction of such a text, it must have applied equally to all women. They could not have been classed in casts, according to the condition of their respective husbands; the wife of a lord of parliament to be imprisoned; of an inferior ecclesiastick to be imprisoned and to forfeit; of other men, to be imprisoned, to forfeit, and be burnt. The statute however has put an end to all question, by stating expressly the very measure of punishment allotted to all women.

Burnt in the hand in open court, it is said, shall not apply to peeresses, because they were never liable to be burnt at all. The position is true, not of peeresses alone, but of all women. But they were liable to judgment of death; for which this slighter punishment was a desirable commutation.

My lords, if there be any thing in the nature of the punishment unreasonable, or improper to be applied to women in general, or to noblewomen in particular, let the matter come before parliament. It is a legislative consideration; and parliament will entertain it according to the extent of the principle, which certainly will apply to many noblewomen of much higher rank than some peeresses, who, as the law now stands, are liable to that punishment. So, I think, they ought to remain. Guilt levels rank. A noblewoman, covered with the ignominy of such a conviction, cannot forfeit less than her estimation.

My lords, the only question is this: has any positive law granted the exemption now demanded, to wind up such a record as this with perfect impunity, a ridiculous disgrace to publick justice? Has this been done in express terms; or in terms, whose necessary construction amounts to express?

My lords, when I have qualified the question in that manner, I have gone to the verge of judicial authority. And I do desire to press this upon your lordships as an universal maxim: No more dangerous idea can creep into the mind of a judge, than the imagination, that he is wiser than the law. I confine this to no judge, whatever be his denomination, but extend it to all. And, speaking at the bar of an English court of justice, I make sure of your lordships approbation, when I comprize even your lordships, sitting in Westminster-Hall. It is a grievous example to other judges. If your lordships assume this, sitting in judgment, why not the King's-Bench? why not commissioners of Oyer and Terminer? If they do so, why not the Quarter Sessions? Ingenious men may strain the law very far—but, to pervert it—to new-model it—the genius of our constitution says, judges have no such authority, nor shall presume to exercise it.

The lords then adjourned to the chamber of parliament; and, after some time passed there,

See the Appendix,

the house adjourned again into Westminster-Hall; when, after the usual proclamation for silence, his grace the lord high steward addressed the duchess of Kingston to the following effect:

Lord High Steward. Madam, the lords have considered of the prayer you have made, to have the benefit of the statutes, and the lords allow it you.

But, madam, let me add, that although very little punishment, or none, can now be inflicted, the feelings of your own conscience will supply that defect. And let me give you this information likewise, that you can never have the like benefit a second time, but another offence of the same kind will be capital.

Madam, you are discharged, paying your fees.

Lord High Steward. My lords, this trial being at an end, nothing remains to be done here, but to determine the commission.

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. Let proclamation be made for dissolving the commission of high steward.

Serjeant at Arms. Oyez! oyez! oyez! Our sovereign lord the king does strictly charge and command all manner of persons here present, and that have here attended, to depart hence in the peace of God, and of our said sovereign lord the king, for his grace my lord high steward of Great Britain intends now to dissolve his commission.

Then the white staff being delivered to the lord high steward by the gentleman usher of the black rod on his knee, his grace stood up, uncovered, and holding the staff in both his hands, broke it in two, and declared the commission to be dissolved; and then, leaving the chair, came down to the woolpack, and said, Is it your lordships pleasure to adjourn to the chamber of parliament?

Lords. Ay, ay.

Lord High Steward. This house is adjourned to the chamber of parliament.

Then the peers, and others, returned back to the chamber of parliament in the same order they came down, except that his royal highness the duke of Cumberland walked after the lord chancellor.

A P P E N D I X.

Die Veneris, 19 Aprilis 1776.

ORDERED by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the following questions be put to the judges, viz.

I. Whether a sentence of the Spiritual Court against a marriage in a suit for jactitation of marriage is conclusive evidence so as to stop the counsel for the crown from proving the said marriage in an indictment for polygamy?

II. Whether admitting such sentence to be conclusive upon such indictment, the counsel for the crown may be admitted to avoid the effect of such sentence, by proving the same to have been obtained by fraud or collusion?

Whereupon, the lord chief justice of the court of Common Pleas, having conferred with the rest of the judges present, delivered their unanimous opinion upon the said questions, with his reasons, as follow, viz.

My lords,

My lord chief baron, and the rest of my brethren, have desired me to deliver their answer to the questions your lordships have been pleased to propound to us.

That our opinion may be the better understood, it is necessary to make some observations on what has passed in argument upon the subject.

What has been said at the bar is certainly true, as a general principle, that a transaction between two parties, in judicial proceedings, ought not to be binding upon a third; for it would be unjust to bind any person who could not be admitted to make a defence, or to examine witnesses, or to appeal from a judgment he might think erroneous; and therefore the depositions of witnesses in another cause in proof of a fact, the verdict of a jury finding the fact, and the judgment of the court upon facts found, although evidence against the parties, and all claiming under them, are not, in general, to be used to the prejudice of strangers. There are some exceptions to this general rule, founded upon particular reasons, but not being applicable to the present subject, it is unnecessary to state them.

From the variety of cases relative to judgments being given in evidence in civil suits, these two deductions seem to follow as generally true: first, that the judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction, directly upon the point, is as a plea, a bar, or as evidence, conclusive, between the same parties, upon the same matter, directly in question in another court: secondly, that the judgment of a court of exclusive jurisdiction, directly upon the point, is, in like manner, conclusive upon the same matter, between the same parties, coming incidentally in question in another court, for a different purpose. But neither the judgment of a concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction is evidence, of any matter which came collaterally in question, though within their jurisdiction; nor of any matter incidentally cognizable; nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment.

Upon the subject of marriage, the Spiritual Court has the sole and exclusive cognizance of questioning and deciding, directly, the legality of marriage; and of enforcing, specifically, the rights and obligations respecting persons depending upon it; but the temporal courts have the sole cognizance of examining and deciding upon all temporal rights of property; and, so far as such rights are concerned, they have the inherent power of deciding incidentally, either upon the fact, or the legality of marriage, where they lie in the way to the decision of the proper objects of their jurisdiction: they do not want or require the aid of the spiritual courts; nor has the law provided any legal means of sending to them for their opinion; except where, in the case of marriage, an issue is joined upon the record in certain real writs, upon the legality of a marriage, or its immediate consequence, 'general bastardy;' or, in like manner, in some other particular instances, lying peculiarly in the knowledge of their courts, as profession, deprivation, and some others; in these cases, upon the issue so formed, the mode of trying the question is by reference to the ordinary, and his certificate, when returned, received, and entered upon the record in the temporal courts, is a perpetual and conclusive evidence against all the world upon that point; which exceptionable extent, on whatever reasons founded, was the occasion of the statute of the 9th of Henry VI. requiring certain public proclamations to be made for persons interested to come in, and be parties to the proceeding. But, even in these cases, if the ordinary should return no certificate, or an insufficient one; or, if the issue is accompanied with any special circumstances, as if a second issue, triable by a jury, is formed upon the same record; or, if the effect of the same issue is put into another form, a jury is to decide, and not the ordinary to certify, the truth; and to this purpose sir William Staunford mentions a remarkable instance. Bigamy was triable by the bishop's certificate; but if the prisoner, to avoid the charge, pleads that the second espousals were null and void, because he had a former wife living, this special bigamy was not to be tried by the bishop's certificate.

So that the trial of marriage, either as to legality, or fact, was not absolutely, and from its nature, an object alieni fori.

There was a time, when the spiritual courts wished that their determinations might in all cases be received as authentic in the temporal courts; and in that solemn assembly of the king, the peers, the bishops, and judges, convened for the purpose of settling the demands of the church, by Edward the second, one of the claims was expressed in these words:

Si aliqua causa, vel negotium, cujus cognitio spectat ad forum ecclesiasticum, in eorum ecclesiastico iudicio fuerit sententialiter terminatum, et transferat in rem judicatam, nec per appellationem fuerit suspensum; et postmodum, coram iudice seculari, super eadem re inter easdem personas questio moveatur, et provetur per testes vel instrumenta, talis exceptio in foro seculari non admittatur. The answer to which demand was expressed in this manner: 'Quando eadem causa, diversis rationibus coram iudicibus ecclesiasticis, et secularibus, ventilatur, dicunt quod (non obstante ecclesiastico iudicio) curia regis ipsum tractet negotium, ut sibi expedire videtur.' For which lord Coke gives this reason, second Institute, c. 22. 'For the spiritual judges proceedings are for the correction of the spiritual inner man, and pro salute animæ, to enjoin him penance; and the judges of the common law proceed to give damages and recompence for the wrong and injury done; and then adds, 'and so this article was deservedly rejected.'

And the same demand was made, and received the same answer, in the third year of king James the first.

It is to be observed, that this demand related only to civil suits between the same parties; and that the sentence should be received as a plea in bar. But this attempt and miscarriage did not prevent the temporal courts from shewing the same respect to their proceedings, as they did to those in other courts. And therefore where, in civil causes, they found the question of marriage directly determined by the ecclesiastical courts, they received the sentence, though not as a plea, yet as proof of the fact; it being an authority accredited in a judicial proceeding by a court of competent jurisdiction; but still they received it upon the same principles, and subject to the same rules, by which they admit the acts of other courts.

Hence a sentence of nullity, and a sentence in affirmance of a marriage, have been received as conclusive evidence on a question of legitimacy arising incidentally upon a claim to a real estate.

A sentence in a cause of jactitation has been received upon a title in ejectment, as evidence against a marriage, and, in like manner in personal actions, immediately founded on a supposed marriage.

So a direct sentence, in a suit upon a promise of marriage, against the contract, has been admitted as evidence against such contract, in an action brought upon the same promise for damages, it being a direct sentence of a competent court, disproving the ground of the action.

So a sentence of nullity is equally evidence in a personal action against a defence founded upon a supposed coverture.

But in all these cases, the parties to the suits, or at least the parties against whom the evidence was received, were parties to the sentence, and had acquiesced under it; or claimed under those who were parties, and had acquiesced.

But although the law stands thus with regard to civil suits, proceedings in matters of crime, and especially of felony, fall under a different consideration: first, because the parties are not the same; for the king, in whom the trust of prosecuting public offences is vested, and which is executed by his immediate orders, or in his name by some prosecutor, is no party to such proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court, and cannot be admitted to defend, examine witnesses, in any manner intervene, or appeal: secondly, such doctrines would tend to give the spiritual courts, which are not permitted to exercise any judicial cognizance in matters of crime, an immediate influence in trials for offences, and to draw the decision from the course of the common law, to which it solely and peculiarly belongs.

The ground of the judicial powers given to ecclesiastical courts is, merely, of a spiritual consideration, pro correctione morum, et pro salute animæ. They are therefore addressed to the conscience of the party. But one great object of temporal jurisdiction is the public peace; and crimes against the public peace are wholly, and in all their parts, of temporal cognizance alone. A felony by common law was also so. A felony by statute becomes so at the moment of its institution. The temporal courts alone can expound the law, and judge of the crime, and its proofs; in doing so, they must see with their own eyes, and try by their own rules, that is, by the common law of the land; it is the trust and sworn duty of their office.

When the acts of Henry the eighth first declared what marriages should be lawful, and what incestuous, the temporal courts, though they had before no jurisdiction, and the acts did not by express words give them any upon the point, decided, incidentally, upon the construction, declared what marriages came within the Levitical degrees, and prohibited the spiritual courts from giving or proceeding upon any other construction.

Whilst an ancient statute subsisted (2 H. IV. 15.) by which personal punishment was incurred on holding heretical doctrines, the temporal courts took notice, incidentally, whether the tenet was heretical or not; for 'the king's courts will examine all things ordained by statute.'

When the statute of W. III. made certain blasphemous doctrines a temporal crime, the temporal courts alone could determine, whether the doctrine complained of was blasphemous so as to constitute the crime.

If a man should be indicted for taking a woman by force and marrying her; or for marrying a child without her father's consent; or for a rape, where the defence is, that 'the woman is his wife;' in all these cases, the temporal courts are bound to try the prisoner by the rules and course of the common law, and incidentally to determine what is heretical, and what is blasphemous; and whether it was a marriage within the statute; a marriage without consent; and whether, in the last case, the woman was his wife: but if they should happen to find, that sentences, in the respective cases, had been given in the Spiritual Court upon the heresy, the blasphemous doctrines, the marriage by force, the marriage without consent, and the marriage on the rape; and the court must receive such sentences as conclusive evidence, in the first instance, without looking into the case, it would vest the substantial and effective decision, though not the cognizance of the crimes, in the Spiritual Court, and leave to the jury, and the temporal courts, nothing but a nominal form of proceeding, upon what would amount to a pre-determined conviction or acquittal; which must have the effect of a real prohibition, since it would be in vain to prefer an indictment, where an act of a foreign court shall at once seal up the lips of the witnesses, the jury, and the court, and put an entire stop to the proceeding.

X x x

And

And yet it is true, that the spiritual courts have no jurisdiction, directly or indirectly, in any matter not altogether spiritual; and it is equally true, that the temporal courts have the sole and entire cognizance of crimes, which are wholly and altogether temporal in their nature.

And if the rule of evidence must be, as it is often declared to be, reciprocal; and that in all cases, in which sentences favourable to the prisoner, are to be admitted as conclusive evidence for him; the sentences, if unfavourable to the prisoner, are in like manner conclusive evidence against him; in what situation must the prisoners be, whose life, or liberty, or property, or fame rests on the judgments of courts, which have no jurisdiction over them in the predicament in which they stand? and in what situation are the judges of the common law, who must condemn, on the word of an ecclesiastical judge, without exercising any judgment of their own?

The Spiritual Court alone can deprive a clergyman. Felony is a good cause of deprivation: yet in lord Hobart's Reports it is held, that they cannot proceed to deprive for felony, before the felony has been tried at law; and although, after conviction, they may act upon that, and make the conviction a ground of deprivation, neither side can prove or disprove any thing against the verdict; because, as that very learned judge declares, 'it would be to determine, though not capitally, upon a capital crime, and thereby judge of the nature of the crime and the validity of the proofs; neither of which belongs to them to do.'

If therefore such a sentence, even upon a matter within their jurisdiction, and before a felony committed, should be conclusive evidence on a trial for a felony committed after, the opinion of a judge, incompetent to the purpose, resulting (for aught appears) from incompetent proofs (as suppose the suppletory oath) will direct, or rule, a jury and a court of competent jurisdiction, without confronting any witnesses, or hearing any proofs: for the question supposes, and the truth is, that the temporal court does not and cannot examine, whether the sentence is a just conclusion from the case, either in law or fact; and the difficulty will not be removed by presuming, that every court determines rightly, because it must be presumed too, that the parties did right in bringing the full and true case before the court; and if they did, still the court will have determined rightly by ecclesiastical laws and rules, and not by those laws and rules by which criminals are to stand or fall in this country.

If the reason for receiving such sentence is, because it is the judgment of a court competent to the enquiry then before them; from the same reason, the determination of two justices of the peace upon the fact or validity of a marriage, in adjudging a place of settlement, may hereafter be offered as evidence, and give the law to the highest court of criminal jurisdiction.

But if a direct sentence upon the identical question, in a matrimonial cause, should be admitted as evidence (though such sentence against the marriage has not the force of a final decision, that there was none) yet a cause of jactitation is of a different nature; it is ranked as a cause of defamation only, and not as a matrimonial cause, unless where the defendant pleads a marriage; and whether it continues a matrimonial cause throughout, as some say, or ceases to be so on failure of proving a marriage, as others have said, still the sentence has only a negative and qualified effect, viz. 'that the party has failed in his proof, and that the libellant is free from all matrimonial contract, as far as yet appears;' leaving it open to new proofs of the same marriage in the same cause, or to any proofs of that or any other marriage in another cause: and if such sentence is no plea to a new suit there, and does not conclude the court which pronounces, it cannot conclude a court, which receives the sentence, from going into new proofs to make out that or any other marriage.

So that admitting the sentence in its full extent and import, it only proves, that it did not yet appear that they were married, and not that they were not married at all: and, by the rule laid down by lord chief justice Holt, such sentence can be no proof of any thing to be inferred by argument from it; and therefore it is not to be inferred, that there was no marriage at any time or place, because the court had not then sufficient evidence to prove a marriage at a particular time and place. That sentence, and this judgment, may stand well together, and both propositions be equally true: it may be true, that the Spiritual Court had not then sufficient proof of the marriage specified, and that your lordships may now, unfortunately, find sufficient proof of some marriage.

But if it was a direct and decisive sentence upon the point, and, as it stands, to be admitted as conclusive evidence upon the court, and not to be impeached from within; yet, like all other acts of the highest judicial authority, it is impeachable from without: although it is not permitted to shew that the court was mistaken, it may be shewn that they were misled.

Fraud is an extrinsic, collateral act, which vitiates the most solemn proceedings of courts of justice. Lord Coke says, it avoids all judicial acts, ecclesiastical or temporal.

In civil suits all strangers may falsify, for covin, either fines, or real or feigned recoveries; and even a recovery by a just title, if collusion was practised to prevent a fair defence; and this, whether the covin is apparent upon the record, as not essoining, or not demanding the view, or by suffering judgment by confession or default; or extrinsic, as not pleading a release, collateral warranty, or other advantageous pleas.

In criminal proceedings if an offender is convicted of felony on confession, or is outlawed, not only the time of the felony, but the felony itself may be traversed by a purchaser, whose conveyance would be affected as it stands; and, even after a conviction by verdict, he may traverse the time.

In the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Court the same rule holds. In Dyer there is an instance of a second administration, fraudulently obtained, to defeat an execution at law against the first; and the fact being admitted by demurrer, the court pronounced against the fraudulent administration. In another instance, an administration had been fraudulently revoked; and the fact being denied, issue was joined upon it; and the collusion being found by a jury, the court gave judgment against it.

In the more modern cases, the question seems to have been, whether the parties should be permitted to prove collusion; and not seeming to doubt but that strangers might.

So that collusion, being a matter extrinsic of the cause, may be imputed by a stranger, and tried by a jury, and determined by the courts of temporal jurisdiction.

And if fraud will vitiate the judicial acts of the temporal courts, there seems as much reason to prevent the mischiefs arising from collusion in the ecclesiastical courts, which, from the nature of their proceedings, are at least as much exposed, and which we find have been, in fact, as much exposed, to be practised upon for sinister purposes, as the courts in Westminster-hall.

We are therefore unanimously of opinion:

First, That a sentence in the Spiritual Court against a marriage in a suit of jactitation of marriage is not conclusive evidence, so as to stop the counsel for the crown from proving the marriage in an indictment for polygamy.

But secondly, Admitting such sentence to be conclusive upon such indictment, the counsel for the crown may be admitted to avoid the effect of such sentence, by proving the same to have been obtained by fraud or collusion.

Die Sabbati, 20^o Aprilis 1776.

ORDERED by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the lord chief justice of the court of Common-Pleas be, and he is hereby desired to, favour this house with a copy of his argument upon the questions proposed to the judges by this house yesterday.

Die Luna, 22^o Aprilis 1776.

ORDERED by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the following question be put to the judges, viz.

Whether a peeress convicted by her peers of a clergyable felony, is by law intitled to the benefit of the statutes, so as to excuse her from capital punishment, without being burnt in the hand, or being liable to any imprisonment?

Whereupon the lord chief baron of the court of Exchequer, having conferred with the rest of the judges present, delivered their unanimous opinion upon the said question, with his reasons, as follow, viz.

My lords,

THE question proposed by your lordships for our opinion is,

Whether a peeress convicted by her peers of a clergyable felony, is by law intitled to the benefit of the statutes, so as to excuse her from capital punishment, without being burnt in the hand, or being liable to any imprisonment?

My lords, your lordships would probably expect, that on a question of this importance the judges would have desired time to have considered of it; but, as it was easy to foresee from the first appointment of this trial, that a question of this sort would probably arise, we have all looked into the several statutes, from which any light could be expected: and as on such a consideration we have been able to form an opinion, in which we all concur, we thought it our duty to deliver it immediately, and not obstruct the public business by unnecessarily protracting this trial, which has already taken up so much of your lordships time.

I am therefore authorized by my brothers to say, we all concur in opinion, that a peeress convicted by her peers of a clergyable felony is by law intitled to the benefit of the statutes, so as to excuse her from capital punishment, without being burnt in the hand, or being liable to any imprisonment.

My lords, the question depends on several acts of parliament. The first I shall trouble your lordships with, is the 29 Hen. VIII. c. 9. which recites, 'that by Magna Charta no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseised of his freehold, or his liberties or free customs, or shall be outlawed, or in any wise destroyed, that is, forejudged of life or limb, or put to death, or shall be condemned at the king's suit, either before the king in his bench, that is, the King's Bench, or before any other commissioner or judge whatsoever, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land; in which statute, that is, Magna Charta, no mention is made how women, ladies of great estate in respect of their husbands peers of the land, married or sole, that is to say, duchesses, countesses, or baronesses, shall be put to answer, or before what judges that they shall be judged upon indictments of treasons or felonies by them committed or done; in regard whereof it is a doubt in the law of England, before whom and by whom such ladies so indicted shall be put to answer and be judged: our said lord the king, willing to put out such ambiguities and doubts, hath declared by authority aforesaid, that such ladies so indicted, or hereafter to be indicted, of any treason or felony by them done or hereafter to be done, whether they be married or sole, that they thereof shall be brought to answer, and put to answer and judged before such judges and peers of the realm, as peers of the realm should be, if they were indicted or impeached of such treasons or felonies done or hereafter to be done, and in like (antient) manner and form, and none otherwise.'

Your lordships will observe, that this statute does not introduce a new law, but is a declarative law, explaining what the true meaning of Magna Charta was. Peers in that statute means equals; and therefore any of the nobility must by Magna Charta be tried by the nobility who are their peers; for all nobility, whether barons the lowest, or dukes the highest, degree degree of nobility, are all equals in this respect: and lord Coke, 2d Inst. 45, says, 'though duchesses, countesses, and baronesses are only named in this declaratory statute, and marchionesses and viscountesses are omitted, notwithstanding, they are also comprehended in this 29th chapter of Magna Charta.'

Peers, though originally meaning only equals, is now by common use applied to a particular part of the nation, distinguished from the rest by superior rank and privileges, which they derive from the king originally by writ or letters patents granted to them or their ancestors; and in cases of such ladies as are not so ennobled, they obtain that nobility by marriage to those who are so ennobled.

As the next statute, 1 E. VI. c. 12, § 14, speaks of the benefit of clergy, it will be necessary to say something upon that subject. Lord Hale, in his second volume of his History of Pleas of the Crown, page 323, says, that 'anciently princes and states converted to Christianity granted the clergy exemptions of places consecrated to religious duties from arrests for crimes, which was the original of sanctuaries; and second, exemptions of their persons from criminal proceedings in some cases capital before secular judges, which was the true original of this privilegium clericale. The clergy increasing in wealth, power, honour, number, and interest, claimed as a right what they at first obtained by the favour of princes and states, and by degrees extended these exemptions to all that had any kind of subordinate ministration relative to the church.'

These exemptions never rose to so great an height in this kingdom as in other places; and therefore the clergy were not exempted here from civil suits, nor was this privilegium clericale allowed in the lowest crimes not capital, nor wherein they were not to lose life or limb, nor in high treason touching the king himself, or his royal majesty: but by 25 E. III. c. 4, de Clero, in all other felonies the ordinary might demand the prisoner as a clerk, or the prisoner himself might demand the benefit of the clergy. The canon law gave the privilege only to men in holy orders: our law, in favour to learning and the desire of the English bishops, extended to lay clerks, i. e. any layman, that by reason of his ability to read was in a possibility of being made a priest. C. J. Treby, State Trials, Vol. V. 171. The means of trying, whether he was intitled to it, was by reading. If he could read, he was delivered to the ordinary, that is, the bishop, or the person who had ordinary jurisdiction there: but the ordinary was so much the minister of the temporal courts, and so subordinate to them, that if the ordinary refused to let the prisoner read, the temporal court could controul, and order a book to be delivered to him; and if the ordinary said he could read when he could not, or vice versa, that he could not read when in reality he could, the temporal courts gave judgment according to the truth of the case; and those courts likewise directed, whether the prisoner should be delivered to the ordinary with purgation, or without purgation: in the last case they were to be kept in the ordinary's prison for life. If delivered with purgation, then the ordinary tried him for the fact whereof he was accused, by a jury of twelve clerks; and if he was acquitted, as was generally the case, he was discharged out of prison. Purgation was the convict's clearing himself of the crime by his own oath, and the oaths or verdict of an inquest of twelve clerks as compurgators. The proceeding was before the ordinary; and old books speak of their making proclamation for persons to come in against his purgation, and of their enquiring into his life, conversation, and fame, and of other formalities; in all which, several statutes say, there were great abuses.

The statute 4 H. VII. c. 13, reciting that 'upon trust of the privilege of the church divers persons have been the more bold to commit murder, rape, robbery, theft, and all other mischievous deeds, because they have been continually admitted to the benefit of the clergy, as oft as they offended:' it enacts, that 'every person not being within orders, which hath once been admitted to the benefit of his clergy, being again arraigned of any such offence, be not admitted to have the benefit or privilege of the clergy; and that every person so convicted for murder (which was then a clergyable offence) should be marked with an M on the brawn of the left thumb; and if he be for any other felony, to be marked with a T in the same place of the thumb; and those marks to be made by the gaoler openly in the court before the judge, before that such person be delivered to the ordinary.'

This statute prevented laymen having their clergy more than once; and the branding answered the purpose of discovering, whether they had the benefit of their clergy before, though it was necessary to prove it by other means, to prevent their having clergy a second time.

The 1 E. VI. c. 12, will come next to be considered; which, after repealing several new-created treasons and felonies, and taking away clergy in several other felonies, in § 14, enacts, that 'in all and every case, where any of the king's majesty's subjects shall and may, upon his prayer, have the privilege of clergy as a clerk convict that may make purgation; in all these cases and every of them, and also in all and every case and cases of felony, wherein the privilege and benefit of clergy is restrained, excepted, or taken away by this statute (wilful murder and poisoning of malice prepensed only excepted) the lord and lords of the parliament, and peer and peers of the realm, having place and voice in parliament, shall by virtue of this present act, of common grace, upon his or their request or prayer, alledging that he is a lord or peer of this realm, and claiming the benefit of this act, though he cannot read, without any burning in the hand, loss of inheritance, or corruption of his blood, be adjudged, deemed, taken, and used, for his first time only, to all intents, constructions, and purposes as a clerk convict, and shall be in case of a clerk convict which may make purgation, without any further or other benefit or privilege of clergy to any such lord or peer from thenceforth at any time after for any cause to be allowed, adjudged, or admitted; any law, statute, usage, or custom, or any other thing to the contrary notwithstanding: provided always, that if any of the said lords of the parliament, or any of the peers of this realm, at the time being, shall fortune to be indicted of any of the offences limited in this act, that then they and every of them shall have his or their trial by their peers; as it hath been used heretofore in cases of treason.'

From the time of this statute, whenever a peer has been convicted of any felony, for which a commoner might have the benefit of clergy, such peer, on praying the benefit of this statute, has always been discharged without burning or delivering to the ordinary: and there are a series of precedents from lord Morley's case, 1666, till one in this reign as late as 1765; and C. J. Treby says, 'the statute 1 E. VI. exempts the peers convict of clergyable felonies from burning in the hand, and virtually repeals the statute, 4 H. VII. as to so much; and the statute 18 Eliz. requires burning in the hand only according to the statute in that behalf before provided: and there being no statute then or now in force to subject peers to such brand, they are in such case (upon the allowing the benefit of the said statute of E. VI. which is as much as clergy without reading or burning) freed from discredit and other penalties of the felony, as much as commoners are by having clergy formally allowed, and being burnt. State Trials, Vol. V. 170.' And he says, 'a peer shall have this benefit without either clergy or burning, a clerk in orders upon clergy alone without burning, and a lay-clerk not without clergy and burning. Ib. 172-3.' And I believe no body can dispute but the law is so. The question therefore is, whether a peeress is not entitled to the same privilege? and we are of opinion that she is.

Peers is a word capable of including the whole body of the peerage, females as well as males; and every personal privilege conferred on peers is by operation of law communicated to peeresses, whether by blood or marriage, though only males are mentioned. As trial by peers, though only recognized in Magna Charta, as belonging to the male sex, nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittimus, did by construction of law belong to females, as appears by 20 H. VI. which is only a declaratory law; so any other personal privilege, granted or confirmed to peers generally, is communicated to females, if it is of a nature capable of being communicated to and enjoyed by them; as trial by peers, freedom from arrest: countess of Rutland's case: Moor 769, and 2 Co. 52. And if those privileges are so communicated, as they certainly are, why should not this given by 1 E. VI. the consequence of which is so reasonable and agreeable to justice, that a female offender shall not undergo a greater punishment than a male of her own rank would do for a crime of the same sort? But it was insisted at the bar, that between 1 E. VI. and 18 Eliz. a peer found guilty of a clergyable offence should be delivered to the ordinary as a clerk convict: and Staunford, 130, is quoted for that purpose, that by the words of this statute a peer ought to make his purgation; and if so, he ought to be delivered to the ordinary to be kept till he has made his purgation. That opinion of Staunford seems contrary to law in many particulars. The 1 E. VI. c. 3. had in effect suspended purgation, even as to commoners: therefore the legislature could never mean to introduce and establish purgation as to a peer, which Hobart says, 289, 'is no ordinance of the common law, but is a practice among themselves, i. e. the clergy, rather overseen and winked at than approved by the common law:' and page 291, he says, 'the perjuries were sundry in the witnesses and compurgators, in the jury of clerks, and the judge himself was not clear, all turning the solemn trial of truth by oath into a ceremonious and formal lie.' It is not probable the parliament, intending a great distinction in favour of peers, so as to dispense with reading and burning in the hand, meant to leave a peer a prisoner in the custody of the ordinary, and to have his credit and capacity to acquire personal property, and enjoy the profits of his lands, to be decided upon in such a mock trial; and in fact there is no instance in any of the law books, where a peer convicted of a clergyable felony has ever been delivered to the ordinary, or has made purgation: and the jurisdiction of the ordinary to purge the clerk only relates to clerks in orders, or such as the common law considered as clerks; and a peer not being a clerk, he could not make purgation, the ordinary having no jurisdiction over him; and the words here, 'have the privilege of clergy as a clerk convict that may make purgation, and shall be adjudged, deemed, taken, and used for his first time only to all intents, constructions, and purposes as a clerk convict, and shall be in case of a clerk convict which may make purgation,' do not import or direct that he shall make purgation; but give a peer the same advantage as a clerk convict who might make purgation, i. e. an absolute discharge from all further punishment; and the statute, as to him, is to be construed to be a pardon: and it seems most probable, that peers never did make purgation; because, as all who made purgation were to be tried by a jury of clerks, such trial would be derogatory to their inherent privilege of being tried by their peers. Lord chief justice Hale, on this statute (2 H. H. P. C. 376) says, I think, 'it was never meant that a peer of the realm should be put to read, or be burnt in the hand, where a common person should be put to his clergy;' neither is it said, that he shall be discharged by his praying of the benefit of this statute, where a common person shall have the privilege of clergy, and may make his purgation; but only where he may have the benefit of his clergy in the first clause of the statute: the other clause (shall be in case of a clerk convict that may make purgation) is only for his speedier discharge, and farther advantage, and not to restrain the general clause. But it is objected, that the statute 1 E. VI. c. 12, gives this privilege only to 'lord and lords of the parliament, and peer and peers of the realm having place and voice in the parliament;' and that a peeress, not having place and voice in parliament, cannot have the benefit of this statute. This expression, 'having place and voice in parliament,' cannot mean to exclude all peers but such as sat in parliament; but to describe some of the incidents of peerage, or to include bishops, who are lords of parliament though not peers: and if these words should confine the benefit of this statute to those only who actually sat in parliament, it would exclude peers minors, and papist peers, who, by statute 30 Car. II. stat. 2. c. 1, are now rendered incapable of sitting or voting in parliament: the words therefore are merely descriptive, and not restrictive. And what what makes it very plain is, that, in the 4th and 5th P. and M. c. 4, which takes away clergy from accessaries before the fact in murder and several other offences, there is a proviso that every lord and lords of the parliament, and peer and peers of this realm, having place and voice in parliament, upon every indictment for any of the offences aforesaid, shall be tried by their peers, as hath been accustomed by the laws of this realm. Here are the very words used in 1 E. VI. c. 12; yet it could never be doubted, but notwithstanding those words, peeresses must be tried by their peers for offences against that statute; and lady Somerſet was tried by her peers for being accessary to the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, which was an offence against that very statute. What gave rise probably to this statute, 1 E. VI. c. 12, was another statute passed the same year, c. 3. providing for the punishment of vagabonds, by making them slaves for two years; in which act was a clause, that no clerk convicted shall make his purgation, but shall be a slave for one year to him who will become bound with two sureties to the ordinary to take him into his service, and he shall be used like a vagabond; and a clerk attainted or convicted, which by law cannot make his purgation, may by the ordinary be delivered to any man, who will give security to keep him as his slave for five years; and it shall be lawful to every person, to whom any shall be adjudged a slave, to put a ring of iron about his neck, arm, or leg. To avoid all possible question whether a peer could be subject to any of these provisions, this act, 1 E. VI. c. 12, provides for their immediate delivery, on praying the benefit of this statute. This statute 1 E. VI. c. 3, was repealed 3d and 4th E. VI. c. 16, but was in force when 1 E. VI. c. 12, was made. The next statute, 18 Eliz. c. 7. provides, that every person which shall be admitted and allowed to have the benefit of privilege of his clergy, shall not thereupon be delivered to the ordinary, as has been accustomed; but, after such clergy allowed and burning in the hand, according to the statute in that behalf provided, shall forthwith be enlarged and delivered out of prison by the justices, before whom such clergy shall be granted, that cause notwithstanding. Then follows the proviso, that the justices, before whom any such allowance of clergy shall be had, shall and may, for the further correction of such persons to whom clergy shall be allowed, detain and keep them in prison for such convenient time as the same justices in their discretions shall think convenient, so as the same do not exceed one year's imprisonment. This proviso plainly relates only to those persons mentioned in the clause, that is, such persons as had been burnt in the hand according to the statute in that case made and provided, meaning 4 H. VII. As peers therefore are not to be burnt in the hand, they cannot be imprisoned; for those only are to be imprisoned who have been burnt in the hand; and the word, justices, is more properly applicable to other courts of judicature than to this house. The 21 Ja. I. c. 7, cannot relate to this question; for it relates to common persons, and was intended to put women on the same footing with men, as to small larcenies; and 3d and 4th W. and M. c. 9, does the same in all clergyable felonies. This shews the justice of allowing to the peeresses the same benefit of 1 E. VI. c. 12, as peers have; and it is natural to suppose, that when the legislature were putting women of inferior rank on the same footing as men, they would have put peeresses on the same footing with peers, had it not been conceived that the same privileges were already extended to both.

Upon the whole therefore, by stat. 1 E. VI. a peer convicted of a clergyable felony is intitled to his immediate discharge, without reading or burning in the hand, or being liable to imprisonment by 18 Eliz.

This privilege, given by statute, being such as may be enjoyed by a peeress, is by operation of law communicated to her, and puts her in the same situation as a peer; the consequence of which is, that a peeress, convicted of a clergyable felony, praying the benefit of this statute, is not only excused from capital punishment, but ought to be immediately discharged, without being burnt in the hand, or liable to any imprisonment.

XXXI. Proceedings against JOHN HORNE, Esquire, on an Information in the King's Bench by the Attorney-General for a Libel, 4 July, and 19 and 24th of November, 1777.

[These proceedings were published by the defendant Mr. Horne from Mr. Gurney's short-hand notes. The first part of them contains the trial of Mr. Horne at Guildhall, before lord Mansfield, in his court of nisi prius as chief justice of the King's Bench at Guildhall. The second part is an account of the proceedings in the court of King's Bench Westminster, when the attorney-general moved for judgment against Mr. Horne.]

1. The trial at Guildhall (a).

ONDON, } BE it remembered, That Edward Thurlow, Esq; attorney-general of our present sovereign lord the king, who for our said present sovereign lord the king prosecutes in this behalf in his proper person, comes into the court of our said present sovereign lord the king before the king himself, at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, on Thursday next after fifteen days from the day of St. Martin in this same term, and for our said lord the king giveth the court here to understand and be informed, that John Horne, late of London, clerk, being a wicked, malicious, seditious, and ill-disposed person, and being greatly disaffected to our said present sovereign lord the king and to his administration of the government of this kingdom and the dominions thereunto belonging, and wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously intending, devising, and contriving to stir up and excite discontents and seditions among his majesty's subjects, and to alienate and withdraw the affection, fidelity, and allegiance of his said majesty's subjects from his said majesty, and to insinuate and cause it to be believed that divers of his majesty's innocent and deserving subjects had been inhumanly murdered by his said majesty's troops in the province, colony, or plantation of the Massachusetts-Bay in New-England, in America, belonging to the crown of Great-Britain, and unlawfully and wickedly to seduce and encourage his majesty's subjects in the said province, colony, or plantation, to resist and oppose his majesty's government, on the eighth day of June, in the fifteenth year of the reign of our present sovereign lord George the third, by the grace of God of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. with force and arms at London aforesaid, in the parish of St. Mary-le-bow, in the ward of Cheap, wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously did write and publish, and cause and procure to be written and published, a certain false, wicked, malicious, scandalous, and seditious libel of and concerning his said majesty's government and the employment of his troops, according to the tenor and effect following: 'King's Arms tavern, Cornhill, June 7, 1775.  aforesaid, wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously did print and publish, and cause and procure to be printed and published, a certain other false, wicked, malicious, scandalous, and seditious libel of and concerning his said majesty's government and the employment of his troops, according to the tenor and effect following; that is to say, 'King's Arms Tavern, Cornhill, June 7. At a special meeting this day of several members of the Constitutional Society, during an adjournment, a gentleman proposed that a subscription should be immediately entered into (by such of the members present who might approve the purpose) for raising the sum of 100l. to be applied to the relief of the widows, orphans, and aged parents of our beloved American fellow-subjects, who, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were for that reason only inhumanly murdered by the king's (again meaning his said majesty's) troops at or near Lexington and Concord, in the province of Massachusetts (meaning the said province, colony, or plantation of the Massachusetts Bay in New-England, in America) on the nineteenth of last April; which sum being immediately collected, it was thereupon resolved that Mr. Horne (again meaning himself the said John Horne) do pay tomorrow into the hands of Messrs. Brownes and Collinson, on account of Dr. Franklin, the said sum of 100l. and that Dr. Franklin be requested to apply the same to the above-mentioned purpose; John Horne (again meaning himself the said John Horne) in contempt of our said lord the king, in open violation of the laws of this kingdom, to the evil and pernicious example of all others in the like case offending; and also against the peace of our said present sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity: and the said attorney-general of our said present sovereign lord the king for our said lord the king further gives the court here to understand and be informed, that the said John Horne being such person as aforesaid, and contriving and wickedly and maliciously devising and intending as aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, on the ninth of June in the fifteenth year aforesaid, with force and arms at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously did print and publish, and cause and procure to be printed and published, a certain other false, wicked, malicious, scandalous, and seditious libel, in which said last-mentioned libel are contained, amongst other things, divers false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious matters of and concerning his Majesty's government, and the employment of his troops, according to the tenor and effect following; that is to say, 'King's Arms Tavern, Cornhill, June 7. At a special meeting this day of several members of the Constitutional Society, during an adjournment, a gentleman proposed that a subscription should be immediately entered into (by such of the members present who might approve the purpose) for raising the sum of 100l. to be applied to the relief of the widows, orphans, and aged parents of our beloved American fellow-subjects, who, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were for that reason only inhumanly murdered by the king's (again meaning his said majesty's) troops at or near Lexington and Concord, in the province of Massachusetts (meaning the said province, colony, or plantation of the Massachusetts Bay in New England, in America) on the 19th of last April, in contempt of our said lord the king, in open violation of the laws of this kingdom, to the evil and pernicious example of all others in the like case offending, and also against the peace of our said present sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity: and the said attorney-general of our said lord the king for our said lord the king further gives the court here to understand and be informed, that the said John Horne being such person as aforesaid, and again unlawfully, wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously intending, devising, and contriving as aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, on the 14th day of July, in the 15th year aforesaid, with force and arms at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously did write and publish, and cause and procure to be written and published, a certain false, wicked, malicious, scandalous and seditious libel of and concerning his said majesty's government and the employment of his troops, according to the tenor and effect following: 'I (meaning himself the said John Horne) think it proper to give the unknown contributor this notice, that I (again meaning himself the said John Horne) did yesterday pay to Messieurs Brownes and Collinson, on the account of Dr. Franklin, the sum of 50l. and that I (again meaning himself the said John Horne) will write to Dr. Franklin, requesting him to apply the same to the relief of the widows, orphans, and aged parents of our beloved American fellow-subjects, who, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were for that reason only inhumanly murdered by the king's (meaning his said majesty's) troops at or near Lexington and Concord, in the province of Massachusetts, (meaning the said province, colony, or plantation of the Massachusetts Bay in New England, in America) on the 19th of last April; ample of all others in the like case offending, and also against the peace of our said lord the king, his crown and dignity: and the said attorney-general of our said present sovereign lord the king for our said lord the king further gives the court here to understand and be informed, that the said John Horne being such person as aforesaid, and contriving and wickedly and maliciously devising and intending as aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, on the said 15th day of July in the 15th year aforesaid, with force and arms at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, wickedly, maliciously; and seditiously did print and publish, and cause and procure to be printed and published, a certain other false, wicked, malicious, scandalous, and seditious libel of and concerning his majesty's government and the employment of his troops, according to the tenor and effect following; that is to say, 'I (meaning himself the said John Horne) think it proper to give the unknown contributor this notice; that I (meaning himself the said John Horne) did yesterday pay to Messieurs Brownes and Collinson, on the account of Dr. Franklin, the sum of 50*l.* and that I (again meaning himself the said John Horne) will write to Dr. Franklin, requesting him to apply the same to the relief of the widows, orphans, and aged parents of our beloved American fellow-subjects, who, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were for that reason only inhumanly murdered by the king's (again meaning his said majesty's) troops at or near Lexington and Concord, in the province of Massachusetts (meaning the said province, colony, and plantation of the Massachusetts-Bay in New England, in America) on the 19th of last April; John Horne (again meaning himself the said John Horne) in contempt of our said lord the king, in open violation of the laws of this kingdom, to the evil and pernicious example of all others in the like case offending, and against the peace of our said present sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity: whereupon the said attorney-general of our said lord the king, who for our said present sovereign lord the king prosecutes in this behalf, prays the consideration of the court here in the premises, and that due process of law may be awarded against him the said John Horne in this behalf, to make him answer to our said present sovereign lord the king touching and concerning the premises aforesaid, &c.

E. THURLOW.

Friday, July 4, 1777.

AS soon as the court was opened, the special jury were called over: eleven only appearing, Mr. Attorney-General prayed a tales. The box containing the names of the common jury standing open upon the table, the associate took out a paper, and, shewing it to Mr. Horne, asked, if he had any objection to that man's being sworn on the jury? Mr. Horne replied, 'I object to that name, and for this reason: I desire that the box may be shut and shaken; and when that is done, I shall have no objection to any name.' The box was accordingly shut and shaken, and a name drawn out; but another of the special jury coming into court, the talesman was not sworn.

The following special jury were sworn.

Joseph Dalmer,	Curfitor-street,	Merchant,
Philip Bulkley,	Fleet-street,	Druggist,
James Brant,	Cheapside,	Silkman,
David Buffar,	Cheapside,	Woollen-draper,
William Watts,	Fore-street,	Goldsmith,
Nathaniel Lucas,	Fore-street,	Merchant,
William Abdy,	Oat-lane,	Goldsmith,
Thomas Smith,	Milk-street,	Merchant,
Thomas Brooks,	Cateaton-street,	Linen-draper,
Matthew Stanton,	Aldermanbury,	Warehoufeman,
William Loyd,	Christ-church,	Woollen-draper,
Henry Morris,	Fleet-street,	Silversmith.

Then the information was opened by Mr. Buller.

Mr. Horne. My lord, with your lordship's permission, I believe it is proper for me, at this time, before Mr. Attorney-General proceeds, to make an objection; and to request your lordship's decision concerning a point of practice in the proceeding of this trial. Have I your lordship's leave?

Lord Mansfield. Certainly.

Mr. Horne. Gentlemen of the jury—

Lord Mansfield. No. Not to the jury. If you make an objection to the irregularity of the proceedings, you must address me.

Mr. Horne. I am well aware of it: and I hope that your lordship will, upon this and other occasions, hear me before you suppose me to be in the wrong. I was not going to address my argument nor my objection to the jury: if your lordship will only permit me to request their attention; because I have frequently observed upon trials, that in all cases almost, when application has been made to the judge to decide upon any objection, the jury have been generally supposed to be in a manner out of court; and I therefore now address myself to the jury, only to request their attention, and for no other purpose.

Lord Mansfield. Very well, Go on.

Mr. Horne. Gentlemen of the jury, what I have said to his lordship, if you heard it, may perhaps make it unnecessary for me to address you. Gentlemen, though what I am going to say to his lordship respects a matter of law and practice of the court, yet I meant to request your attention, because you may find perhaps that the decision may concern you to hear it.—My lord, I understand (and I think I see good reasons why it should be so) that it is the usual practice and wholesome custom of the court, in trials of this kind, that unless the defendant examines witnesses in his defence, the defendant's answer closes the pleading: and it is not the practice, in that case, that the counsel for the prosecution should reply. But, my lord, in the late trials of the printers, for printing and publishing the advertisement now in question, I observed that Mr. Attorney-General claimed and exercised the peculiar privilege of replying, notwithstanding that no witnesses had been called for the defendant. My lord, with your lordship's permission, I mean to submit my reasons to your lordship in support of my objection to this claim of Mr. Attorney-General in the present trial.

Lord Mansfield. You come too early for the objection; because the objection, if there is any foundation in it, should be when he gets up to reply.

Mr. Horne. My lord, I own I did expect that Mr. Attorney-General would urge something of that kind against what I have said. I stopped, expecting that answer from him; because, my lord, he may, very likely, imagine it to be a part of the duty of his office to baffle me in any manner, and to take all advantages which he can, whether fair or unfair, against me, and to obtain a verdict against me by any means. There are reasons why he should attempt to do so;—and therefore, I own, I expected that the attorney-general would have urged that against me. But, my lord, I apprehend; with great submission, that this, and this only, is the proper moment—

Lord Mansfield. Mr. Horne, I will do so far for you. If the defence that you are to make, may in any manner be guided or governed by a knowledge, whether the attorney-general has or has not a right to reply; if Mr. Attorney-General acquiesces in it, I have no objection to your being apprized how it stands beforehand; because otherwise it would come after you had made your defence: and if you mean to calculate your defence in some way different, upon the expectation of his having or his not having a right to reply, I will willingly (I dare say the attorney-general makes no objection to it) hear you upon that point now.

Mr. Attorney-General. None in the world.

Mr. Horne. Your lordship has hit upon one of the very reasons that I was going to lay before you. But, my lord, I had rather that this had come as a matter of justice, than as an acquiescence from the attorney-general; because I suppose that every defendant, who shall hereafter stand in my situation, will have the same right; and, if it comes as a matter of favour from the attorney-general, those for whom I am much more concerned than myself, may not perhaps meet with that genteel acquiescence. However, I thank the attorney-general. I shall beg then, my lord, at present to make my objection. I am sure I should have been permitted to make it, because the arguments which I had to use would have been such as would more particularly have affected your lordship's mind. If then I am permitted, I suppose that I am now to object to the right of reply.

Lord Mansfield. You are now to object to the right of reply.

Mr. Horne. My lord, if I should forget any thing upon this occasion, so new to me, and make any mistakes, I shall beg leave to refresh my memory with what I have written down. My lord, I have been taught by the best authorities, that the established practice and approved rules of the court are so, only because they are reason, and reason approved by long experience; and they obtain as rules and practice only for that cause. My lord, I believe I shall not be contradicted by your lordship, when I aver, that it is the established practice and approved rule of the court, in trials of this kind (where the attorney-general does not prosecute) that if the evidence brought for the prosecution is not controverted by any other evidence on the part of the defendant, but the fact, as far as it depends upon testimony, taken as the prosecutor's evidence left it; that then the defendant's answer closes the pleading. And this, my lord, has obtained and been established as the approved rule and practice of the court, because it is supposed the method best calculated for the obtaining of justice; that is, for the conviction of the guilty and the acquittal of the innocent; for both are to be regarded: and when that is done, then only, I suppose, is justice done. Now, my lord, the reason of this practice is not, like some others, so covered over by the rust of ages, or disguised by the change of circumstances, as that it should be difficult now to discover it. On the contrary, it is, to my understanding and apprehension, as plain and evident now as it was the first day that it was introduced. But that is no part of my business to enter into: the reason of the practice it does not belong to me to give. It is sufficient for me to say that such is the practice, and being the practice, it must be supposed the best method of obtaining justice. Then, my lord, I humbly submit it to your lordship, that if this is the best method for obtaining of justice, a contrary method must be attempted for some other end; and that end must be injustice, or the conviction of the accused by any means. My lord, the practice, and this exemption from it, which Mr. Attorney-General claims, cannot both stand: one or the other must be given up; because they cannot both be the best method and most likely means for the obtaining of justice. Now, my lord, that the king, or that the attorney-general in his name, should be permitted to pursue any other method or practice than that established method which is best calculated for the obtaining of justice, seems to me completely absurd. For the king, such as the law and such as reason conceive him, can have no other interest but in the obtaining of justice, impartial justice. And if it was possible, my lord, to conceive a king even with a leaning or an inclination on either side, it must rather be that his subjects should be found innocent than guilty. But this claim of Mr. Attorney-General, my lord, absurdly supposes the contrary; and that the king has an interest in their being convicted; and that therefore easier and readier means, and greater means, are to be allowed to the king for obtaining a conviction, than are allowed to any other person, my equal or my inferior. And yet, my lord, I must acknowledge that the claim which I am now objecting to, is not a new one. My lord, in the reign of James the second, that man (for he never was for one moment a king) claimed the peculiar right, prerogative, and power of dispensing with the laws of the land. Sir Edward Herbert, the chief justice of those days, and the other judges decided in favour of that claim. Thank God,

God, my lord, the glorious Revolution—(and I call it so: it shall not have less praise from me because it is now grown uncourtly)—the glorious Revolution put an end to that iniquity. Unfortunately for this country, the principles which produced that and many other iniquities are now again revived and fostered; and amongst many other most shameful doctrines, this doctrine of dispensing power is now revived again—under another shape and form indeed; but it is the same power. It is now a prerogative to dispense with the rules and methods of proceeding; that is, my lord, to dispense with the laws: for the rules and methods of proceeding (and I have heard your lordship say it in other cases) are parts of the laws of the land. My lord, I have been told (and that by a greater authority than any almost that now lives) that ‘the methods and forms of justice are essential to justice itself.’ And, my lord, the forms and methods of proceeding are particularly that tender part of the laws which is calculated for the protection of innocence. My lord, the penal laws are made to bring criminals and offenders to justice; but the forms and methods of proceeding of the courts of justice are appointed singly to distinguish the innocent from the guilty, and to protect them against exorbitant power. My lord, in the case of this particular privilege which the attorney-general claims, I think I could spend a day in shewing how many received legal maxims and truths it violates: for truth is of such a nature that it has a thousand branches issuing from it; and falsehood, let it be as careful as it can, will run against some one or other of them. I do really believe I could fairly spend a day in shewing the absurdity of this claim. But yet, to my great disadvantage and my great sorrow, when, in the late trial of the printers, the defendant’s counsel objected to this claim of Mr. Attorney-General, your lordship interfered hastily, and saved Mr. Attorney-General the trouble of vindicating his claim. Your lordship saved him from the embarrassment he would then have found, and which I am confident he will now find, to produce one single argument of reason or justice in behalf of his claim: and this your lordship did by an absolute overbearing of the objection, without even permitting an argument. And, my lord, that is a very great disadvantage to me, as well as it was to the defendant in whose cause he made it: for, my lord, the very ingenious counsel—I beg the gentleman’s pardon for attempting to distinguish him by that epithet; there is no want of ingenuity at the bar—but the very honest counsel who made that objection, would have been able to support it in a very different manner from any in which I can expect to do it. My lord, the trial may take up some time; therefore I will no longer hold you on this objection. I shall reserve to myself the right, which I did exercise in condemning the action of the king’s troops (which I did then call, and do still, and will to-morrow call, because contrary to law, a murder) so I shall reserve it to myself, and not now take up more of the time, to say what I shall think proper by argument and reason on the decision of your lordship; which decision must come after your lordship shall have heard the attorney-general’s answer, and my reply:—for I take it I have a right to reply. I shall then reserve that power to myself to speak as freely of it as I should do of any other indifferent action in the world.

Lord Mansfield. There is no occasion for Mr. Attorney-General to say any thing. I am most clear that the attorney-general has a right to reply if he thinks fit, and that I cannot deprive him of it; and there is no such rule, that in no case a private prosecutor or private plaintiff shall not reply, if new matter is urged which calls for a reply; new questions of law, new observations, or any matter that makes a reply necessary. No authority at law has been quoted to the contrary. A party that begins has a right to reply; there is not a State Trial where the solicitor-general or the attorney-general have not replied; and I know of no law that says in any case the prosecutor may not reply. But, for the saving of time, rules by usage of the bar are received. Two gentlemen don’t examine the same witness, but yet they do very often. They don’t reply when there is no evidence for a defendant, and nothing new to make it necessary to reply, then they don’t do it; but if a question of law was started, which nobody thought of in the beginning, they do it then: then they have a right to reply, and must reply, for the sake of justice; and therefore I apprise Mr. Horne that the attorney-general certainly has a right to reply.

Mr. Horne. Your lordship must be very sensible how untoward is my situation in this case. This is only a repetition of what happened before; if your lordship will thus do the business of Mr. Attorney-General for him. My lord, you now take from me what you give to him; you take from me that right of reply which by the practice of the court I have, whilst you give to him that right of reply which by the practice of the court he has not. I have a right to reply to the attorney-general’s answer to my objection, but I have no right to reply upon the judge. I beg the attorney-general may do his own business. He is full of reason and argument. He smiles. Indeed he well may. My lord, he can surely prove the justice of his claim himself, if there is any in it. My lord—

Lord Mansfield. Sir—hear—Your proper reply to the judgment I have given is a motion to the court; I never here decide.—It is speaking to no purpose to persuade me where I have no doubt.—The attorney-general here will be of the same opinion with me. But your proper reply to me, is a motion to the court; and if the suffering him to reply is against law, it is an irregularity in the trial, for which the verdict will be set aside. You will have a remedy.

Mr. Horne. O, my lord, I have already suffered under your lordship’s directing me to remedies. The most cruel of all poisoners are those who poison our remedies. Has your lordship forgotten?—I am sure you have not forgotten that I have, once before in my life, had the honour to be tried before your lordship for a pretended libel. My lord, this matter of reply I know so well to be the practice, not only from the intelligence I have had upon that subject, but from that very trial at Guildford, on the action brought against me by the present lord Onslow. My lord, I could then have contradicted his evidence. I will just mention two or three particulars in this case.—It was the most scandalous one that ever came before a court.—(Your lordship cannot forget the particulars in that trial.) I was prosecuted by him for a libel. On the first action which he brought, I obtained a nonsuit. Upon that, a fresh action was brought. To that fresh action (in order to try it in Surrey, where the plaintiff had his influence) in that fresh action, words spoken a year or two before were added, words of a different nature, and upon a different subject. We came to trial before your lordship, and I do remember some very strong cases (which indeed I intended to have published) of your lordship’s practice in that trial. But, my lord, however impatient I may be thought to be, I am very patient under personal injuries. I have never complained of the practices used against me on that trial, nor of the mistakes (to speak gently) which your lordship made. Your lordship then told me, as now, that I should have a remedy—

Mr. Attorney-General. I beg leave to object to this way of proceeding in a trial. What can it be to the issue that is joined in this cause, any part of the history of what related to the trial at Guildford?

Lord Mansfield. If I remember right, you had a remedy there, for it was determined not to be actionable.

Mr. Horne. True, my lord; but it cost me 200*l*. The remedy was almost as bad as the verdict would have been.

Lord Mansfield. There must be an end.

Mr. Horne. Not of this objection.

Lord Mansfield. No; an end of going out of the cause. You must behave decently and properly.

Mr. Horne. I will surely behave properly.

Lord Mansfield. This is over.—I tell you beforehand, I apprise you of it (which is going out of the way) that it is not in my power to deprive the prosecutor of replying, if he sees cause to desire it.

Mr. Horne. Now then, my lord, I entreat you to let me decently tell you of the situation you put me into. When I offer to prove by argument the right which I have to make my objection at this time, your lordship kindly stops me, and takes it for granted. Then, afterwards, it seems, it is you who apprized me. You tell me you have, out of the rule, apprized me: yet, because I accepted that which I knew to be my right as an appraisal which you were willing to give me, not meaning however to preclude myself from the argument, your lordship makes use of my acceptance of this appraisal to defeat my objection. First, your lordship interferes to save Mr. Attorney-General from attempting to give a reason, which you both know he cannot give; and then Mr. Attorney-General gets up to save your lordship in his turn, and to stop me from explaining your lordship’s conduct. Thus between your lordship and Mr. Attorney-General, a defendant is in a blessed situation! (Here some promiscuous altercation ensued, after which Mr. Horne proceeded.) What I was speaking of was merely this; that the practice—

—(Here again some interruption) I was going to shew your lordship (in answer to what fell from you, and not distinct from this cause, nor from what your lordship had said) I was going, and decently going, to shew your lordship, that it was the practice of the court that the prosecutor should not reply unless evidence is called for the defendant. I was going to shew it to your lordship from my own particular case before your lordship at Guildford, and that I suffered under it considerably; and I mentioned the instance. I am sure that is not wandering from the point, when your lordship has said, that it was not the practice of the court. If the attorney-general had said so, I should have had a right to reply to him. But I must say, as before, if your lordship is to do the attorney-general’s business, and so cut off my reply, and then Mr. Attorney-General is to get up and say, This has nothing to do with the cause; between the chief justice and the attorney-general, what am I to do? My lord, I beg leave to mention to your lordship, that if the attorney-general had said truly, and that I had wandered from the case, it would not be wonderful if I, unused to these matters, should wander a little; and your lordship should have some indulgence to my situation. My lord, I was going to mention to your lordship my own case: all I know of law is from my own case, and from what I have been a witness of myself. I, in that case, at Guildford, did suffer a false evidence to procure (by your lordship’s mistaken direction) a bad, false verdict; because I was told by my counsel (some of the first counsel in this country) that the words themselves were not actionable; and therefore, tho’ I could have proved by gentlemen in court that the words sworn against me were not spoken by me; yet my counsel told me it was better for me to let those words go as proved, than, by calling evidence, to give to the prosecutor a right of reply, which otherwise he would not have: therefore I suffered the words to be supposed to have been spoken, rather than to give to my adversary a right to a reply. But now I find he had that right without my calling evidence; that is, I am told so by your lordship, though I have been told otherwise by all the counsel and all the trials I have ever been at. My lord, as for quoting laws for the practice, I hope your lordship does not expect me to quote law in a matter of practice, and indeed in hardly any other matter, except the law that I have learned from your lordship. I was a constant attender of your lordship some years ago, and I have gathered from your practice some things which I take to be, and some which I take not to be maxims of law. Now, in that case I mentioned at Guildford, I suffered words to go as proved, which I could have disproved—and there are gentlemen in court now who know the fact, and would have been the evidences—I suffered words to go as proved, because I would not give the prosecutor a right to reply. Your Lordship directed the jury to find a verdict for the words; and your lordship said, if your direction was mistaken (because my counsel had argued that the words were not actionable) your lordship told my counsel—(he published a pamphlet afterwards;—he was much hurt at it) you said that what he had advanced surprised you; that it was new law; such as you had never heard before—(he was much hurt at it; he felt it: he was hurt at your lordship’s declaration: he published a pamphlet afterwards addressed to your lordship, which I am sure you must remember).—My lord, in consequence of your lordship’s direction, a verdict was given against me for 400*l*.; and you said, if you were mistaken in your directions, that I had a remedy; I need only appeal to the the court! I had a remedy. What sort of a remedy? The expence of the remedy was almost equal to the verdict. The verdict was set aside, that is true; but your lordship knows that a verdict makes the defendant pay his own costs. I should have had the costs, if the verdict had not been given against me. What sort of remedies are these, that are worse than the fair honest punishment that can be inflicted upon the charge? Therefore I do intreat that your lordship will not send me to remedies which I hardly know how to take; especially as I have always found that such kind of remedies from your lordship are like giving a man a wound, and then telling him where he may find a plaister: it is not a thing that I should wish to do, nor would your lordship like to suffer. And as your lordship says that no law has been quoted to prevent his reply, I intreat that I may hear from Mr. Attorney-General, or from yourself, that law that gives him a right to reply.

Lord Mansfield (to the attorney-general). Go on with the trial.

Mr. Horne. I shall hear no reason then from either of you? Well! if so, I must submit under it.

Mr. Attorney-General.

My lord, and gentlemen of the jury, there is nothing in this case (unless the behaviour of the defendant should constitute that something) that can make it at all different from the most ordinary case of a plain delinquent in a most gross offence being brought before a court of justice. I have looked round with a degree of examination to see if I could see whether there was one amongst the numerous bystanders that I saw here, who had conceived a favourable impression from so extraordinary an interposition as one has heard to-day. I certainly should not rise to take off or repel loose slander scattered about without being pointed at any one individual particularly, much less should I take notice of that sort of slander which, affecting to point itself, only disgraced itself in the manner of that affectation. For my own part, I should think I was stooping exceedingly below that character and that situation in the world which I hope I am entitled to, if I were to set myself to defend my own peculiar part from any aspersions that have been thrown upon me. It is the duty of my office to prosecute with integrity those whom, according to the best of my judgment, I believe to be fair objects of prosecution. It is the duty of my office, as far as I can govern that duty, to conduct the prosecution with the utmost clearness and the fullest honour. And if I have taken a part in this, or in any prosecution that any man can fairly stand forth, in a manly style, and challenge directly and pointedly, let it be challenged, and let me be called upon to answer it. But to be told that I stand here ready to take all manner of advantages, fair or unfair, against the delinquents whom I call into justice, it is a sort of aspersion below refutation; and I will not stoop to take notice of it, unless it would condescend upon some particular act in my conduct that makes me an object of that species of animadversion. Whether I am or whether I am not to reply in such a cause as this, it is, in this moment of it, not only not so much irregular to advance it, as impossible to foresee. When I read over the case, when I consider the effect of it, I cannot foretell the slightest occasion to trouble you by way of reply; for of all the plain and simple matters that ever I had occasion to lay before a court of justice, there is the least degree of complication in that which I am about to state to you now.

This is an information brought against Mr. Horne for being the author and the original publisher of this libel. The crime that I put most upon is that which I stated last, that he was the original publisher of this libel. It is in that respect that his crime appears to me to differ most from those that have been called into justice before. The circumstance of his name being printed at the bottom of the libel was an additional aggravation in this respect, because it seemed to imply a bolder insult upon manners and decency, and the laws of the country, than a simple publication of a libel without that name would have been. It seemed to imply, because, while that name lay hid behind the printer of the paper, the stoutest champion for sedition could not have defied the laws with greater security; for, though it stood in capitals upon the front of many thousand pages, yet it was as inscrutable as impossible for me to follow, as if the name had not appeared upon the paper at all. For the rest of it, I put it upon the publication, chiefly because that seems to be the whole object and drift of the composer of the libel: for as a composition it is absolutely nothing. I do not mean to speak of it by way of derogation from the parts and talents of the ingenious gentleman (whose parts and talents I never heard so much of as I have done to-day) I do not mean to speak in derogation of them; no doubt but he could have writ a better thing: but his understanding was industriously let down and suppressed; and the very purpose of this writing was to make it ribaldry and trash. For the intention of it was (as it appears to me) the intention of it was nothing more than to defy the laws and justice of the country, proclaiming, as it were, thus: either punish this libel, or confess that there are no laws in the country by which a libel can be punished. Others have entertained sufficient malice against this country; others have been anxious enough to excite sedition; but this is written chiefly with the purpose of telling mankind—Thus I dare do! I dare insult the laws without having any earthly thing to state to the public, except an insult upon the laws. Sometimes a libel is covered (though thinly covered enough) with the pretence of informing mankind, or of discussing public subjects for the use of mankind: here is not even the affectation of giving information: here is not even the affectation of discussion: but the writer tells you in so many blunt words (of no kind of meaning in the world, but to convey reproach and scandal) that the persons who were employed by the government are guilty of murder; and the persons who employed them consequently involved in the same guilt. For what is the nature of the libel that is published—King's Arms tavern—At a meeting held during an adjournment (I did not mean to make any observation upon the meeting during an adjournment)—a gentleman proposed that a subscription should be entered into—(this I conceive to be a device—not a very rich one in point of invention—but a device to introduce that which follows) a gentleman proposed that a subscription should be entered into by such of the members present who might approve of the same, for the purpose of raising the sum of 100*l.* to be applied to the relief of the widows, orphans, and aged parents of our beloved American fellow-subjects, who, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were for that reason only inhumanly murdered by the king's troops. —Murdered by the king's troops! What kind of palliation (justification it is absurd and nonsense to talk of) but what kind of palliation can be given to the charging men with the crime of murder, by writing against them in a news-paper? Is it to be laid down for law, or a thing to be tolerated in a civilized country, that crimes of the most heinous sort shall be imputed to men by a public reviler in a news-paper, who yet dares not stand forth as an accuser? Is that to be tolerated in a civilized country, the writing against men that they are guilty of murder who are not to be accused of that crime? Is it to be tolerated in a country where an orderly government prevails, and while the form of government subsists, to write against the transactions of that government, as if stained with all the crimes under heaven, and calculated for no earthly purpose but of committing those crimes? To suppress liberty (the only object for which government is or ought to be erected) to suppress that liberty by the means of murder, is imputed to the transactions of the government of the freest country now under heaven! and it is called liberty to do that! whereas men must be short-sighted indeed, a man must be drivelling like an idiot that does not see that the maintaining of regular government is the true, the only means of maintaining liberty. Is it liberty to put the characters of persons, the properties of every individual, under the tyrannous hand of anarchy, and of every man that thinks proper to seize them uncontrolled by law? Is that liberty? And is there any one bystander of the most ordinary understanding that hears me now speak, that has so gross an understanding as to imagine that he would be more free if it were in the power of any man that thought proper to revile his character? (which is the question which is now immediately subjected to you) or to injure him in his person or fortune, or in any other manner whatever? This therefore is not to be coloured, as far as I can foresee, by any kind of argument whatever. The nature of the libel is too gross to be commented upon; it does no honour to any body that has been concerned in making it.

I shall content myself with proving the fact of this paper having been written, of this paper having been published originally by Mr. Horne; and the conclusion to be made upon that is too obvious a one, and too broad a one, for me to foresee at least any kind of difficulty about it. It was my duty to lay it before you. I, charged with the duty of my office, have brought it here; it is your duty to judge of it. You, charged by the oath that you have taken, are to determine upon it. If you can be of opinion that this licentiousness is fit to be tolerated, according to the old and established laws of this country; if you are of opinion that the fact is not proved upon the defendant in the manner in which it is stated by the witnesses; it will be your duty, your oaths will bind you to acquit him: but if the fact should be proved, if it should stand as clear as to my judgment and apprehension it now stands, you will be constrained by the same necessity of duty, and by the additional sanction of an oath, to entertain exactly the opinion of it which I have found myself constrained to entertain. I have no wish (I did not know Mr. Horne) I have no wish to prosecute any one individual; nor have I been desired, if I had such a wish, to prosecute him. And I hope I may add, that no desire could have compelled me to prosecute a man whom I myself had not thought guilty, notwithstanding any thing that has been said on the contrary side. I go upon the evidence as it is in my possession; I go upon the evidence as it is in my power to produce. If there be any evidence on the other side, and if that is sufficient to refute the imputation which the evidence that I have to produce lays upon him, I shall be as ready to examine that with exactly the same degree of candour, and, I hope, of uprightness, as I have done the present. My duty is done by laying the matter before you. Your duty, I am sure, will be done to your own honour and the support of public justice by the verdict you will give upon the occasion.

Evidence for the prosecution.

THOMAS WILSON, sworn.

Examined by Mr. Solicitor General.

Mr. Solicitor General. Look at those papers.

(The several manuscripts from which the advertisements were printed in the news-papers. The witness inspects them.)

Q. Do you know whose hand-writing those papers are?

A. They look like Mr. Horne's hand-writing.

Q. Do you know Mr. Horne?

A. I have seen him write.

Q. Do you take these to be his hand-writing?

A. They are like his hand-writing. I will not upon my oath say that they are his hand-writing; I believe that they are.

(The manuscripts of the two advertisements read in court.)

HENRY SAMPSON WOODFALL, sworn.

Examined by Mr. Wallace.

Q. What business are you?

A. A printer.

Q. Do you print any news-paper?—A. Yes.

Q. What paper?

A. The Public Advertiser.

Mr. Wallace. Look at these two papers (showing the witness the manuscripts of the advertisements. The witness inspects the manuscript).

Q. Have you ever seen these papers before?—A. Yes.

Q. When

Q. When did you see the first of them?
 A. About the 7th of June 1775, as near as I can recollect.
 Q. By what means did you come by the sight of it?
 A. Mr. Horne, the defendant, gave it me.
 Q. For what purpose?
 A. To publish in the Public Advertiser.
 Q. Did you accordingly publish it?—A. I did.
 Q. Had you any other directions from Mr. Horne?
 A. Yes. He desired me to send it to several other papers, which I did.
 Q. Do you recollect the names of any of them?
 A. The whole, I believe, of them; I cannot exactly recollect.
 Q. Did you follow his directions?—A. I did.
 Q. Was any thing paid for it?
 A. Yes. Mr. Horne paid the bill.
 Q. For the publication?—A. Yes.
 Mr. Wallace. Look at those news-papers (showing the witness the Public Advertiser of June the 9th, and of July 14, 1775. The witness inspects news-papers).
 Q. Are those papers published by you?
 A. I print that paper, and I suppose they are.

HENRY SAMPSON WOODFALL cross-examined by the defendant.

Mr. Horne. I am very glad to see you, Mr. Woodfall. I desire to ask you some questions. Pray what was your motive for inserting that advertisement?
 A. Your desire.
 Q. Had you no other motive?
 A. I was paid for it; as the advertisement is paid for.
 Q. Pray was it by accident, or by my desire, that there should be witnesses to see me write that advertisement?
 A. By your desire.
 Q. And did I, or did I not, formally, before that witness, when called in, deliver that paper as my act and deed, as if it had been a bond?
 A. Yes.
 Q. It is true, I did. Did I not always direct you, if called upon, to furnish the fullest proof that you could give?
 A. You did, sir.
 Q. Now then, sir, if you please, say whether I have ever written any thing in your news-paper before?
 A. Yes, frequently.
 Q. How many years ago, do you think?
 A. The first remarkable thing that I remember, was something about sir John Gibbons, about his mistaking Easter for a feast or a fast.
 Q. How long ago is that?
 A. About the year 1768, about the election time.
 Q. That is about nine years ago?—A. Yes.
 Q. Have I at any time desired you to screen me from the laws?
 A. No.
 Q. Has not the method of my transactions with you at all times been, that you should at all times; for your own sake, if called upon, give me up to justice?
 A. Certainly; that has always been your desire.
 Q. Pray, sir, was you not once called upon by the house of commons for something that I wrote in your paper?—A. Yes, sir.
 Q. Do you remember that I did or did not, when I took care to furnish such full proof of this advertisement, give you the reason for it?
 A. I cannot say I recollect the reason.
 Q. I will mention it. Whether was this the reason? That in the last transaction before the house of commons it was pretended they let me off, because they could not get full evidence. Do you remember whether I rehearsed that or not; and said, that if they now chose to take notice of this advertisement; they should not want full evidence?
 A. I do recollect that conversation.
 Q. You remember that was the reason I gave?—A. I do.
 Q. Will you please to look at these news-papers? (showing several papers of the Public Advertiser to the witness. The witness inspects them).
 Q. Do you know these news-papers?—A. I do.
 Q. Do you believe that you published them?—A. I do.
 Q. Look at the dates. I will call them over to you from a list—May the 30th and the 31st; June the 6th, the 9th, the 10th, the 12th, the 15th, and the 16th, 1775.
 A. I have looked at the papers: they are all my publication:—the date of one of them I cannot make out; it is June something.
 Q. We will go on—June the 21st and the 27th, 1775; then there is January the 11th, February the 8th, February the 7th, the 11th, June the 2d, and June the 30th, 1777.
 A. They are likewise my publishing.
 Q. Pray, Sir, do you recollect the contents of the paper of May 30, 1775?
 A. No, upon my soul, I do not.
 Q. You are upon your oath.
 A. I know that indeed.
 Q. Read that part (pointing a part out) read from “In provincial congress, April 26; 1774, down to that part (pointing it out).
 Mr. Wallace. The officer should read it; though not now. You will be intitled to read it when you come to your defence.
 Mr. Horne. Pray do you know Mr. Arthur Lee?—A. Yes.
 Q. Did you ever receive any account from him relative to the persons who were killed at Lexington and Concord?
 A. I really do not recollect.
 Q. Do you recollect that you ever published his name to an account?
 A. I think I did; relating to his agency for some colony.
 Q. Look at that, and see whether you remember that, and how you received it? (Witness inspects Public Advertiser of May 31, 1775).
 A. Yes. I think I received this from Mr. Arthur Lee.

VOL. XL.

Q. Pray who was Mr. Arthur Lee?
 A. He is of the bar. I have seen him in Westminster Hall. He was there at the trial of Mr. Wright the printer, upon this very affair. I believe he was retained there.
 Q. Pray was he retained upon your cause when you were to be prosecuted for this advertisement?
 A. He was.
 Q. And why did you retain him? Had you any particular reason?
 A. I presumed he knew more of the subject of the advertisement than I did.
 Q. Did he ever tell you any thing upon the subject?
 A. We have had private conversation together as a matter of news.
 Q. Did he ever tell you he had lodged affidavits with the lord mayor of London?—A. He did.
 Q. Sir, did you ever tell me so?
 A. I do not recollect.
 Q. Pray when had you, for the first time; any notice of a prosecution for the publishing of this advertisement?
 A. About two years ago.
 Q. Pray did that prosecution go on?—A. No.
 Q. Do you know why?
 A. Yes. I let judgment go by default.
 Q. The first time?
 A. I was never called upon till last January.
 Q. It began two years ago; and you were never called forward upon it till last January?
 A. I think that was about the month.
 Q. As near as you can recollect?—A. Yes.
 Q. When was you first applied to, or was you ever applied to, to be a witness in this cause?
 A. I was not.
 Q. You never was?—A. No.
 Q. How came you to be an evidence?
 A. I heard that if I could produce my author, matters might be better for me; and as you had no sort of objection (which you told me at the time) I did of course produce those copies that appeared there to messieurs Chamberlayne and White, the solicitors for the Treasury.
 Q. Should you at any time; if you had been called upon, have declared that I was the author of that advertisement?
 A. Most certainly; for you desired it.
 Q. And have given your evidence?—A. Yes.
 Q. Who was the application made by?
 A. It was no sort of application at all; I heard of it.
 Q. By whom?
 A. My brother.
 Q. You never refused to furnish evidence against the author?
 A. No.
 Q. You never were applied to, to do it?
 A. No; I was not.
 Q. You have said that I never desired you to conceal me from the law for any thing you published from me—Did you ever receive any letter or message from sir Thomas Mills in your life?
 A. A private letter I have.
 Q. But did not that private letter relate to the public paper?
 A. Never.
 Q. Did you never receive any message not to insert any thing in your paper about lord Mansfield's earldom?
 A. No.
 Q. Upon your oath?
 A. Upon my oath, to the best of my recollection, I never did.
 Q. From any quarter?—A. No.
 Q. Sir, was you ever sent for by lord Bute?
 A. No; I never saw him.
 Q. Was you not sent for for inserting a paragraph about the king's marriage?
 A. No; I am not consulted by the higher powers, I assure you.
 Q. If I had thought you were, I never should have trusted you; I do not think you are.
 A. I am much obliged to you for your good opinion.
 Mr. Horne. I will give you no more trouble.

WILLIAM WOODFALL sworn.

Examined by Mr. WALLACE.

Q. Please to look at that paper (showing the witness the manuscript of the advertisement. The witness inspects it).
 Q. Have you seen that paper before?
 A. I have.
 Q. When did you first see it?
 A. Mr. Horne delivered it into my hands in my brother's counting-house on the 8th of June, to be inserted in the London Packet and Morning Chronicle; both which papers I print.
 Q. Was it accordingly inserted in those papers?
 A. It was.
 Q. Look at those papers (showing the witness several papers of the Morning Chronicle and London Packet. The witness inspects them).
 Q. Are those papers published by you?
 A. They are.

WILLIAM WOODFALL cross-examined by the defendant.

Mr. Horne. Mr. William Woodfall, I will not repeat all the same questions to you. Did you ever receive any application?—A. No.
 Q. Your answer is of the quickest. Had you not better hear the question?
 A. I please.

A. I presume you meant to the same question you put to my brother; as you laid an emphasis upon the word you.

Q. Did you ever receive any letter, or message, or desire, or request, of any kind, in any manner, not to insert any thing in your paper relative to lord Mansfield's earldom? on your oath?

A. On my oath, I never received any letter.

Q. Message, or request, of any kind, in any manner, sir, from sir Thomas Mills, I ask you?

A. No,—I think not.

Q. You must be a little more positive, because my question will not admit of a think.

A. I do not recollect I did.

Q. Then take a little time.

A. I don't recollect that I did. I know very well, that some person or other, once, mentioned it to me.

Q. That is an application. To mention it to you is a stronger application than a letter.

A. I had some conversation about it. I don't recollect that I was desired not to publish it.

Q. Was it to request you not to insert squibs or any thing?

A. I recollect I did insert it.

Q. What?

A. Lord Mansfield's promotion to an earldom.

Q. What was that application? That you would insert paragraphs about it, or would not?

A. It was a conversation, not of the nature of business; nor no express desire to me; or some conversation as might be between two friends.

Q. Upon your oath, you had never any application to omit inserting any thing of that kind?

A. Upon my oath, I don't recollect that I had.

Q. Nor you have never said that you had?

A. If I don't recollect that I received any application to keep out any thing relative to it, I consequently cannot have spoken of it.

Q. Did you, or did you not, ever speak of it?

A. Not that I am aware of.

Q. But you will not swear positively you never did?

A. I had no direct application to me to keep out any thing.

Q. Direct? My question was direct or indirect, or of any kind.

A. I mean to answer direct. I don't recollect that I was ever applied to, to keep out any thing; nor that I ever said I was applied to, to keep out any thing.

Q. More than that you cannot recollect?

A. No.

[The associate read the advertisements in the several papers that had been proved and put into court on the part of the prosecution.]

Mr. Attorney-General,

My lord, we have done.

Mr. Horne.

Gentlemen of the jury,

I Am much happier, gentlemen, in addressing myself to you, and I hope and believe I shall be much more fortunate as well as happy, than in addressing myself to the judge. I have been betrayed, gentlemen, I hope, into no unfeeling warmth; but yet into some warmth. I have felt myself like a man first put into hot water; but I have now been long enough in it to be perfectly cool. And, gentlemen, some small allowances might have been made for me by my judge who presides upon this cause, when he considers the peculiar disadvantages in which I stand here before him. Gentlemen, I am an absolute novice in these matters; and yet opposed to gentlemen some of the most eminent in their profession, and some of the most conversant in practice. But that is not all; I have a farther disadvantage. I stand here, gentlemen, before you, a culprit as well as a pleader; personally and very materially interested in the issue of the cause which I have to defend. And every gentleman in the court must know—(some perhaps by their own experience, all by the reason of the thing)—how very different is the sportful combat with foils from that which is seriously disputed with unbated swords; and how frequently the fluttering of the heart, in the latter situation, has been known to enfeeble the steadiest wrist, and to dazzle the clearest and most quick-sighted eye. Gentlemen, I have read even of counsel, eminent in their profession, conversant in practice, approved and applauded for their ingenuity in the defence of others, who, when they came to stand in the same situation in which I now stand, have complained to the court (and met with an indulgence which I have not), they have complained to the court of the same disadvantage which I now feel. Gentlemen, I have listened to Mr. Attorney-General's declamation with as much patience, and, I believe, with much more pleasure, than any one in the court. That pleasure I do acknowledge was personal to myself; arising from the futility of the support which Mr. Attorney-General has attempted to give to the serious charge which he has brought against me; a pleasure, however, mixed with some pain, when I consider the wretched times at which we are arrived; when a gentleman of his natural sagacity is, I own, justified by recent experience for supposing it possible to obtain from a London jury a verdict for the crown, upon a mere commonplace declamation against scandal and indecency in general, without one single syllable of reason, or law, or argument, applicable to that particular charge which he has brought against me, and which you are now upon your oaths to decide. Gentlemen, you know, as well as I do, that I am personally and in all respects an absolute stranger to every one of you. I am glad of it. I do not expect or desire from you either friendship, or favour, or indulgence. It is your duty to do impartial justice, and I only request your attention. I began with requesting it; and I requested your attention, that you may be able to judge for yourselves, and that the verdict which you shall give—(personally as it respects myself it is totally indifferent to me)—but that the verdict which you shall give, may be really your own, as it ought to be, and not the judge's. That is the only thing I request of you, and I request it because it is your duty and your oath.

Gentlemen, as for the charge that is brought against me, you cannot be ignorant that I am charged with the only unpardonable crime which can, at this time, be committed. I am accused of a libel.

Murder and sodomy, you know, have in these our days often found successful solicitors: and the laws against popery (though unrepealed and in full legal force) are, when resorted to, thought, by the magistrate who presides here, too rigorous to be suffered to have their free course against a religion so destructive of the civil rights of mankind, and so favourable to absolute and arbitrary power. But whilst that has been favoured beyond the laws, nothing beyond the laws has been thought rigorous and severe enough against the charge of libel. Murder, attended with the most aggravating circumstances, has been repeatedly pardoned; and treason, the blackest treason, against the family on the throne, and (what is of much more consequence to us than any family) against the free constitution of this country, has been not only pardoned, but taken into favour; and the estates of convict traitors have been restored to them and to their families. Whilst mercy and forgiveness, gentlemen, have been thus flowing unnaturally in a full stream over the highest mountains of iniquity, has any one of you ever spied the smallest rivulet descending towards the valley of the libeller? Has any man charged with a libel (and what has not been charged as a libel?) has any man so charged ever yet met with mercy? Gentlemen, I do not call back again these things to your remembrance in order to arraign them; that is not my present business: I only mention them to gain from you, the only thing I wish, your attention. You will be pleased then, gentlemen, as one motive for your attention, to remember the nature of the crime charged.

Gentlemen, if the nature of the crime and the rancour with which it is pursued, if that affords a strong reason for your particular caution and care and attention in this sort of trials, a much stronger reason indeed will be afforded you by the nature of the prosecution. It is called an information ex officio. The term ex officio is a very gentle expression for a very harsh thing. Ex officio (the gentleman well explained it to you, when he boasted of his conscience, and his integrity, and duty; for it is certainly so)—ex officio means, that which he does from a sense of duty. If in this you consider only just what meets the ear, there is no harm in it; it is a good thing: duty is a good thing. But if you examine the real force and consequences of the term, as here applied, you will find it to contain every thing that can be imagined illegal, unjust, wicked, and oppressive. For my own part, I am astonished that any man, at this time of day, exercising such powers as are not according to law, and are much less according to reason, should talk to you, with an open face, of integrity, of honour, of duty, of conscience; and that, instead of aggravating and shewing you in what the charge which he has brought against me, in what my crime consists, he has employed half his harangue in boasting of his own character. If any man in the court who had not known that I was the defendant had come in at the time that that gentleman was talking of his integrity, his conscience, and his duty; I ask, would he not immediately have concluded that Mr. Attorney-General was the defendant then making his defence? He must. Let the gentleman's integrity and honour be as great as he tells you it is; what has that to do with me? What has that to do with the charge which he has brought against me? except indeed this; that, having nothing really to charge me with, he sets up his own great, immaculate character in opposition to mine; that you may give a verdict against me, because he is a man of honour, an uncorrupt man, a pure man of integrity, and would not charge me, if he did not think me guilty. Let him think what he pleases; if you do not think me guilty, I care very little what he professes to think. I know that he is manly enough; and I honour that part of his character. He bears a man's heart in his bosom, and (though his office has made him hold the language he does) I defy him not to respect me. I know he does. I am sure of it.

Gentlemen, I said that ex officio contained every thing that was illegal, unjust, wicked, and oppressive; and I will prove it to you. Ex officio—(a little specimen of it you have seen)—ex officio means a power to dispense with all the forms and proceedings of the courts of justice, with all those wise precautions which our laws have taken to prevent the innocent from being oppressed by exorbitant and unjust power—

Gentlemen, I was thrown off my guard. I own I was. I had prepared an argument; which I believe his lordship perceived: he therefore granted me what I intended to have enforced; and, having granted it to me, that grant was made use of to prevent me from gaining any argument in answer, of any kind. You must have taken notice of it; it is your duty to take notice. Juries have been too much considered as men out of court; and when an application has been made to the judge, to determine upon a point of law, the jury has been considered as having nothing to do with the matter. No more they have, indeed, to decide it. But the jury has this to do with the matter: they are to make a true deliverance; and they will see and will judge whether the defendant has justice done him or not, even in the practice of the court. I know nothing of the law: I am not sorry for that: this is not a question of law; and I am happy to have Mr. Attorney-General's authority to say, that it is 'the plainest, the simplest question; and that it was too obvious for him to foresee a difficulty in it.' He said, it was 'the plainest of all the plain and simple matters that were ever laid before a court;' and being so, you are the best judges of it. And indeed the nature of a libel always makes a jury the best judges of it; for a libel (if it be so) is intended for mischief: it must therefore be intelligible to the people, or no mischief could be produced by it. If a man writes a libel that a common jury could not understand, (and you are a special jury, gentlemen) he must fail in his design. Observe then, gentlemen, this advertisement is the plainest and simplest of all the matters that were ever laid before a court in which the attorney-general was concerned: and in these two years and a quarter that he has had to bring it to trial, he has not been able to see a difficulty in it; and yet he has had had a special jury to determine it: a common jury could not be left to determine it: and that I will explain to you hereafter. I know very well, that not only juries, but many other persons who apply even to the practice of the law, never trouble their heads to take into consideration all together the enormous wickedness of the powers claimed in this sort of prosecution. It shall be my business therefore to explain it to you. You shall judge of the honour, and integrity, and conscience of the gentlemen who use them and enjoy them.

And, first of all, an information means no more than an accusation. Appeal, indictment, information, are, as I take it (and I shall be corrected if I am wrong, it will be well corrected both by the attorney-general and the judge)---I take it they mean no more than accusation; and they have a different specific name because of the different manner in which that accusation is brought forwards. Then, gentlemen, this is an accusation by duty, out of duty; and by this means, by this his duty, the attorney-general is enabled, contrary to the laws of the land, to accuse whom he pleases, and what he pleases, and when he pleases. And (if he pleases) he only accuses them, and never brings it to trial: he goes on harrassing the subject with information upon information, if he pleases, and never brings that man to trial. If however, out of his mercy, or out of his resentment, he does chuse at last to bring it to a trial; why, gentlemen, he, in general, tries it by whom he pleases. Gentlemen, when it comes to trial, he tries it in what manner he pleases, he takes what advantages he pleases, and no reason will be given for those advantages. Gentlemen, during the course and progress of the trial, if, notwithstanding those advantages he has already taken, he feels some reason to suspect that the verdict is likely to go against him, he claims a right to stop it if he pleases; without any decision; for he claims a right to withdraw a juror, as it is called; that is to say, You shall not come on to a verdict. The attorney-general must not deny it, unless indeed the practice of the court is changed in that particular.

The practice of the court we see does sometimes change; for I have it now from the judge, that in all cases the prosecutor has a right to reply; which truly I did not before think to be the practice: but, however, the Bar will take notice now; for they will soon have cases in which they may enjoy that benefit and privilege, if it be one: the prosecutor has a right to reply, even though no evidence is called for the defendant.---I shall see some more new methods of proceeding in trials; I have seen a good many. I think there must be somewhere or other in the court a gentleman with spirit enough,---some gentleman or other---many I hope there are, who will (upon some trial where they may be prosecutors) who will take that advantage that has been allowed to-day, and will offer to reply where no evidence is called. There were some half words I know dropped about matter of law, but I hope that will be made plain.

Well, but if the attorney-general does not stop the cause without coming to a decision, but thinks he shall get a verdict in his own favour; and therefore suffers the cause to go on; if he loses the verdict, he suffers none of those displeasing consequences which other men must suffer; for the crown pays no costs---none at all:---he can prosecute as often as he pleases, and whom he pleases, and pays no costs! But that is not all.---Suppose he has convicted six, seven, or eight men for the same offence, he exercises the sovereign power of pardon; he calls to judgment which of them he pleases, and lets go by which of them he pleases.---It has happened in the prosecution for this very paper:---out of several convicted, but three have been called up to judgment. That in some part I shall explain to you. But that is not all: the man or the men whom he calls up to judgment, he, the prosecutor, aggravates their punishment as he pleases; and that I will prove to you. In that, I think, I shall not be contradicted, because I have the authority of the judge who is now trying this cause.

So that in every stage of the business you will find that there is an unjust, an illegal, a wicked, and an oppressive advantage. And that you may not think that I am declaiming without any proofs, I will so far trespass upon your time as to come a little more to particulars.

And first, gentlemen, for the beginning of such a prosecution.---He brings it on as he pleases; he has no resort to a grand jury, or the country to accuse; but, contrary to express law, and what is much stronger, contrary to the strongest and the very fundamental reason of that law, he has no recourse at all to a grand jury; and that because it is the pretended suit of the crown. Now, gentlemen, if we want to enquire (which is not often done, I know, in courts of justice) why any grand jury? why a grand jury at all? It is not owing to the nature of the offence; grand juries are in capital offences and in small offences. Why are a grand jury to find the accusation? for you must not be led away by technical terms. Information, appeal, indictment, all mean one and the same thing;---accusation brought by different persons---that is the only reason of their different appellations.---If that is not the reason of the difference of the names, I shall be corrected.

Then why a grand jury? I would tell you in my own words, if I had not the words of a person more to be relied upon. Sir John Hawles says, these are his words: 'the true reason of a grand jury---'

But, gentlemen, I shall just obviate an objection first, because I shall not have an opportunity after it is made. It may be objected, that I have taken this from the State Trials; and I have heard from the bench that the State Trials are no authority. I have also heard from an officer very high in the law, and of very great acknowledged abilities, who sits by the side of the attorney-general, that they are a much better authority (I speak it because I heard him say so) that they are a much better authority than the scrawl of a nameless Reporter. But I will tell you why the State Trials in certain cases are the best authority; and that is, for this reason: because they are equally good authority, whether what they relate is true or is false. It is a strange assertion, but their authority is equally good for the purpose for which they are brought, whether the things they tell are true or false. I have heard them called from the bench (and called so for very good reasons) 'libels upon the judges.'---The State Trials are so far from being an authority, that they are 'libels upon the judges.'---Are they so? Then they are still better authority than if they were true; that is, authority for the purposes for which they are brought; that is, for the condemnation of the wicked doctrines which they expose. For are they libels upon the judges? Was the intention of those who wrote them to blacken their characters? Would the libellers then at that time of day (some a hundred, two, or three hundred years back, or according to the length of time) would an enemy have put into the judges mouths doctrines which were honourable? No; if he intended to libel them, he has falsely made them the propagators of those doctrines which their souls abhorred. Can there then be a stronger evidence about the opinion which men had formerly concerning these doctrines? If there cannot, then there can be no stronger authority against the doctrines exposed by the State Trials. True or false, the State Trials are the best authority which can be had; and better if they are false than if true.

Then, gentlemen, I will proceed to my authority: 'The true reason of a grand jury is the vast inequality of the plaintiff and defendant; and therefore the law has given this privilege to the defendant on purpose, if it were possible, to make them equal in the prosecution and defence, that equal justice may be done between both. It considers that the judges, the witnesses, and the jury, are more likely to be influenced by the king than by the defendant: the judges, as having been made by him, and as it is in his power to prefer or reward them higher: and though there are no just causes for them to strain the law, yet there are such causes which, in all ages, have taken place, and probably always will. Nor was it, nor is it, possible but that the great power of enriching, honouring, and rewarding, lodged in the king, always had and yet must have an influence on the witnesses and jury; and therefore it is that the law has ordered that at the king's prosecution no man shall be criminally questioned' (this is a criminal question) 'no man shall be criminally questioned unless a grand jury, upon their own knowledge, or upon the evidence given them, shall give a verdict that they really believe the accusation is true.'

If, gentlemen, there are other reasons for a grand jury than these, if there are others, you will have them; and though it will not be permitted to me to do (what with the utmost extent of my ignorance of the law, which is very great, I am still sure I could do by common-sense and reason---I mean, refute those other reasons;) I say, though I shall not be permitted to do that here, you and all the world will be able, at your cooler hours, to determine upon the force of those reasons that shall be given, from whatever authority they may come. And in this respect I shall be happy; for I shall have the honesty and the understanding of the public at large to judge of those doctrines which my imbecility might not permit me sufficiently to refute.

Gentlemen, it is true that the court of King's Bench has also assumed a power of accusing men. They say they may safely be trusted with it. I believe their claim illegal; but I have nothing to do with it: and I acknowledge that it is much safer there, than in the hands of an attorney-general, who is whipped in and whipped out just as the minister, whose friend he is, goes in or out.

But that is not all. The court of King's Bench cannot grant an information without an affidavit, without an accusation upon oath; no one of the judges of the court of King's Bench can do it; and yet they are a little more independent (they have fewer hopes, and therefore fewer fears) than the attorney-general; yet no one of the judges of the court can accuse a man. It must be the whole court, and they must do it in consequence of an oath. If I am wrong, you will have the pleasure of contradicting it (turning to the attorney-general). But the attorney-general accuses men neither upon the oath of others, nor yet upon his own oath. If he believes the matter of the accusation true, it is but the belief of one man, and he a prejudiced man, and the most improper man in the kingdom for his authority to be taken in such a case. But, gentlemen, what is much worse, it frequently happens that no man whatever avows the accusation, or believes it; no, not the attorney-general himself who files the information. I will prove it by-and-bye, even in the case of the attorney-general who filed this declaration. Gentlemen, I shall desire by-and-bye, for your satisfaction and mine, to find out whether there is one man in the country that believes me guilty of the crime laid to my charge; a crime of that nature that is to have a punishment which is called by the law a temporary death, an exclusion from society, imprisonment. The apparent object of this prosecution is to take what little money out of my pocket I may have there, and to imprison me, and so exclude me from that society of which I have rendered myself unworthy. However, I have the pleasure to see that there sits a gentleman by the judge who is now trying me, who, as well as myself, has charged the king's troops with murder; a charge which at that time excited great abhorrence and detestation against him. The judge and that gentleman have been laughing all the time of this trial; they have enjoyed each other's company exceedingly (a great laugh for some minutes of the whole audience). Well, gentlemen, (turning towards lord Mansfield and Mr. Wilkes) I have caused another laugh between the gentlemen; but it gives me pleasure to think, that if ever I am to come out of prison again (if you are so kind as to put me there) I too may have the honour (if it be one) of sitting cheek by cheek with the judge, and laughing at some other libeller. I said, if I come out again---because if it is possible that I should be put there for this charge, I believe that will never happen.---I will never cease repeating the charge I have made, till those men are legally tried and acquitted who are guilty of what I call murder. I will not be contented with one, nor with two, nor with twenty juries. I will repeat the charge of murder upon the troops every day, if this doctrine gets so far even as to a doubt; and I call upon the attorney-general now, if he may, if he can, if he will venture without the permission of those ministers whose humble servant alone he is; if he may venture, I call upon him to pledge himself to bring an information for a seditious libel against the King and the Government every time I charge the troops with murder. I promise him I will give him business enough, and I hope he will (if he may venture to do it) promise to file an information every time I charge them with murder when they commit it.

But,

But, gentlemen, I have wandered; though if I am to be shut up so soon, a few excursions before it may be excused me.

The attorney-general does not apply then to the grand jury, and there is no person whose accusation upon oath it is.

When he has filed his information; he proceeds or not upon it as he pleases; he files fresh informations if he pleases, when he pleases, as often as he pleases; he uses it if he pleases as a vexatious method which may harass and ruin and destroy the greatest fortune in this country. It has been used vexatiously. I do not say by the present attorney-general; I do absolutely acquit him of that; he never, that I know of, has been guilty of that practice: but I do know attorney-generals who have: but that I may not seem to libel all the world, I will not mention them nor the case. When the attorney-general has brought his accusation, and renewed and delayed it as much as he pleases, if he chuses to try it, I said, he tries it by almost whom he pleases. It may seem perhaps a strange thing for me to say to a jury who are trying my cause; but it is a fact; for he is always sure to have a special jury for the trial of this sort of charge. Libel is always tried by a special jury. Now this seems a very comical thing; for there is an expence attending it. The gentleman, I suppose, would not be thought to be unnecessarily lavish of the income of the crown, which has lately been found so deficient; he surely would not voluntarily throw it away. And yet a man that came from Brentford (my clerk formerly) had two guineas for his expences. He is a very honest man; it was a very lucky matter for him: I wish, for his sake, that he might be called a witness against me once a week upon such a prosecution. Now if the ground of the charge happens to be, as this is, 'of all plain and simple matters' that ever were laid before a court the most simple; it is a very strange circumstance that the attorney-general should chuse to have a special jury to try a thing in which there is nothing special! Special juries were never intended or appointed for that purpose. They were intended to examine into merchants accounts, or any critical or nice matter; for you know we are told that you have nothing to do with the law: you do not therefore want any legal education; and yet special juries are always made use of in matters of libel. And indeed why should they not? It costs the attorney-general nothing. In the case of any other prosecutor, it would be at his expence; but the crown pays this, that is, the people pay it against themselves. However, that is no objection to Mr. Attorney-General; for if you look at the law-expences in the Civil List of the last year 1776, as they are delivered in to parliament, you will find that they amount to the little insignificant sum of 60,000*l*. A defendant against the crown is in a blessed situation! But as the expence is no reason against the attorney-general chusing to try it by a special jury, he has a very strong reason for chusing a special jury; and that is, because, by that means, he tries it by almost whom he pleases: I do not mean by the particular individuals whom he pleases, but generally by that description of men that he pleases. Now this, gentlemen, is particularly unfortunate in my case; for the attorney-general said (I heard him say it upon the first trial for this advertisement) that nine-tenths of the people approved of all the measures of the ministry relative to America. The method of striking a special jury seems at first sight fair enough. Forty-eight men are struck from a book. The defendant and the prosecutor each strikes off twelve. That seems very fair and just; but it is very far from being so fair; for if nine-tenths of the people (which he himself acknowledged) are of that way of thinking (a way of thinking contrary to what I may well seem to be) you will observe that the attorney-general strikes off two tenths and half a tenth out of the forty-eight; so that he will be sure not to have one man of my way of thinking concerning America: I mean, it will be so, if at least they know what they are about: so that you see there is sure to be a little prejudice against the defendant in the minds of the jury. It is true, indeed, that the opinion of the jury concerning the measures relative to America has nothing fairly to do in this cause; but the prejudice may be extended from one thing to the other. We all know very well how men's minds are apt to run. But that is not all. This prejudice will be the case, even though the special jury are fairly struck; but they are not fairly struck. I believed so; but I never was sure of it till this case of mine: and whatever I may suffer, I think it a cheap purchase to know what I now know by this means. The special juries in the counties, especially in Middlesex, great numbers of them are qualified by the crown; they are esquired by the crown; and these crown esquires always attend upon the special juries. In the city, gentlemen, to which you belong, you know very well whether the description of merchant has or has not changed within some years past. You know, I dare say many of you, what merchants were—what merchants are. You all know well that the very numerous and extensive contracts which are going forward bring a swarm of merchants in amongst you. Every man that has a contract becomes a merchant; every man that has a contract is liable to be struck upon a special jury, and he is sure to attend, if he is taken: and you must observe besides, that the solicitor of the Treasury, who is in this constant employ of striking special juries, knows all the men, their sentiments, their situations, their descriptions, and the distinction of men.

Now, gentlemen, for the method of striking a special jury, which I shall not wonder that you are not acquainted with; and for the counsel, it is a matter that they are not concerned in. Observe, I do not lay these things to the charge of the attorney-general; he only uses the powers which others put into his hands.—The special jury, you may imagine, are taken indifferently, and as it may happen, from a book containing all the names of those who are liable to serve. I thought so, when I read the act of parliament appointing the manner in which they should be taken; but when I came to attend to strike the special jury, a book with names was produced by the sheriff's officer. I made what I thought an unexceptionable proposal: I desired the master of the Crown-Office (whom I do entirely acquit, and do not mean the slightest charge upon) I desired the master of the Crown-Office that he would be pleased to take that book; open it where he would; begin where he would, at the top or at the bottom; and only take the first forty-eight names that came. I said, I hoped that to such a proposal the solicitor of the Treasury could have nothing to object. I was mistaken; he had something to object. He thought that not a fair way (turning round to the attorney-general). There were witnesses enough present; and I should surely be ashamed to misrepresent what eight or nine people were present at. He thought that not a fair way. He thought and proposed as the fairest way, that two should be taken out of every leaf. That I objected to. I called that picking, and not striking, the jury. To what end or purpose does the law permit the parties to attend, if two are to be taken by the master of the Crown-Office out of every leaf? Why then need I attend? Two may as well be picked in my presence as in my absence. I objected to that method. The master of the Crown-Office did not seem to think that I had proposed any thing unreasonable. He began to take the names; but objected that he could not take the first forty-eight that came, because they were not all special jurymen; and that the names of common and special jurymen were mixed together, and that it would be a hard case that the party should pay the expence of a special jury and not have one; that they were expected to be persons of a superior rank to common jurymen. I could have no objection to that; provided they were indifferently taken. I said, Take then the first forty-eight special jurymen that come. He seemed to me that he meant to do it. He began; but as I looked over the book, I desired him to inform me how I should know whether he did take the first forty-eight special jurymen that came, or not; and what mark or description or qualification there was in the book, to distinguish a special from a common jurymen? He told me, to my great surprize (and he said he supposed I should wonder at it) that there was no rule by which he took them. Why then how can I judge? You must go by some method. What is your method? At last the method was this: That when he came to a man a woollen-draper, silver-smith, a merchant (if merchant was opposite to his name, of course he was a special jurymen) but a woollen-draper, a silver-smith, &c. he said that there were persons who were working-men of those trades, and there were others in a situation of life fit to be taken. How then did he distinguish? No otherwise than this: 'if he personally knew them to be men in reputable circumstances, he said, he took them; if he did not know them, he passed them by. Now, gentlemen, what follows from this?

But this is not all. The sheriff's officer stands by, the solicitor of the Treasury, his clerk, and so forth; and whilst the names are taken, if a name (for they know their distinction) if a name which they do not like occurs and turns up, the sheriff's officer says, 'O, sir, he is dead.' The defendant, who does not know all the world, and cannot know all the names in that book, does not desire a dead man for his jurymen. 'Sir, that man has retired.' 'That man does not live any longer where he did.' 'Sir, that man is too old.' 'Sir, this man has failed, and become a bankrupt.' 'Sir, this man will not attend.' 'O (it is said) very reasonably) let us have men that will attend, otherwise the purpose of a special jury is defeated.' It seemed very extraordinary to me. I wrote down the names, and two of them which the officer objected to I saved. I begged him not to kill men thus without remorse, as they have done in America, merely because he understood them to be friends to liberty; that it was very true, we shall see them alive again next week and happy; but let them be alive to this cause.' The first name I took notice of was Mr. Sainsbury, a tobaccoist on Ludgate-hill. The sheriff's officer said, he had been dead seven months. That struck me: I am a snuff-taker, and buy my snuff at his shop; therefore I knew Mr. Sainsbury was not so long dead. I asked him strictly if he was sure Mr. Sainsbury was dead, and how long he had been dead? 'Six or seven months.' 'Why, I read his name to-day; he must then be dead within a day or two: for I saw in the news-papers that Mr. Sainsbury was appointed by the city of London one of the committee' (it happened to be the very same day) 'to receive the toll of the Thames navigation;' and as the city of London does not often appoint dead men for these purposes, I concluded that the sheriff's officer was mistaken; and Mr. Sainsbury was permitted to be put down amongst you, gentlemen, appointed for this special jury.

Another gentleman was a Mr. Territ. The book said he lived, I think, in Puddle-dock. The sheriff's officer said, 'that gentleman was retired; he was gone into the country; he did not live in town.' It is true, he does (as I am told) frequently go into the country (for I enquired). His name was likewise admitted, with some struggle. Now what followed? This dead man and this retired man were both struck out by the solicitor of the Treasury; the very man whom the sheriff's officer had killed and sent into the country were struck out, and not admitted to be of the jury. Now, gentlemen, what does that look like? There were many other names of men that were dead, and had retired, which were left out.

There is something more unfortunate in the case of a special jury. The special jurymen, if they fail to attend that trial for which they are appointed, are never censured, fined, nor punished by the judge. In the trial of one of the printers, only four of the special jury attended. This is kind in the chief justice, but it has a very unkind consequence to the defendant, especially in a trial of this nature; for I will tell you what the consequence is. The best men and the worst men are sure to attend upon a special jury where the crown is concerned; the best men, from a nice sense of their duty; the worst men, from a sense of their interest. The best men are known by the solicitor of the Treasury: such an one cannot be in above one or two verdicts; he tries no more causes for the crown. There is a good sort of a man, who is indeed the most proper to try all this kind of causes; an impartial, moderate, prudent man, who meddles with no opinions. That man will not attend; for why should he get into a scrape? He need not attend; he is sure not to be censured; why should he attend? The consequence follows, that frequently only four or five men attend, and those such as particularly ought not to attend in a crown cause. I do not say that it happens now. Not that I care

I care; I do not mean to coax you, gentlemen: I have nothing to fear. You have more to fear in the verdict than I have, because your consciences are at stake in the verdict. I will do my duty, not for the sake of the verdict. Now what follows this permission to special jurymen to attend or not, as they like best? Why, every man that is gaping for a contract, or who has one, is sure to shew his eagerness and zeal.

It happened so in the trial of the first cause for this advertisement. The printer shewed me the list. Amongst them, one of the first I observed, was Sir James Esdaile, alderman of London, and a contractor for the army (there were several others; I do not mention the gentlemen's names). He would have struck him out. I said, No; there are so many bad that ought to be struck out, leave in Sir James: it is impossible that a magistrate of London! with so much business! a contractor under the crown! if he has any modelty! he cannot, an alderman of London! go down to be a special jurymen in Middlesex!—He was the foreman of the jury. He was sure to attend. And so they got the first verdict, in order to give them this influence upon men's minds.—‘We have got a verdict. This question has been determined by a jury.’—

Weil, gentlemen, having then got such a special jury as he usually does get (for it seldom happens that twelve gentlemen have sense enough of their duty to attend, as happens to be now my case)—the attorney-general brings on the trial. He then claims, amongst other things, a right to reply, though no evidence is called for the defendant. You have heard what passed upon this subject with the judge. I will leave that matter now, though I think I have enough to say upon it; however, I will leave it unexamined now: I hope to live to argue that point for my client, and therefore will not now trouble you with that argument. You will yourselves judge whether any reason was given to me, or to you, or to any man, why the attorney-general, prosecuting for the crown, having all the influence, power, and advantage that he can possibly have, why he should have that advantage of reply—which my equal or inferior shall not have!

But besides this, I told you before, that he claims a right of stopping it, when he pleases, by withdrawing a juror. I should be glad to hear that contradicted and given up.

But further, if he loses the verdict, he pays no costs: the crown pays no costs. The miserable man that is harassed, even though innocent, though gaining a verdict under all these disadvantages (if it is possible, and which seldom happens), yet still he must stand by his costs; and they may be, you see, whatever they please to make them.

Again, if the attorney-general gains a verdict, he punishes whom he pleases, and when he pleases. I think there were eight convictions for this advertisement, yet but three have been called up to judgment. One, I think, was let off, because there was a little false-swearing in the case by an officer under the crown—I allow it to have been certainly a mistake, because he is a gentleman of character—and therefore it is accounted for how this one got off: but how the other printers escaped, whether from the benevolence of the attorney-general, I do not know.

That is not all. He aggravates the punishment of the person against whom he gets a verdict, if he pleases. I was present in court when I heard the judge who now tries me (and who will perhaps give the same intelligence in my case) tell the attorney-general of that time (who is now chief justice of the Common-Pleas) when he moved that the convict (who was the gentleman who now sits next to the judge) when the attorney-general moved that Mr. Wilkes might be committed to the King's Bench prison, lord Mansfield instantly said to Mr. De Grey—‘The king's attorney-general may chuse his prison: all the prisons are the king's. The attorney-general may, if he pleases, move to have him sent to Newgate.’ His lordship mentioned Newgate: I heard it. And observe, this was an instruction to the attorney-general, who surely, of all men in the world, least needs instruction: and it was in a case where he was prosecutor; and in a criminal matter, and prosecutor too for the crown. And this instruction was not in order to obtain justice against the offender; that was past; he had been convicted many years before;—but it was merely in aggravation of punishment. I did not know nor believe that the attorney-general had that right: I should not have known it, if I had not learned it from so great an authority.

Gentlemen, having rehearsed what these claims are, I intreat you to consider who it is that enjoys these powers; superior to the powers which any one judge in this country enjoys; superior to the powers which even the courts enjoy. It is the attorney-general! Now, who is the attorney-general? who is he? whose officer is he? what sort of officer is he? I will tell you what a Scotch author of merit—(this is not law, but it is very good reason and great truth)—I will tell you what he says of the office of the attorney-general. What I say now, gentlemen, does not go against the person now intrusted with it; it goes against his office. I do not speak of this gentleman particularly; all attorney-generals, at least most of them (some of them indeed would not, but most of them will) use these unjust powers. Mallet says, in the preface to his life of lord chancellor Bacon—‘The offices of attorney and solicitor general have been rocks upon which many aspiring lawyers have made shipwreck of their virtue and human nature. Some of these gentlemen have acted at the bar, as if they thought themselves, by the duty of their places (that is, ex officio) ‘absolved from all the obligations of truth, honour, and decency’—(but not absolved you find from talking of them)—‘but their names (he says) are upon record, and will be transmitted to after ages with those characters of reproach and abhorrence that are due to—to whom? This man is as unfortunate in his style as myself’ ‘the worst sort of murderers, those that murder under the sanction of justice.’—He was never prosecuted for it. He charged the office of attorney-general (which is something more respectable than the office of a common soldier) with being the worst sort of murderers.

But the attorney-general, it is said, is chosen by the king: that is what is pretended. He is the king's officer; but he holds it by a very precarious tenure: his future hopes are greater than those of any man in this country; his fears therefore must be in proportion. Observe too, he enjoys these powers on the behalf of the king, against whom, particularly, all those precautions were taken; for these precautions are not taken between subjects who are upon a footing; but all these precautions and advantages for innocence (that it may not be oppressed) they are all taken, not against the king, but against the crown; against that power which is more often abused than any other power; more liable to be abused, because greatest. But, gentlemen, the matter is a great deal worse than this. He is not the king's officer. He knows better where his obligations lie. He is not so ungrateful. He would not, at a table with his friends, say that he is the king's officer: he knows a great deal better than that. He is in truth the officer of the minister: and if the minister goes out to-morrow, out goes the attorney-general. We cannot possibly have a stronger instance, and a happier for me, of this very thing. There sits here in court a gentleman who should now have been attorney-general (he lost not the place, I suppose, for want of abilities) who refused a brief in this very cause; because he thought it scandalous at the distance of two years and a quarter.—I suppose he might have still stronger reasons. If I knew them, I would use them. If I knew his reasons why he thought this prosecution scandalous, you would hear a very different defence from any which I can give you. Put in then another minister, and the attorney-general thinks me a very honest man: but if there comes a different minister and a different attorney-general,—‘O, put him out of the world; he is not fit for human society; shut him up like a mad dog.’—You see it is not the king's officer, it is the minister's officer. Gentlemen, it is very well known that the attorney and solicitor general make a considerable part of every administration. They sit there in the house of commons on each side of the minister; the two brazen pillars, the Jachin and Boaz of the minister in the house of commons. However, gentlemen, though this situation of theirs may make us smile, it is a very serious thing, especially when their honour and conscience are to go to you for proof, and instead of argument.

Now let us see, how have those powers been exercised? I have shewn you what they are; I have shewn you who enjoys them: now let us see how they have used them; I mean the present attorney-general. I will not go back to tell you that the bishops were reckoned guilty of a libel, not because they opposed the introduction of the Popish religion, but because they would not lend their own hands to the introduction of it. But how has it been used by the present attorney-general? I am driven to this inquiry. He has talked much of his conscience, and that if he had not imagined that he was executing his duty, he never should have thought of the prosecution: he did not know me; it was merely a matter of duty. Now I did not apprehend that it was a matter of his stirring, and that his motive was duty; but as he takes it upon himself, upon himself it must lie. Now therefore, how has he exercised this power which he enjoys in right of being the king's officer? I say, that he has then equally betrayed his own conscience, and the dignity and prerogative of the crown (if injustice must pass by these names)—I say that he has betrayed them all: for he has acted, not as the attorney-general of the king, but as the attorney-general of the house of commons. Never before this gentleman's time did any house of commons, I believe, I am sure, never did they direct any attorney-general to file an information. Who enjoys the power then? The house of commons files informations! Worse still; the attorney-general files informations, not from his own mere motion, not from the direction of the crown, but by the direction of the most corrupt assembly of men that ever existed upon the face of the earth.—It may be called indecent to call them so; but, gentlemen, I know, that if every man was to speak but one word expressive of his opinion concerning what I say, there are those, perhaps within hearing, whose hearts would sink within them. There is no man doubts it, and I shall not be afraid to say it.—But, gentlemen, now observe; this officer, the attorney-general, was never permitted to have a seat in the house of commons till the time of Sir Francis Bacon. He is no officer of the house of commons; he never was permitted to sit there till that time; and out of the extreme veneration which they paid to the greatest of mankind (for he was so), they permitted him, for the first time, to have a seat as a private member in the house. Now where have we got? He has no longer a seat in the house as a private member; he is the officer of the house of commons: that power which is pretended to be exercised for the crown, is exercised for the minister. The house of commons is the minister's; for he would not be minister, if he had not a majority. The attorney-general is brought in by him; the house directs the prosecution: whereas the method formerly was, that the house of commons used to address the crown, to desire the crown to order the attorney-general to file an information or to prosecute. Never till this time did the house think of directing the king's officer to file an information. The consequence happened to be, what at the very time it was natural to foresee would happen. The attorney-general prosecuted men whom he thought innocent. I happened by stealth (I am not often permitted to be there) I happened by stealth to hear the gentleman in the house of commons speak a language which no man could mistake. What is still more, on one of the prosecutions brought, the vote for it was either rescinded, or some healing vote was afterwards put into the journals of the house of commons, for having caused a prosecution to be brought against a person who was found to be innocent. Here is a dangerous power indeed! Who may not, if this is permitted, file an information against the subject? What a power is this in the hands of a minister to ruin: for if I am not ruined, it is the gentleman's mercy. I thank him for that mercy; for he might every term file an information, if he pleases.

Now, gentlemen, consider in what sort of a charge does he enjoy these extraordinary powers. You will find, that as he is the last man in the world (I speak not of the man, but the office) that ought to be trusted with these powers, so he enjoys them in that kind of charge in which he should least of all enjoy them. For, gentlemen, libel as well as attorney-general depends very much upon the minister. Why, don't we all know very well, that they who were pilloried for libel in the last reign are pensioned in this? What then, is this the kind of charge in which this open door to oppression should be left to the attorney-general and to the minister? It is not for crimes against the state that this power interferes, but for partial political opinions; and the man who is pilloried or imprisoned to-day, may, for the same act, be pensioned to-morrow, just as the hands change. If this party goes down, it is libel; if it comes up, it is merit. Is it in this kind of charge that an attorney-general should enjoy all these unjust powers? I need not bid you consider and recollect what sort of things have been charged as libels: there is nothing that has not been so charged. Sermons,—petitions,—books against plays,—saying that money will corrupt men, nothing but barely mentioning the effects of money,—all have been prosecuted, and punished, and ears cut off, and those things, for libels. In short, gentlemen, you will always find (your memories will go back enough to find it without reading) that whatever is contrary to the inclinations, interests, or even the vices of a minister, has always been, and ever will be, charged as libel. Even at this time, if the attorney-general's friend, Mr. Rigby, had been attorney-general, or to direct the attorney-general to file informations for libels, the present speaker of the house of commons would have been accused of a libel, for recommending economy to the crown. We know that he would; and there is nothing extraordinary that a speaker of the house of commons should have an information ex officio filed against him for a libel. The speaker, Williams, had one filed against him for publishing the journals of the house. There are now wiser. Indeed that case has been scouted.

If then, gentlemen, these considerations should make you careful and attentive in a trial upon a prosecution of this kind; the frequency of prosecution for libels, I suppose, should add to your care and attention. For, gentlemen, when is it that libels are most frequent? When is it that prosecutions for libels have been most frequent? Have they been under the best governments, under the best administrations (for government is a word abused: I mean under the ministers)? Have they been most frequent under the best, or always under the worst? It is only bad men that will accuse the good: good men don't accuse good things: notwithstanding which, you will find that under the best administrations there are few libels, and much fewer prosecutions; and under the worst administrations you will always find them swarm. Whether it happens that under the worst administrations (for there is always folly with wickedness) the minister is so foolish, as that, not attending to the principles of the person recommended to him, he, by mistake, chuses a good attorney-general, who has skill to discover and honesty to pursue those crimes which are detrimental to society; or whether it happens, that a good minister chuses a bad attorney-general, who has no honour or understanding to care for or to discover their evil tendency, and therefore does not prosecute at all;—but so it happens, that under a good minister there are no prosecutions for libel, under a bad minister you meet with little else.

Gentlemen, if the general nature of this kind of prosecution calls for your particular attention, the particular unfairness of this prosecution more strongly demands it. Gentlemen, you will be pleased to remember, that the advertisement which is now brought before you was published on the 9th of June 1775. Observe too, what is the charge. Not any harm that it has done; no, but only a tendency. The charge of the libel is a tendency to excite sedition; a tendency to alienate the minds of his majesty's subjects; a tendency to do a great many other bad things: I do not recollect them, nor care about them. What! come two years and a quarter afterwards to prosecute for a tendency (not actual mischief, but a tendency to mischief). It was so dangerous a thing, that it was suffered to rage and have its full influence without any check or controul; and then two years after (when its tendency must long since have ceased) comes the prosecution to check the tendency! I believe no grand jury would have found a bill for this prosecution at this distance of time: nay, I believe that all the judges of the King's Bench would not have done it. The attorney-general was well aware of this objection upon the trial of the first printer. 'Why not?' said the attorney-general---'Will folly say, that that which was a crime in 1775 is no crime in 1777? Will folly say?'---Why, what will not folly say? Folly will say any thing: and what wonder? when even a man of his natural good understanding, if placed in his peculiar situation, is often obliged to say what a moderate folly would blush at. 'Was it a crime, says he, two years ago, and is it no crime now?' That is not the question: but, whether it should be prosecuted now, after two years delay? That was the question which he should have spoken to. And would that be thought so ridiculous a position to be heard in a court of common law? You all know very well, that a simple contract debt cannot be recovered after six years is suffered to elapse. Now, will folly say of that money, and the benefits of it which a man has enjoyed for six years, was it a debt six years ago and is it no debt now? No; no man will pretend that the debt is not accumulated. But what then? If you have suffered that time to pass by, you shall not sue for it now. So the unjust possession of an estate for forty or sixty years (according to the rules which the courts have laid down) the unjust possession of an estate quiets the possession. What then, does it become just? Have I robbed another family for so many years; retained the principal and the income; and does it now become just? No, but you shall not recover it; the door is shut against your suit. Appeals for felony, for rape, and for murder, they must be brought within a year and a day. If you let slip that year, you shall not prosecute. What! Does it cease to be felony? Does it cease to be rape? Does it cease to be murder? No; there never was any such folly that said that; no folly ever said it: but the law says, You shall not prosecute: you have lost your time. But there is still a stronger circumstance concerning this doctrine, which I love best, because it came from the gentleman himself. The estate of a man, the most obnoxious for the blackest treason, by an act of parliament, was proposed to be restored to the son. I rejoice that he has it: but the argument of this very gentleman was, that---'oblivion ought to pass over it: it was treason, to be sure; but it was twenty years ago.'

Good God! if twenty years shall prescribe against treason, or silence, or put oblivion upon it; if forty years possession, for a large landed estate; if six years, for a simple contract debt; if one year, for appeal in cases of rape, felony, or murder; what shall not the mere tendency---(not actual mischief)---but the mere tendency of an insignificant libel in a news-paper (if it was a libel; but it is not) what, shall not that be permitted a two years prescription? I shall have others besides folly, I believe, think with me in this question.

But, gentlemen, whether it shall be prosecuted or not, the hardship is equal to me. I do not say, that it is absolute law that it should not be prosecuted; for this has never been adjudged: indeed the case has never happened before. The attorney-general has produced no precedent of such a prosecution as this; he can produce none to you. But I desire the attorney-general to remember what I now say to you and to the court, I say, that this abuse of his power and prerogative, and of his unjust claims, will cause some method of quieting men in respect of libels, as men have been quieted in respect of possessions against the crown. It will be necessary: for it will be considered that the nature and the effects of the charge of libel have been very considerably changed in the present time. The charge of libel now affects both houses of parliament. Privilege is gone; expulsion may be the consequence; incapacitation follows! To what are they exposed! I cast my eyes by accident towards one---I beg the gentleman's pardon---there sits near the judge one of the most distinguished members of the house of commons: he is as liable to an information for a libel as I am at this minute.---In his book, in his book the charge of murder is as completely made as in my advertisement: it is lately published in his Letter to the Freeman of Bristol: he stands as liable to be expelled, to be punished, to be shut up from society as a mad dog as I do, and with the same pretence. Gentlemen, there are now great officers of state whom I know to be more liable to a prosecution for libel than I am; who have written what has much more the aspect of a libel, than any thing to be found in my advertisement; and which may be proved against them by the same man that has proved my publication. It is true, those, who are not concerned in the Gazette, may at present have left off the practice: but what signifies that? The attorney-general will tell them, that the number of years signifies nothing: it is folly only that will say that; even though it was written ten or twenty years ago, (for he has drawn no line) it is only folly that will say, it is not a crime now, if it was a crime then. Gentlemen, I must beg you particularly for your own direction to observe, the strong reasons against this practice of bringing a prosecution for a libel, long after the cause of the charge was given. Consider the changes which are made both in the persons charged, and the appearance of change which there may be in the thing charged. A man hereafter to be charged with an offence so uncertain as a libel, may, thinking himself in perfect security, change his situation; which he would not have done, if he had known that there was a prosecution for libel hanging over his head: and perhaps the attorney-general would not have brought that prosecution, if he had not changed his situation, and thereby made himself vulnerable, who was not so before. Why, a man might have had a wife and children since the publication of this libel; and it is known that to have them is called---'giving hostages to fortune.'---A man might have given hostages to fortune, and then comes a vindictive attorney-general and drags him away from his peaceful family and fire-side, drags him away for a libel written ten years ago: for he has drawn no line! Is this to be borne? is this to be suffered? I thank God, that is not my situation. There is, however, a change in my situation; but of that I shall say nothing; though I firmly believe, that that change in my situation caused this prosecution: and you yourselves shall consider. It is now two years and a month ago, or thereabouts, upwards of two years ago, that this advertisement was published. They were very fore at it; it was considered as an affront by those who were glad that the men were killed. However, of them I know nothing; I have not accused them. A prosecution was soon after commenced against the printer who has here been evidence against me; and it stopped: he heard no more of it; it went fast to sleep, and was taken up again. When?---Immediately after it was known somewhere, that I had (after an interval of twenty years) entered again into commons at the Temple, in order to do that for others which I am now brought here to do for myself. Then re-commenced the prosecution; then am I become a libeller: but it sleeps till then; it was brought again fresh into life by that act.

But besides this, gentlemen, there is a great change not only in the person charged, but there is a great change also in the appearance of the thing which is charged to that person, by length of time. This advertisement was written in a time of profound peace. A civil war has since taken place: much blood has been shed: much mischief of all sorts has been suffered; and I wish I could say, that there was not much more in prospect. You cannot yourselves therefore easily put back your minds to that situation in which they would have been, had the prosecution followed close upon that publication. You cannot recollect the dates when certain proclamations issued; you cannot recollect the dates when certain injuries took place: unless one made it his particular study, there is not one of you can tell, whether this act passed at this time, or this proclamation at that time. If there is one of you who can recollect, you will find, that all those measures which take place against rebels, have all been since that advertisement. General Gage, whom I subpoena'd, and who would not attend you, who says, that he is gone away to Germany, he should have proved to you, that he published a proclamation in which he gives notice to the Americans themselves, long after this affair at Lexington and Concord. He gives them notice to come in, and warns them not to do so and so, otherwise they should be considered as rebels: it was not therefore known that they were considered, in America, as rebels till that proclamation came. That proclamation was to work some effect: it must either be intended to make them rebels who were otherwise not; or to make them known to be so, who who were so. If they did not in America know that they were rebels, till that proclamation came, how should I here in England know it long before that proclamation did come? There is a great change in the appearance of this advertisement brought forward for prosecution now, from what it would have had to your minds at that time. This you are bound to consider. Indeed it was said from the bench, on the trials of the printers, that this advertisement blamed, and censured, and libelled 'all the measures of government'---(relative to America, I suppose).---All the measures of government! Not the measures that happened since the publication of it, surely! and if they can find in that advertisement, that it censures all the measures before, I will be content to lose a verdict. You will not, gentlemen, for you must not, take it upon what that gentleman says, what I meant and what I thought. If you can make out that meaning from the advertisement, then do it; but you will find no word hinting at or censuring any man or any measure but that one measure of the Americans being put to death by the troops. If you can find in that advertisement any name hinted at or alluded to, or any thing of that kind, the attorney-general will be much obliged to you; for he cannot. If he could, he would have shewn you in which part it was. He would have said, Here this measure is alluded to; there that great minister of state is alluded to. He has not, nor can do that: he has a reply coming forward, and, if he can do it, he will do it then. Therefore, gentlemen, you see that That might be a libel, if it was written now, which was not a libel at the time when it was written. Gentlemen, I don't mean that any advertisement would be a libel, if it was written now. I know the contrary well; and so well, that, if it is become a doubt in this country, that it is a seditious libel against the king and the government to charge the troops with murder, I will write it again and again. If it is not a question, then I am satisfied; but if it is made a question in this country, that no man shall charge a soldier with murder without being guilty of a seditious libel against the king and the government, then I will go into prison for life: for I will regularly charge the king's troops with murder (if they put men to death unauthorized by the law) regularly and constantly: and so I would do, if they made the punishment death. Gentlemen, if the advertisement had the aspect of a libel, it should have been prosecuted as soon as it was published, that to the mischievous tendency of it might have been prevented, and that fair play might have been done to me, and that you might not come to try an advertisement, forgetting that the advertisement preceded, and did not follow the rebellion. But if the attorney-general has passed his time, I ought then, gentlemen, as in all other cases by law I should have, to have the benefit of the fault of my adversary. I ought not by his neglect and fault to be put into a worse situation than I should have been, if he had done his duty. But the attorney-general said at first, in excuse for that, that it was owing to an accident. If true, so much the more fortunate for the defendant. But how appears it? How does it appear that it happened by an accident? Is that to be so slightly taken up, upon the attorney-general's just hinting it? What was the accident? Has he proved it? has he named it? He cannot name it. Let him account for it. I heard the late attorney-general (the present chief justice of the Common-Pleas) declare, that it was his duty to account for his conduct in bringing that prosecution against the letter of Junius; which was brought quick too, not in this manner. He said, it was his duty to account why he took one printer before another; because he looked upon himself in filing informations to be exercising a judicial, official power, and not merely an advocate at the bar; he thought himself bound to justify his conduct. Let the attorney-general tell us the accident. I know something more of the re-commencement of the prosecution than he thinks I do; and a very strange circumstance it was that brought it to my knowledge: however, I don't think I want that. But that is not all. An accident, he says, prevented the prosecution at the time when, he must acknowledge, it ought to have been prosecuted. Aye, but there is another accident. What is the accident which has happened, that makes it be prosecuted now? There are two accidents. He has only just hinted one of them (he has not told you what that is); but he is totally silent about the other. What is the accident that makes it to be prosecuted now, at the distance of two years? You see there is one accident which caused it not to be prosecuted at first, in a proper time; there is another accident that causes it to be prosecuted at an improper time. He is bound to justify himself (not only to you, but to every man): he is bound to tell you both accidents. I believe he will explain neither. Gentlemen, I am sorry to take up so much of your time. I protest upon my honour, it is not to gain a verdict for myself: I have business to do that will take me up much more time than the judges dare to confine me on this charge. I am already a prisoner: I have been a prisoner in my own room much longer than they will chuse to imprison me. They will take care. The doctrines concerning libel have now risen to such a height, that they call for some remedy; and they will have it. The coming necessity of the times will produce it: and if we shall not have it from justice and honour, we shall have it from necessity.

Gentlemen, there are many other unfair practices in this case, besides this delay of prosecution. Observe how it comes on. The attorney-general takes the printers first. Why not take the author first? He has said indeed, that though it was signed (and he makes that a great piece of impudence) he has said, that though it is signed with my name, it was---as inscrutable and impossible for him to follow it, as if the name had not been put there. These are the very words: 'as inscrutable and impossible, as if my name had not been put there.'---Now, what said the evidence that he brought to you? He told you that he had never refused; that he had never been asked; that they had never made the slightest enquiry after the author. Now I appeal to your own consciences: is there a man in this court that doubts whether the attorney-general doubted or not that I wrote that advertisement? Is there a man in this court thinks so basely and so meanly of me, that, having signed my name to an act of that kind, and paid (as I will prove to you) the money to the banker; is there a man in this court that doubts that the attorney-general would have found a difficulty to come at me? There is none of you that can believe what he says in that respect: judge then of the rest.---Gentlemen; he took the printers first. I will tell you why he did that: it was to gain the influence of a verdict. He meant to take me; he did not think it inscrutable or impossible. After he had gained the influence of a verdict on the printers, then he comes to the author. The question now comes with a prejudice before you. A jury has determined upon it, has declared it to be a crime. My God! where is his honour and his conscience? But he says, that he did not know the author.---He did know it; he was in possession of the proof before he tried one single printer; and therefore the printer, who is now the evidence, was not brought on to trial. The information was filed against him, and he withdrew his plea, upon an agreement with the attorney-general; thinking perhaps (you may suppose) that I should play him some cunning trick, and sink the evidence. I mention this, because it has been thrown out, as if I had escaped from the power of the house of commons for want of evidence. The gentlemen (looking at the attorney and solicitor-general) know the case better; they know better. I know the gentlemen and their understandings.---They know how I escaped, and I will tell you presently.

But, gentlemen, he takes the printers first; and which printer?---He who printed it last of all the others. Now, why did he take him first? I will not tell you myself, but the printer shall tell you. He was a stranger to me, and he writes to me this letter---The printer of the Whitehall Evening-Post presents his most respectful compliments to Mr. Horne, and takes the liberty of sending Mr. Horne a copy of the information filed against him for publishing the advertisement signed by Mr. Horne, on behalf of the Constitutional Society; and as the printer has great reason to believe, from his living in Middlesex, that administration will make their first attack upon him, as they generally deem themselves sure of a jury in that county, &c.---Gentlemen, that was the reason why they took the printers first, and that printer first: and (which is a very singular thing) though they convicted that printer, they have never brought him up to judgment. But Mr. Attorney-General said (and I had like to have forgot to mention it) that he did not know that I was the author. I have proved to you that he did know it before the trial of the printers. Common-sense shews to you that he did know it, and had evidence against me. But then, I suppose, he will say, he did not stop the trial of the printers, because that would have caused a delay.---It would have caused a delay! What, after staying two years unreasonably and unjustly?---It would have caused the delay of a term to take the author first, and give him fair play. Will he by-and-bye say, that he did not stop the printers trials, and bring me on first, merely to avoid delay? The printers would have been much obliged to him for the delay; they wished and desired it. They offered him evidence. I told this honest man (whose face I never saw before) when he came to me---(for the printers were not defended in the manner I wished them to be defended; the little advice I gave was not followed)---amongst the rest I told this printer of the Whitehall Evening-Post, that I did not believe he could escape being tried first; but I told him he should send his attorney to the attorney-general, and make excuses, and beg and pray that he might not then be brought on to trial, but stay till after the London juries had tried the cause; and I advised---(we had a meeting; I forgot to ask the witness the question)---and I then advised that printer who was the evidence, that the London printers should endeavour to press on their trials; and urge that suspense was worse to them than any thing that could follow a conviction; and that the Middlesex printer should beg for delay.---Not that the attorney-general might be imposed upon:---no, it would have been nothing but just and reasonable:---but because I would either cover a man with shame, if he refused it, or at least (and so far kindly) prevent him, if possible, from exposing himself, by pretending that all this is the natural course of accident; that it was done to avoid delay; that it was integrity, honour, purity, and conscience.---However, I could not prevail: so great is the influence of that gentleman's office, and those connexions which it causes. Though the printer was eager for it, his attorney said, 'No; I can't be concerned in the cause; I would not for 500*l*. I can't speak to the attorney-general; for God's sake, get another attorney.'---'No, sir, I don't mean that you should lose a client: I mentioned it, thinking you could have no objection to go to the attorney-general and pray delay, till after the other printers had been tried; your client's wife is near being brought to-bed.'---So the Middlesex printer was tried first, and a verdict gained. I did not wonder at it: I expected it. Gentlemen, though this was an accident, I must beg you to observe it is an accident which has always occurred. For in the case of that letter of Junius which was prosecuted, the first person prosecuted was Almon (who was not the publisher, but had sold it at his shop) who lived in Westminster. Here too was the same accident; and it had the same consequence; except, indeed, that in that case the London juries recollected themselves; and though they had a verdict of a Middlesex jury, the London juries cast it out. There was, however, a struggle in their verdicts: there was something---but I will not enter into that now: they would not, however, suffer their minds to be intirely influenced and affected by the prior verdict so obtained. A gentleman who was a jurymen upon that occasion in Middlesex, is now a baronet, and of great consequence at the India-House. Gentlemen, if you make yourselves useful, there is a better track open to you than the honourable and just gains of your profession. You will observe then that the same accidents always return, and they are never explained.

Gentlemen, there is one part of the treatment of me in this prosecution that I think I have a right to complain of as man to man. I gave them no trouble; I made no objections. I requested when the jury was struck from the solicitor of the Treasury (before witness) I told him I lived in the country, that I was always at home---I desired he would save me unnecessary trouble, and that he would do, as men say to the executioner, Do your office like a gentleman. He seemed to be well disposed towards it, and treated me with great civility and complaisance. I desired him to present my compliments to the attorney-general (and that if he would not do that office for me, I would do it myself) and desire he would let me know on what day he would chuse to have the trial. The solicitor promised me he would. He kept me upwards of a fortnight, never letting me know that it would or would not be tried. He kept me till seven o'clock at night the day before the last day of the sittings, uncertain whether I was to come here or not the next morning. What was the consequence? I had told him the consequence. I had a witness to send for one hundred and fifty miles. I sent for him, and I have again brought him (I am ashamed of the trouble I gave the gentleman, a stranger to me, I never saw him till now) I gave him the trouble to come and to go back two hundred and eighty miles. The person—and it is not a common person, a porter, or messenger that can be sent with a subpoena, when you do not know whether the witness will come or not—I was forced to send him the same way. The solicitor for the Treasury knew it; yet he never would let me know till last Tuesday night (last Tuesday afternoon I suppose my solicitor knew it) when the trial would come on. My witness was forced to go back and come again. Now, what is your verdict, (suppose it pleased the attorney-general to go on so two or three sittings more) what is the effect of your verdict compared with that expense? Your verdict is the gentlest part of the prosecution. When I say your verdict, it is because then follows the judge's sentence.

Gentlemen, if you don't know, it is proper that I should inform you how the London verdicts were obtained. I was present in the court. One jury, I think, brought it in (at first) guilty of printing and publishing; a most stupid verdict! I am sorry that honest men should be so imposed upon. Guilty of printing and publishing! I heard a gentleman once say, who has some skill in the law, that there was but one possible guilt that there could be in printing and publishing; and that was, if it was printed upon gilt paper. The pun is poor enough; but not too stupid for the doctrine, not a bit. There happened upon the trial of another of the printers to be some difference of opinion in the jury. They came into court; they desired to be heard. A jurymen desired to know 'whether or not they were to find their verdict according to the information:' that was his question (I don't know his name) which he desired to know. It was plain enough what that honest man meant. It is true, he did not express himself in the technical legal terms of the law, perhaps; but I did then say aloud (and I firmly believe that his lordship heard me; there are gentlemen in court that stood by and heard me) I did say (a little heated) 'his lordship dares not answer that question.' I said it out loud (I might well be supposed to feel a little) 'he dares not answer that question; for he dares not deny it; it is too gross: he dares not own it; for then he loses the verdict.' His lordship did not answer it; his lordship did not. Are you to find according to the information?—Why you are to find the information according to the evidence. You are to find the thing, with which I am charged, proved. The jurymen said—according to the information—Why he was to find according; for according means agreeing, and means nothing else. The evidence agreeing with the information! Why yes, to be sure, what is he to find else? He must find that or nothing, for that is the only thing before him. However, that question was not answered. Then a little conversation, of a strange nature, took place—(his lordship loves conversations with the jury)—a little conversation took place about intention. I hope, gentlemen, I shall at least have this benefit by my trial, that the doctrine of intention will come out fairly and unequivocally to you; whether the jury have a right, whether it is their duty (it is the very gift of the whole matter) to determine what was the intention. The laws have confined the jury to one single word (so careful have they been). That word is guilt; that guilt which is charged. Guilt there can be none without intention. If guilt can be found without intention, so be it; but I hope that you, gentlemen of the jury, nor this court, will not be permitted to go away from hence with these equivocal sayings which hitherto have been. Let it come out fairly, and let us know; in the name of God, what the doctrine is.

Gentlemen, I did object, if you remember it—I don't now intend to go into it, for I shall still be longer than I wish; but I think I ought to mention it, and I hope you will excuse the loss of your time—gentlemen, we talked something about the right of the attorney-general to reply—If there comes, said his lordship, fresh matter.—There can come no fresh matter, unless there comes fresh evidence. The evidence is the matter; the pleading is a different thing. The prosecutor is bound to foresee all that can be urged in defence by the person accused; and to answer it before it comes: that is, he is to make good his charge. If it is not so, see the other case; see, on the other hand, what I am to do. I am then to foresee what he has to urge against me; and if I do not, what follows? Why, all that he urges in his reply (as he calls it) is a new part of the accusation, which I shall have no opportunity of answering. The fact of publishing the advertisement is not disputed; I never disputed it; the whole matter that we have to do together is, for him to prove it a crime by law or argument: therefore whatever argument he uses in his reply, if it has any effect upon your minds, I may be convicted (if convicted upon such argument) without ever having offered the least defence; that is the blessed consequence of his right to reply: so that he is not to foresee what may be answered to his arguments; but the man charged is to foresee what arguments may be urged against him.

Gentlemen, there lives this day a very great man in this country, whose doctrine and whose practices were diametrically opposite. He enjoyed the office of attorney-general. He has been a chief justice. He, as I am informed, never prosecuted but one libel, and that was Dr. Shebbeare, who is now pensioned by those who made this gentleman attorney-general. What was his conduct? If ever there was an infamous libel against government, surely it was that (it is a great many years ago, but I read it). What was Lord Camden's conduct? He left the whole to the jury; intention and all; the whole: he cut you off from nothing of your right. He did not hold the threatening language—'you 'may, if you will, take it upon you.'—Why that threatening? You may commit crimes, if you will: you may be as indecent as I may be supposed to be for repeating this: but, upon such an occasion as this, I reckon it not indecent. But—'you may, if you will.'—Why you not only may, but you are bound to do it; nor do you discharge your consciences nor your oaths, if you do it not: but I hope you will have it clearly said, whether you are bound or not. Lord Camden's remarkable words, when he finished his charge against the defendant, was, that he did not wish the conviction of him, if any man whatsoever doubted of his guilt.

Gentlemen, another thing was said, which I must warn you against; it was said that this advertisement (I believe I mentioned it) arraigned all the measures of government (at least, I think, you need not search into the advertisement itself to be assured that it did not arraign the measures of government which have followed the publication). The printers who have been brought to judgment, have been sentenced a hundred pounds; and they suffered what they were not sentenced to, a week's imprisonment. Their fine, it was represented, was mitigated, for that they might have been or were imposed upon by the author, the libel coming in the shape and form of an advertisement, which disarmed their caution; and therefore the fine was no more. Formerly our laws punished men for being knaves; now I perceive they shall be punished for being fools. If a printer, for the sake of two shillings or half-a-crown, is imposed upon by a wicked incendiary, who, under the shape of an advertisement, disarms their caution and slips it into their paper; the jury have, you know, nothing to do with their intention; therefore there must be a verdict against them of course: the judges find the printers have been imposed upon; and therefore only imprison them a week, and fine them one hundred pounds. It was a dear half-crown they gained! If the printers were imposed upon, they should have been acquitted. But by the evidence given now, you find they were not imposed upon by me: there was no imposition by me. What was my conduct towards the printer? This advertisement I am now giving you will offend certain ministers in this country: it is perfectly harmless and safe, and free from the cognizance of the law: the matter of it is just; it is true; but the law affords no guard or protection now from the power of the ministry in the house of commons, who vote men guilty! and vote things crimes! They have given out, owing to my forbearance (I did not wish to expose the nature of that defence which caused me to go safe from the house of commons) being silent, they have propagated a report, as if (like an artful tricking attorney or solicitor that is not used to honourable practice) I had made a charge upon them, and sneaked out for want of evidence against me. I was determined, for the sake of the laws of this land, that they should either by forbearing to take notice of this advertisement, or by taking notice of it, let it appear that they have no power to punish a man but by the laws: and therefore I furnished full evidence, in order to shew that even with the fullest evidence the house of commons have no power to try or to punish the subject. I knew I was safe from the courts of law, at least that I must there be tried by a jury; and they may do their duty, if they please.—Gentlemen, for every minute of imprisonment that those printers suffered, I do freely and frankly confess that I deserve at least a year, comparatively. If they deserved a minute, for every minute I certainly deserve a year; and for every farthing of that hundred pounds which they were fined, proportion only our guilt (if there is any guilt in the case), a million of money will not be sufficient for my crime. If they can justify their sentence on the printers, I will justify the court for the most ample punishment they can inflict on me. If I am guilty, no man upon earth so guilty. It was the most deliberate act of my life; it was thought of long before I did it. I made the motion; I caused the meeting; I subscribed a great part of the money; I procured the rest from my particular intimate friends: but I shall come to that by-and-bye.

Gentlemen, I have shewn you the method of proceeding by information ex officio: I must now desire you to observe the method of punishment, when it comes to the court. Observe how that passes. The man is convicted this sittings: he is called up for judgment next term: Go to prison, says the judge, and then we will think of your sentence. They sentence him a hundred pounds; but for what was the week's imprisonment? It is put into the sentence indeed—'and imprisoned until he pays his fine.'—Well, but could the man pay his fine till he knew what it was?—Observe the distinctions which are made!—A general officer who is now in America, general Burgoyne, was prosecuted. He comes into court to receive sentence for hiring ruffians to destroy the electors coming to poll; what is his punishment? He is fined a thousand pounds; but he is not sent to prison whilst his sentence is deliberated upon; he is released instantly. Now what says our law? Our law says, that 'a corporal punishment, however small, is greater than a pecuniary punishment, however great.'—Qualibet pœna corporalis, quamvis minima, major est qualibet pœna pecuniaria, quamvis maxima—or something of that kind. Well then, the greatest offenders, you see, have not the greatest punishment. The miserable printer who is imposed upon by an incendiary—to prison with him; we have not time to tell you now what we will do with him; and yet it does not seem to be a very difficult case: but in a very uncommon case, that of an officer of the king's troops hiring ruffians to destroy the electors coming to poll, and thereby gaining a seat in parliament; in this case no deliberation is necessary: or it is taken properly, before he is brought into court; that he might not suffer a moment's imprisonment.—You see the difference. The delinquent was wished good morning; the judge from the bench, when the general paid down his fine in court, wished him good morrow. Another man was lately prosecuted, who would have taken away the estate of his neighbour, that neighbour not consenting illegally to lose it. He sends him a challenge. He is prosecuted and convicted. No deliberation for sentence; not a moment's imprisonment. He is fined a hundred pounds; and application is even made by the court to know if any body ever knew a precedent for a smaller punishment. Nobody indeed ever did; and yet this challenger was an elderly member of parliament, and a justice of peace for the county where he lived. He was still better off than with a good morrow: he was told---Idem alii fecere, et multi, et boni!---Other men have done the same thing, sir, as you; and many other men and good men!---If he was a good man, why was he punished? He stood not, at that time, a good man in the court; he did not appear there for his goodness.

Gentlemen, I some time ago hinted something to you of the motives for this prosecution. I will now go no farther than only to shew you clearly what could not be the motives; and I will leave your minds to determine what is the motive: only so far I will say, that if the change in my situation, if I was allured to it by the lucrative emoluments of the profession, and wished to share in the legal plunder of the people, this prosecution might then be very serious; but I laugh at it. I am out of the reach of the intended consequences of this prosecution; I say, intended consequences; for rely upon it, I am better known to those who have caused this prosecution, than for them to have only in view the consequences of imprisonment and fine. No, they know better: they know that no men act as I have always done who mean to be stopped by imprisonment and fine. But, gentlemen, I will shew you what is not the motive of this prosecution. The motive of this prosecution is not to prevent the evil tendency of this wicked libel; of this horrid charge against the king's troops of murder; against soldiers who never commit it, who are not likely to commit it. I am sorry to read to you any paper: (I did indeed intend to have read many, but the time I see will be too long) I will only read one or two to you, just to satisfy you of some things which you perhaps are not aware of. Here is the Public Advertiser of May 30th, 1775. You will find in it a very serious, very particular, very sharp accusation against the king's troops of murder; the whole circumstances at length; and murder, murder, murder in every line; but it is so long that I will not read it to you now, because you can all remember to look at it hereafter. The papers are May 30 and May 31. The government then, I mean the minister (I make an improper use of the word government) the minister desires the public, upon this charge of murder against the troops, to suspend their belief. What follows? This paper which I have proved---As a doubt of the authenticity of the account from Salem, touching an engagement between the king's troops and the provincials in Majsauchet's Bay, &c. I desire to inform all those who wish to see the original affidavits which confirm that account, that they are deposited at the Mansion-House with the right hon. the lord-mayor for their inspection.

Arthur Lee.

Then come the copies of the affidavits; all the particulars at length: murder is not spared at all. Then, amongst the rest, comes an affidavit, which I shall prove to you presently more authentically than this; though it is enough for me that it was published. But you know, gentlemen, I am not the original author of the charge. The gentleman has been talking of the original author of the charge: he thinks he may tell you so now, two years afterwards; but if he had told you so at the time of this advertisement, every man in the court would have laughed at it. Here is the original charge, signed by the agent of the province where the murders were committed, and the original affidavits confirming it are here said to be lodged with the lord-mayor for inspection. It is very lucky for Mr. Lee that his receiving them, and causing them to be advertised, has caused no prosecution against him. We shall know presently whether this affidavit be a forgery or not: the gentleman for whose it is given attends here by my subpoena to prove or to disprove it.

I Edward Thorton Gould, of his majesty's own regiment of foot, being of lawful age, do testify and declare, that on the evening of the 18th instant, under the orders of general Gage, I embarked with the light infantry and grenadiers of the line, commanded by colonel Smith, and landed on the marshes of Cambridge, from whence we proceeded to Lexington. On our arrival at the place we saw a body of provincial troops armed, to the number of about sixty or seventy men. On our approach they dispersed, and soon after firing began; but which party fired first I cannot exactly say, as our troops rushed on shouting and huzzaing previous to the firing, which was continued by our troops so long as any of the provincials were to be seen. From thence we marched to Concord. On a hill near the entrance of the town we saw another body of the provincials assembled. The light infantry companies were ordered up the hill to disperse them. On our approach they retreated towards Concord. The grenadiers continued the road under the hill towards the town. Six companies of light infantry were ordered down to take possession of the bridge, which the provincials retreated over: the company I commanded was one. Three companies of the above detachment went forward about two miles. In the mean time the provincial troops returned, to the number of about three or four hundred. We drew up on the Concord side of the bridge. The provincials came down upon us; upon which we engaged and gave the first fire. This was the first engagement after the one at Lexington. A continued firing from both parties lasted through the whole day. I myself was wounded at the attack of the bridge, and am now treated with the greatest humanity, and taken all possible care of by the provincials at Medford.

Signed Edward Thorton Gould.

When first I heard of this prosecution, and not before, I began to consider with myself whether I had indeed made use of any such expression or word as distinguished what I had said from the case of many other persons. Not a day passed but I found some news-paper with the same charge, containing the same word murder. I need not read any of them to you; you can all recollect. Go to the papers that are published to-day, to those published before this charge was brought against me and since, and see if you don't constantly find in them this charge of murder against the king's troops. I took extracts from them till I was tired; and not only from the news-papers, but several other publications; from that honourable gentleman's publication and others, which are of more consequence than fugitive pieces in a news-paper. These all prove the attorney-general's nice sense of honour and integrity, and regard to the public good, who prosecutes this advertisement. Now, that men may not be misled by it, after suffering them to run wild for two years, and be misled without any controul! But, gentlemen, so far from that being the motive of this prosecution, the papers are all full of the same charge, and will continue full, I have no doubt. I protest upon my honour, they are none of them made by me: I have been dumb ever since. I meant to do good by it when I made the charge, and I have been dumb ever since, because I could not see that any good was to be produced. If then you see what is not the motive for this prosecution of me, at this distant time, that will lead your minds to conclude what is the motive.

Gentlemen, the language of the attorney-general forces me to say a few words upon a subject which is the most disagreeable for a man to speak of; unless indeed it is when he appears as I do, a defendant. I thought when the attorney-general opened his charge upon this prosecution, that he would have taken a different line from that which he repeatedly pursued in the trials of the printers. He knew that I had heard him talk against indecency, a flood of obscenity, and scandalous publications. I had already heard him charge that advertisement to be full of 'ribaldry, Billinggate, scurrility, balderdash, and impudence.' I have not used a word that he did not use. All these I knew he had charged upon that poor advertisement. I thought that upon this prosecution he would not give me such an advantage as to say the same things, or take the same line that he took before. It is true, he gained a verdict by that line before, and therefore perhaps thought he might this time. I own I did think that he would have paid me the compliment of something a little new; but he says he never knew so much of my talents and learning as at this time. The gentleman's memory is short: I would have forgot it, if he had not. He represents me to you in the light of a scurrilous, ribald, balderdash, Billinggate, impudent fellow. That boldness with which I defend the right of the subject, will not, with any man who has a regard for the right of the subject, pass for impudence: those who know any thing of me must judge whether I am impudent upon other occasions.

Gentlemen, he has followed in this description of me which he has given, and in that character with which he has been pleased to cloath me—he has followed the old practice of some ingenious tyrants, who used to dress up men in the skins of beasts in order to encourage the dogs to worry them. Just so this gentleman dresses up his victims in the characters of beasts, in order to expose them to your indignation. He had no pretence whatever for representing me in that light. I do the more wonder at this language from him, because he knew better. He has said indeed, that he did not know the gentleman. The word know has many different meanings. He did not know me as a friend, or as an acquaintance; I never had that honour: but that he did know me so far as to know much more of the talents and learning (if there were any in the case) than what he can possibly have picked out from this day's hearing, is a notorious fact. However, gentlemen, if I am that Billinggate fellow, unfortunate is it for the attorney-general that a fit of Billinggate then once took him: and whilst the fit was on him, he applied to a gentleman to introduce him to my company, absolute stranger to him as I was. I did not request it; the attorney-general requested it. Perhaps the gentleman who introduced him is in court. The fit was not a short one: my conduct and my character was not, in his declared opinion, such as he now represents it. I believe we sat in a public coffee-house together, though in a private party, I suppose from eight or half after eight in the evening till past midnight considerably. I don't mention it to plume myself upon his distinction; I claim no honour from it: the gentleman might be desirous of seeing me as you go to see a raree-show, or as you would any strange creature; it might be from some curiosity. I never was vain enough, gentlemen, to impute it to myself as a merit; I did not see any reason to grow proud upon it; but I mention it particularly for this reason, that not only it ought to have saved me from such a representation of character, but it ought to have saved the attorney-general from pinning such motives upon me as he mentioned in another trial; such as the gaining of half a crown, or the flying in the face of government. When he was in possession of my motive, he knew it perhaps better than most men in England; and though I don't think I have a right to repeat what passed from that gentleman (though there was nothing in it dishonourable to him), yet I may be permitted to say what came from myself to him. A question was asked me to account for a part which I played; and why I, who did not then seem to him to be a desperate man driven by necessity to it, or that ill-behaved man, or that fool (for great numbers of patriots and ministerial men go from folly on both sides) he seemed to think I might have some more honourable motives about me, and wished to know what they were. I told him my motives; and it is a strange circumstance that I should then tell him that motive which is the very motive of this action of mine which he now prosecutes. I told the gentleman, in the year 1768, that there was a certain sect of religion (which I named) which of all others was most abhorrent from my principles and way of thinking; but I added—'Persecute them to-morrow, and I will declare myself of that sect the next day.' I appeal to himself; he will remember it; it is rather too remarkable. I will mention the sect, if it is necessary. Shall I repeat the name of the person, the introducer, and the place? If there is any doubt, and he desires it, I will mention the particulars; because I should be sorry to be laughed at as if advancing a falsehood of this kind, and pluming myself for passing a few hours with the gentleman who happens now to be attorney-general. This passed long before this wicked advertisement; long before I could foresee that the Americans were to be treated as they have been.

been. I think it should have saved me from such a representation of character, and from such motives as have been imputed to me; from that gentleman at least, if he acts (as he pretends) without direction from others; for he has seen me steadily pursuing that same motive. Every action in which I have been known to be concerned, has steadily been upon one and the same principle. I have never had occasion to support a friend or an acquaintance to promote an election, or to vote, or to do any thing for my particular connections; they have always been absolute strangers to me, and men taken up upon the footing of oppression. Friends!—Yes, if friendship received from me could make them my friends. But friends!—No, if any friendship received from them was necessary to make them so. My motive has been constantly the same: I know no American.

Gentlemen, I have been more concerned in my room than I have with the commerce of men in the world; and I read there, when I was very young, that when Solon was asked which was the best government, he answered—“where those who are not personally injured, resent and pursue the injury or violence done to another, as he would do if done to himself.”—That, he said, was the best kind of government; and he made a law empowering men to do so. Now, gentlemen, we are happier, we are under a better government; for our laws enjoin us to do what he only empowered men to do. By our laws the whole neighbourhood is answerable for the conduct of each: our laws make it each man’s duty and interest to watch over the conduct of all. This principle and motive has been represented in me as malice. It is the only malice they will ever find about me. They have in no part of my life found me in any court of justice, upon any personal contest or motive whatever, either for interest, or profit, or injury.

I have kept you too long to say a tenth part of what I intended to say, and I believe it is not necessary: I shall therefore pass over many things that would give to some pleasure, and to some pain. But as they are of that nature that I shall give myself the liberty of using, upon other occasions, as I please (doing no wrong), I can the more readily forbear them here. But, gentlemen, in this matter of charging the king’s troops with murder, there is a very striking circumstance; and that too, I suppose, the attorney-general will have forgotten. It is well known that, amongst other oppressions and enormities which gave me pain, murders (without any contest and dispute) committed and pardoned gave me much. I caused the soldiers in St. George’s Fields to be prosecuted—the king’s troops—for murder. I took them up. It was called no libel by the then attorney-general; no libel against the government. They were tried for murder. I did intend to have told you how they escaped; but it matters not. They were tried; they were charged with murder; and that not only in a court of justice; I advertised it, I signed it with my name: the same printer (I forgot to ask him as an evidence: indeed I had before asked him for a news-paper that contained the advertisement, but he could not send me one) he could have proved it; but it is notoriously known, I charged that murder upon the king’s troops with my name. It was not thought a libel then. It was thought a very great affront: for those troops had been thanked, in the king’s name, for their alacrity upon the occasion. What then, if the king’s name had been abused to thank men for their alacrity, what then? (I did not mention that, but I mentioned the murder committed.) There was murder committed. I saw it with my eyes; I saw many barbarities committed. I might have been amongst the slain. And shall I not mention what I saw with my own eyes? Shall I have no tongue nor understanding, but in a court of justice? I certainly will.—What followed? Soon after that, Mr. Stanley, a considerable officer in the state, moved in the house of commons for an act of parliament to take away from the subject the right of appeal in the case of murder; because I had caused appeals to be brought; that is, I assisted the parties who brought them. This motion was supported by Mr. Selwyn. Mr. Dyson, a lord of the Treasury, declared himself to be entirely of their opinion;—“because the right of appeal for murder was (he said) a shackle upon the king’s mercy: but he begged a delay till the next winter, when he promised it should have his assistance; that so the motion might not appear in the journals of the house all the summer, to alarm and terrify the minds of the people before that bill could be passed into a law, for which at present, he said, there was not time.”—To avoid its alarming the people before it could be passed into a law!—Well, it did not stop there: some notice was taken of this, but not much, as it was for that time dropped. But this motion was revived some time after. Mr. Rose Fuller (a better man to come forwards upon such an occasion) gave notice of a renewal of that motion in the house of commons: he was supported by Mr. Attorney-General. I was alarmed at that (and I will prove it; I am not now asserting what I will not prove). I instantly published what they might have called a libel, if it had not been upon such tender ground. I sent it to the public papers, with the initials of my name: I inserted in it such matter as could not fail to make it be known to come from me. That did not content me. I requested an honourable member of that house, who is now in court, Mr. Alderman Oliver, to present my compliments to Mr. Rose Fuller and the attorney-general, and to inform them that, upon that ground, I was ready to go even to death; that I would stick at nothing; that, on such an occasion, I feared no prosecution for libel. I intreated them to tell me when they would bring the motion on, that I might be present to hear what passed, which I would faithfully report and freely comment upon. The attorney-general, in his support of that motion, had reviled the right of appeal in the subject for murder, as a Gothic custom. Gothic was the invidious charge he brought against it: it was a Gothic custom! Why, gentlemen, so are all the rights, and liberties, and valuable laws which we have; they are all Gothic. But this was to be plucked out from amongst the rest; and because it is Gothic that men should be punished for murder, because it is a shackle upon the king’s mercy, murderers are not to be punished. Gentlemen, this attempt has a near affinity with this prosecution of me, for a libel against the government, for charging the king’s troops with murder. Gentlemen, I beg your attention to this matter: for, you see, they have got farther now in their system and their doctrines; and the mere charging of the king’s troops with murder is to be considered as a seditious libel against the king and the government! But what thought the house of lords at the time of the Revolution upon this Gothic custom?—King James the second had cut off and murdered many of the peers, under a sham trial of a commission of peers whom he picked out. At the Revolution they took care to secure themselves from such trials in future; and therefore, on the 14th of January 1689, they entered this among their standing orders:—“Whereas this day was appointed for taking into consideration the report made the 8th day of this instant January, from the lords committees of privileges concerning the trials of peers: after due consideration had thereof, it is resolved by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that it is the antient right of the peers of England to be tried only in full parliament for any capital offences. And it is ordered that this resolution be added to the roll of standing orders of this house.”—This was to secure themselves. But when they had done this, some noble spirits amongst them being alarmed and apprehensive, lest, under this pretence, in future times the subject might be deprived of his right to prosecute those who had committed murder, they (three days afterwards) on the 17th of January, entered the following declaration: “It is declared by the lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the order made the 14th day of this instant January, concerning the trials of peers in parliament, shall not be understood or construed to extend to any appeal of murder or other felony to be brought against any peer or peers: and it is ordered that this declaration be entered on the roll of standing orders of this house.”—The peers at the Revolution (all Gothic as it was) took this right of the subject, and hugged it to their bosoms; and this too in their own case against themselves. They would not themselves be exempted from a possibility of being prosecuted to judgment, that justice might be done for the lives of the king’s subjects, even if slain by themselves. However, gentlemen, this Gothic right of appeal is not as yet taken from us: and I do firmly believe, that by the resolution which I shewed, and by the message which I sent, and by the libel which I published (if such things be libels), I do believe I have the merit of putting off (at least for that time) so infamous an attempt. Infamous four-fold, if you consider the doctrine now brought forwards.—The king’s troops shall not even be charged with murder! Observe then what follows: the king perhaps will not pursue; the subject shall lose his right of appeal; and you shall not even dare to say that the king’s troops have committed murder.

I have already taken up much of your time; but I hope that the importance of the doctrine brought forward in this case, as it is the first (there is no precedent of such a one), I hope that shall be my justification.

Gentlemen, I will now come to the advertisement itself. The attorney-general says it is a scandalous publication; and he has repeated all those terms which I have before mentioned to you.

Now, gentlemen, pray consider with yourselves, to what purpose has he done this? Look at the information (you have a right to carry it out of court with you); see if you can find any such charge in the information; see if you can find any thing tantamount to ribaldry, or scurrility, or Billingsgate, or balderdash. These make no part of the information at all. He has done it merely to mislead and inflame. But he complains of scandalous publications! Who has most cause to complain of scandalous publications (taking the nation as divided in opinion between the Tory and the Whig doctrines)? who has most reason to complain of scandalous publications? Read Dr. Shebbeare and the archbishop of York! a pensioner of the crown, and an archbishop just created so by the crown! See how they have treated the Presbyterians! And yet, I presume, they are as respectable a part of the king’s subjects as the king’s soldiers! I think that to alienate the minds of the Presbyterians, or of others from them, is doing no great service to this country! Why not prosecute for that? No; pensions and mitres shall reward them! But, not to talk of these general matters, the attorney-general, in a prosecution of me for a particular advertisement, thinks it his place to talk of scandalous publications. Pray, take the two individuals, the attorney-general and myself; which of us two has most cause to complain of scandalous publications? Judge fairly between us. He a gentleman in great office; a gentleman necessarily exposed to the difference of opinions about his conduct: myself an obscure man, who never did enjoy any office of trust or of consequence; who never was a candidate either for honour or for profit; who have no claim to the notice of the public. Compare this with the situation of that gentleman; then compare the ribaldry and the scandal that has been published about us both; and judge which ought most to have talked of scandal in this prosecution! Gentlemen, I have had the honour to be burnt in effigy, and I saw myself committed to the flames. I have been sung about the streets in ballads, and I saw a little pert parson cocked up upon a stick in the finger’s hands. The news-papers for some years were even sick of my name. Even my cloaths afforded an entertainment for the wit of the theatre. As for caricatures, I have myself bought enough of them to furnish a room:—my rooms are but small, as you may easily suppose.—My life has been written, with my name at length, and the atheist and macaroni parson printed at the bottom of a print in the frontispiece. Atheist! and with my name at length!—Scandalous publications, to be sure, should be urged by that gentleman against me!—Gentlemen, I have never complained of those imputations. I protest (except with very ignorant, very poor creatures, and it does not signify what they think) I don’t think those imputations ever hurt my character; and if they have, I will take the chance of time to refute them. There was indeed one imputation that I believe did get some ground; and I thank the attorney-general for now relieving me from it: it was the worst of all all the other—a corrupt pensioner of the crown.—That was an imputation which I believe did stick by me; but there is no wonder at that at all. I did not even for that so much as accuse the publications and the writers: it is the practice of the times, and the corruption of the minister, that libelled me! Every man may, without being absurd, suspect his neighbour of corruption, without any specific charge brought against him. Good God! in a nation of lepers like this, who can expect to be thought clean! However, I agree with the attorney-general in all that he has said generally against scandalous publications: they ought to be, and the laws (without straining them) are now sufficient to cause them to be suppressed. But, gentlemen, I shall never be found in the list of those dealers in scandal. Well, but in the advertisement he tells you, there is scurrility, Billinggate, ribaldry, and balderdash.—The gentlemen of the law love to go by precedents. The attorney-general found a precedent for it; and therefore (without considering whether it would apply or not in this case) he made use of it to eke out the time. Mr. Noy, the attorney-general, in the Star-chamber, prosecuted a man for speaking disrespectfully of stage plays; and he said, that—‘it may be fit enough and lawful to write against plays, by men that have a mission: and they must do their errand in mannerly terms, and in the same terms as other men expect to bear with them.’ Mr. Pryne had no mission to meddle with those things, to see whether men should not return to gentleness. The terms which he useth are such as he finds among the oyster-women at Billinggate, or at the common conduit.—Mr. Pryne had no mission, it seems, to prevent men from turning heathens; and therefore he ought not to endeavour to prevent them from turning heathens! But however, gentlemen, if I have used Billinggate, and those bad terms with which he charges me, I shall not be angry with the attorney-general, but very much obliged to him, if he will help me to correct my language. I am sorry, however, to find that he does not intend I shall have much benefit by the example of his own. He has charged the advertisement with impudence too: and it seems, gentlemen, by what I heard from him in the other trials, and in this, to be a very lucky impudence for me: for he did say, that ‘wicked is a term too high for this advertisement.’—These are the very words; I took them down: ‘wicked is a term too high for this advertisement.’ Upon what, then, does he expect to gain a verdict? He said too, that ‘its impudence disarmed its wickedness.’—I believe that is a new figure, not to be found in poetry or painting! Impudence disarming wickedness! Why, gentlemen, that was in plain words telling the jury (if they had at all adverted to what he said) that they had nothing to do with that advertisement: for if it is not high enough to be wicked, it is too low for the verdict of a jury. You have nothing to do but with legal wickedness: a man cannot be prosecuted for scurrility and impudence.—But where, in which words of that advertisement, is this scurrility and Billinggate? In which sentence is the unmeaning ribaldry and balderdash? Balderdash, I believe, is a term taken from the drunkard’s table. Balderdash (if it means any thing) means—a rude mixture, a confused discourse. Does he prosecute a rude mixture and a confused discourse? If its aim and its object are difficult to be found out, is that an object of prosecution? In that case, it might as well have been written in Hebrew. But, gentlemen, all this was merely to inflame and mislead you; and therefore I shall not dwell upon it. But, gentlemen, whilst he has been mis-spending the time of the court in that which makes no part of the information, he has not said one single word about that which does make a part of the information; I mean its falshood. Falshood is a part of the charge, and it is a criminal and an odious part of the charge; and if you don’t find it in the advertisement, you cannot give a compleat verdict. Falshood is a part of the monster which he has exhibited: and if one limb of it is wanting, you cannot give him a verdict. Gentlemen, I shall prove the assertions of the advertisement to be true by my evidence; and I will not now delay you with them. And, gentlemen, I shall prove to you a thing which may now perhaps be a little useful to my character (if it suffers under that stigma of Billinggate and balderdash, and incendiary intentions, with which I am charged); for I shall not only prove that the motion was made, the money collected, and paid, but I shall prove to you, that the advertisement of the first sum did produce the second. The attorney-general says, it was only a fetch to fly in the face of the law. It was a fetch. It fetched 50l. more: and I will prove to you that it did so. I will tell you the person who sent it, and the person who conveyed it to me; because the purpose for which the money was given, the gentleman who subscribed it, and the gentleman who conveyed it, are all worthy of each other. The money came from sir Stephen Theodore Janssen, who is now out of the reach of envy; it was conveyed to me by Mr. Alderman Oliver, who, though living, is equally out of the reach of censure; and it was paid for the purpose for which it is declared. And, gentlemen, I am the rather inclined to prove these circumstances to you, because his lordship in his charge to the jury on one of the latter trials, finding that no evidence had been brought of the truth of the assertions in the advertisement, was pleased to forget a doctrine I have sometimes heard about truth, and threw in, as a make-weight into the scale, an insinuation of the possible falshood of the advertisement. His lordship said, he ‘did not believe such a proposal had ever been made, or such money contributed, or paid, or even such a society named existing. He hoped there were no persons capable of such an act: he hoped, and therefore he believed!’ It is a tolerable insinuation to a jury! He hopes there are no men capable of such an act! What dismal act must this be! It must surely be some act that excludes a man ever after, surely, from being admitted to sit cheek by cheek, and laugh and joke together with his lordship. It must surely be an act of that kind that a man must behold in abhorrence. No honest man could keep one company after it. ‘He hoped there were no men capable of such an act, and therefore he believed it.’ After this the attorney-general, from his lordship, took the same cue: and therefore, in a succeeding trial, he too insinuated, that the subscription was a mere pretence (a fetch he called it) to colour the advertisement. I own when his lordship hoped, and therefore believed, I was in some pain for my own existence: and though I stood close at his elbow, I did not know but he might believe next, that there was no such person as myself existing in the world. And yet I have heard his lordship say, on other trials (and if I misrepresent him, he will do justice to himself) I have heard him say—‘What! shall not a judge and a jury know and believe what every one else knows and believes?’—(and it was upon a trial for a libel)—‘Shall they alone be supposed ignorant of those known and notorious facts which no one else in the court doubts?’—As I do not therefore know which of these two doctrines his lordship may adopt on this occasion, and cannot tell what he may believe (because I do not know upon all subjects what he may hope), I shall therefore prove the truth of my advertisement. And when I have done that, perhaps, gentlemen, you will be told (as I have heard it said) that false in the information stands for nothing, and is not a part of the charge! though observe, if I omit proving the truth, they will not fail to aggravate the charge, by insinuating the falshood.

Now then, gentlemen, I come to the very great offence of all; to that which does indeed make a part of the information, but has made no part (except in assertion) of the attorney-general’s harangue:—I mean, charging the king’s troops with murder. I am told, that it is not for any of those assertions about subscription, and payment, and collection, that I am prosecuted; but it is for charging the king’s troops with murder. There the attorney-general said, he ‘put his finger.’—I have not charged the king’s troops with murder: there is not any such assertion in the advertisement. There can be no charge, no truth or falshood, but in an assertion. Gentlemen, I have no more asserted, that there were any persons murdered, than I have asserted that they have left behind them widows, orphans, or aged parents. Perhaps no persons were murdered, perhaps no persons were even killed at Lexington and Concord on the 19th of April 1775. Perhaps, if there were any killed, they were such as have left behind them neither widows, orphans, nor aged parents. The advertisement does not assert any of those things. There is indeed a description in the advertisement of certain persons for whose use the collection was made: if there are no such persons, the intended charity will not take place. I indeed suppose the charge to be true: others had charged the king’s troops with this murder nine days and more before my advertisement. I have shewn you where; in the same news-paper of May the 30th and 31st, 1775, signed by the agent of the province. I supposed that charge true; but I did not make it. I took it as I found it. The charge was in all the news-papers of May 30th and 31st, 1775. Why not prosecute those that brought the charge? The charge was authenticated in the most formal manner: original affidavits, taken on the spot, were lodged with the lord-mayor of London. The charge was not anonymous; it was signed by the agent of the province where the murders were committed; it was signed by Mr. Arthur Lee. He publicly avowed it every where. He sat daily in this court, with the chief justice and the attorney-general, publicly as an advocate: he was retained on one of the trials: he stood up to avow it: his lordship knew what he was going to say, and would not permit him to speak: it was in the first trial at Westminster. You see then (nay, you know it from a thousand publications) that this was not a wanton suggestion of my own; nor yet lightly taken up upon a slight rumour: but it was so given to the public, that no man could reasonably doubt of it. The Gazette, published by authority, desired every man to suspend his belief; in declared answer to which these affidavits came. It has never since been contradicted, even by that very authority that desired us to suspend our belief. But, gentlemen, though I did not make the charge in this advertisement, to save trouble I am willing to have it understood, that I did make the charge in the advertisement: I do again make it now. I did not word that part of my advertisement in the descriptive manner in which it stands through caution, and as a subterfuge to insinuate a charge which I was afraid to make: so far from it, that I do tell you again I allow the charge. I believe, gentlemen, these murders will never be forgotten as long as the history of this country shall remain: for the murders of that day, the 19th of April, have been productive of all that slaughter which has happened since, and of all that which is still to come. Suppose then, gentlemen, if you please, that I had charged the king’s troops with murder. Well! what then? How follows the libel against the king and the government? for you must take notice that the accusation in the information is not that I have charged the king’s troops with murder. That would not have supported an information: an information could not be supported upon that charge. The charge against me is, that I have charged the king and the government with murder. And to-day the gentleman has spoken a little more plainly than he did before. To-day he says, that ‘I have charged the persons employed by government with being guilty of murder; and consequently those who employed them are involved in the same guilt.’ This is the charge against me. But how does he draw the consequence? Is that to be found in the advertisement? Does every man that says a soldier has committed murder, involve the king and the government in the commission of that murder?

Gentlemen, I have not, in my advertisement, even charged the ministers. But if I had, I hope the ministers or the troops are no part of that government which you acknowledge: at least I am sure the troops do not make a part of that government under which I was born; they do not make a part of that government to which I have repeatedly sworn, and always held the most faithful and firm allegiance: and I will say more, they do not make a part of that government under which I will ever silently live. Indeed, gentlemen, Mr. Attorney-General seems to think the troops something more sacred even than the government: for he said, in aggravation of the charge, that it was ‘not only a libel against government, but even against the soldiers in our service.’—If he should happen to forget this also, the counsel who answered him at the time, and took notice of it, I hope will remember it.—Not only a libel

'libel against the government, but even against the soldiers in our service: so that the troops are something more than the government! I believe they are intended to be made so; for ours is a government of laws, not a government at will, either by troops, commanders in chief, ministers, or king. Consider, gentlemen, that the king's troops are only tolerated in this country for the purpose of foreign defence. They have been but of late years tolerated in time of peace. They have only an annual existence; which existence expires yearly, unless regenerated by a yearly vote. Now, gentlemen, consider! Hanoverians, Hessians, Brunswickers, Waldeckers, the very Indian savages (for of these are the king's troops now composed) all these, by Mr. Attorney's doctrine, make a part of the blessed government of this country! and to charge any of those king's troops with murder is to be guilty of a seditious libel against the king and against the government! Gentlemen, reflect. Have not the king's troops often been charged with murder? Does there pass a year when some of them are not convicted for murder? and, in the last good old king's reign, were they not executed too for murder, when they were convicted? It is too notorious.---A libel to charge the king's troops with murder! I believe nobody ever dreamt that it was a libel against the government, or even against the ministry, to say that some of the king's troops have committed murder. If such a charge is false and malicious (and a false and malicious charge may be made against the troops, as well as against any other person) it may be a libel against them, just as it would be against any other of the king's subjects; and they must seek the same remedy. They are not nearer, nor, I hope, dearer than we are; than any other of the king's subjects. How long have the troops been these privileged characters? What is there peculiar in their character, that to charge them with a murder shall be a libel against the king and the government? Suppose I had said (as I believe I might truly), and as I know it has often been said, that many murders have been committed by the king's patents, does any man think that the attorney-general would have prosecuted that as a seditious libel against the king and the government? And yet the king's patents are just such as he pleases to make them: they are of his own begetting, and much more as he pleases to make them than even his children. But the troops? what are they? what are they, whose origin we know? what are those who are of our own country?---Many of them, felons taken from gaols, and rescued from the gallows. Of these are the king's troops composed. And is it wonderful to charge the king's troops with murder? But it is too ridiculous. I am sure the attorney-general does not, he will not, pretend to say, that every particular charge against some soldier or soldiers for murder is a seditious libel against the king and the government! He will not say so! Suppose, gentlemen, some of the king's peace-officers had been charged with murder. It has often happened. Constables and peace-officers may exercise their authority in an illegal manner: they may kill men instead of arresting them. They have done it; they have been sometimes tried for it. Are not they as much the king's officers as the troops? Something more so, I suppose; for they are the officers of the real government of the country; the officers of the laws. And yet was ever any man prosecuted, or would any man now be prosecuted, if he charged a pack of constables with having committed murder? Would that be a libel against the king and the government? It could not be. Gentlemen, suppose some of the soldiers as brutal as Kirk's lambs (soldiers, for their cruelty, known by that name) should renew again the horrid barbarities which they committed in the West; would it then be a seditious libel to say that they had committed murder? I do not say, nor know, that the king has at present among his troops any lambs of Kirk's breed; but I am sure he had in 1768; because I then saw them not only commit murders, but other barbarities which not a savage hardly would commit. I saw one of the king's troops run his fixed bayonet under the shoulder-blade of a poor man, because he could not get under a rail time enough out of his way: I saw a woman with child wounded: a ginger-bread woman murdered as she sat at near a quarter of a mile distance. Were not they murdered? Were not those murders committed by the king's troops? by as numerous a body of the king's troops as those who committed the murders at Lexington? Gentlemen, there was a person present; I don't know that I have a right to mention his name; but he said he had served as a surgeon under Braddock in America, and he told the justices of the peace, that, even in that country, he had never seen murder so wickedly, so wantonly committed. But perhaps the attorney-general does mean still to prosecute me for calling them murderers. Why should he not? It is but nine years ago! I don't know but that, as soon as this prosecution is over (if you should establish this doctrine), he may follow it with another prosecution for that libel too. The same printer can prove it; and I shall not deny it.---But the attorney-general will, I know, from necessity, be obliged to say, that this is a very different case from charging some individual soldiers with murder. The king's troops here, he will say, acted in that capacity, as the king's troops, in a body, under their officers, and in a military manner, as part of the king's army.---Well, it may be so; but, however, that is more than he has proved to you. If you believe that, you must take his word for it, or you must have it from the evidence which I shall produce. But if Mr. Attorney-General makes or attempts to make this distinction to you, gentlemen, between individual soldiers and those acting as part of an army, I must then intreat him to draw the line. None has yet been drawn; but he must do it before you can give him a verdict. If he will give up, as I am sure he will, that to charge any individual soldier with a murder is not a seditious libel against the king and his government; but shall insist, that to charge a body of the king's soldiers, acting under their officers, is a libel against the king and the government; he must then draw some line. He will tell you, I suppose, whether it is a regiment, or a company, or a serjeant's guard, or a corporal's guard; what number, and how commanded is it; that draws the line; that makes it an offence against the king and the government, and makes it a seditious libel to charge them with murder. Look after him.---See if he draws you that line.---He must likewise, gentlemen, when he has drawn it, shew you his law for it; and then he must prove that the troops I have charged fall within that line: and if he does all this, if he draws that line, and establishes it by law, and proves that the troops I have charged are within that line which he establishes by law, then you are bound to give a verdict against me. And if he would do that, I would at once save him the trouble of a trial. If he can draw that line, I will not keep the court a moment.

Gentlemen, I will be bold to say, that the whole army together, foreigners and natives, with all their officers, and the commander in chief,---aye, and the king himself at their head,---is no part of the government of this country; nor can they lawfully put any man to death. I said, gentlemen, some time ago that there never had before been brought a prosecution upon such a charge as this. Now, it is true, that a part indeed of the charge against honest John Lillburne, upon one of his trials, was, that he had accused the soldiery of having committed murder; and his words were (besides the word murder, which he expressed at length) that they had committed murder by 'shedding the blood of war, in the time of peace:' and he had likewise called their general, by name, a murderer. But, gentlemen, it must be remembered, that this prosecution was brought when the army were indeed, de facto, the government; when there was neither king nor parliament, but the army governed alone. Then indeed it was natural enough to call the troops the government, and to reckon it a seditious libel against the government to charge them with murder. Since that time, the attorney-general will find no such prosecution. However, gentlemen, even then a London jury, faithful to their duty, in spite of the judges and the attorney-general (who then held the very same language which the attorney-general holds now), in spite of all their arts, at that perilous time, a London jury in this very court, sitting in those very places where you now sit, did justice to their own consciences, and they acquitted him, as you must me, unless you chuse to exchange the laws of the land, and have military execution take place in this country. A standing army, in the time of peace, is a monster to the free constitution of this country: it has but very lately been suffered; and one of the great arguments that has been urged by those who have from age to age opposed a standing army, was, that they would be thenceforwards used as they now are. The pensioners of the crown and the friends of arbitrary government ridiculed such a supposition. They said, it was impossible that such a time could ever arrive. I have read their arguments; I am sure the gentleman who now prosecutes me has read their arguments. They were then afraid of this use of troops; and therefore those who opposed the establishment of the army gave it as their reason. Gentlemen, the courtiers ridiculed the thought that such a time could ever arrive, or that the soldiers in this country could ever be so employed. Now, what would our fathers have said, if any chief justice or attorney-general had at that time hinted that the soldiers should not only be so employed, instead of the civil officers of justice, to enforce the law upon the subject; but that they should also have a privilege, when they were employed, which the officers of justice never pretended to? Any man who had broached such a doctrine (before the crown had got a firm possession of a perpetual standing army) such a man would have been hooted at by both parties: by the court (not that they would have disliked the doctrine, but) because the secret would have been let out too soon. But now this same doctrine has made the chief justice an earl, and shall make the attorney-general a chief justice.

Gentlemen, I must entreat you to recal to your memory in what light military execution has always hitherto been considered in this country; and I shall give you (for it is worth the while) the circumstances of the military execution at Glencoe. (I published the pamphlet, that all the world might see it.) I mention it, because it happened about the time of the first establishment of a standing army (in its present form) in this land. It is but about eighty years since. It happened immediately after the Revolution. Now, gentlemen, who were the Glencoe men? 'It is certain and acknowledged by all, that they had been in the rebellions under Dundee, and under Buchan.' The time of this slaughter was in very troublesome unquiet times, at the moment of the Revolution: it was after repeated proclamations of indemnity and pardon. The last proclamation allowed them five months (from August to January) for them to come in and take the benefit of that proclamation. About six weeks after the expiration of that term, the slaughter happened; and about twenty-five or thirty of them were killed. Now, gentlemen, let us look for the reasons which were given for that slaughter. The secretary of state, Stair, gives these reasons for that slaughter: these are his words:---'Since the government cannot oblige them, it is obliged to ruin some of them, to weaken and frighten the rest.' He goes much farther:---'It is a great work of charity to be exact in rooting out that damnable sect.'---They were not only obliged to do it, but it was charitable. He goes farther:---'for a just example of vengeance, I entreat the thieving tribe of Glencoe may be rooted out to purpose.'---He says it was 'a great advantage to the nation, that that thieving tribe were rooted out and cut off.'---'When you do your duty in a thing so necessary,' (there was a necessity, you see)---'to rid the country of thieving, you need not trouble yourself to take the pains to vindicate yourself by shewing all your orders.'---'When you do right, you need not fear any body.' He adds farther, gentlemen,---'Here is a fair occasion for you to shew that your garrison serves for some use.'---These are his instructions; the secretary of state's instructions to the troops:---it was a fair occasion to shew that their garrison served for some use.---The king's justice in this, will be as conspicuous and useful as his clemency to others.---Can any murder be dressed up in fairer terms? I defy the attorney-general, with all his abilities and force of language, to say any thing in behalf of this murder at Lexington, in more specious terms than secretary Stair has done. 'It was charity to be exact---for a just example of vengeance---I entreat the thieving tribe of Glencoe may be rooted out to purpose.'---It is a great advantage to the nation that the thieving tribe were rooted out, and cut off.---When you do your duty, in a thing so necessary, you need not trouble yourself yourself to take the pains to vindicate yourself by shewing all your orders. When you do right, you need not fear any body.---Here is a fair opportunity for you to shew that your garrison serves for some use.---And after it was done, he says, 'All that I regret is, that any of the fort got away, and there is a necessity to prosecute them to the utmost.'---These are the specious reasons given for this slaughter at Glenco by the then secretary of state. But, notwithstanding all these fine reasons of the secretary (who would have been very glad to have had it considered as a seditious libel against government, for any man to say that that murder which he had authorized was a murder: he would have been very glad of this doctrine; it would have saved him) he himself acknowledges in a letter, that there was 'much talk at London, that the Glenco men were murdered.' There was much, observe, not a little; there was much talk at London that the Glenco men were murdered. And the parliament of Scotland, who took up the matter, said, it had made much noise both in Scotland and the rest of the king's dominions.---And, gentlemen, it was a very useful talk and noise. You will find what it produced. Now, what did the king? reluctantly indeed; but it produced good. What did the secretary of state? What did the attorney-general? File an information for charging the king's troops with murder? (words and writing have the same effect; rash words, indeed, shall have an excuse where a deliberate writing shall not.) No! there was no information for a libel; but the king granted a commission for an enquiry by what pretended authority that slaughter was committed. The officers of state at that time knew what they were about, as well as they do at this time. There was a defect in the commission. Gentlemen, in this first commission which was granted, the officers who had the drawing it up, no doubt, took care that there should be a defect. A defect there was, and the enquiry did not take place. But the much noise and the much talk continued; and two years afterwards the king was forced to grant another commission of enquiry; and then care was taken that there should be no defect. And that commission of enquiry was put in force. It was a commission of enquiry to some of the noblest and the greatest in that country, Scotland, where the murders were committed. Gentlemen, what did those lords commissioners? They reported, that the slaughter of the men at Glenco was---'a BARBAROUS MURDER;' the very Billinggate language complained of in me. These noble Scotchmen voted and used that very expression, that very ribaldry. The attorney-general has taken hold of a whole nation by calling it Billinggate and ribaldry. Here is that very word, murder, barbarous murder, applied to the king's troops, which offends that gentleman so much in my advertisement. He may now see, that I too had a precedent for it.---After the commissioners had discharged their duty, and made their report, that it was a barbarous murder; the parliament of Scotland took it up, and they voted the same Billinggate---they voted that it was a 'BARBAROUS MURDER.' And they addressed the king; and in that address they call it a 'BARBAROUS MURDER.' But that is not all. They justify the king. They find upon their enquiry, that the king's instructions had been contradicted: for his instructions were, that the Glenco men should be prosecuted 'in the way of public justice, and no other way;' that is what they find for the king. And yet they were no friends of those men who were murdered. They did not justify them, nor arraign all the measures which had been taken against them, by finding it a barbarous murder. But they justify the king; and they acknowledge themselves so well persuaded of their guilt, that they say, if the king had proceeded against them according to LAW, and had taken their lives, 'they would have met with no more than they deserved.' However, gentlemen, I suppose that in that declaration they were rather hasty: for there were women and children, and old men of 80, killed: and I do suppose, that if they had been proceeded against according to law, the infants at least would have been spared, if the old men and the women had not escaped. They go farther. They accuse the secretary of state, Stair, as 'the only warrant and cause' of the slaughter by his orders. They find that he 'did, in place of prescribing a vindication of public justice, order them to be cut off and rooted out in earnest, and to purpose; and that suddenly, and secretly, and quietly, and all on a sudden.' It keeps pace very much with the murders at Lexington and Concord. That expedition was secretly, quietly, and all on a sudden; an expedition at the dead of night.---They find that he directed the soldiers, that they 'should not trouble the government with prisoners.'---Now the government cannot be troubled with prisoners; the ministers might: government is not troubled with offenders.---He promises them, that 'their power should be full enough;' and he orders them, that they should 'begin with Glenco;' and his words are, that they should 'spare nothing which belonged to him.'---Military execution differs a little from the laws of the land!---They accused the king's troops with murder, for executing the orders which they had received: they addressed the king 'to order his advocate to prosecute them;' and they desire him, that he would 'send the troops home to be prosecuted:' 'there remaining---' (these are their very words) 'send them home to be prosecuted: there remaining nothing else to be done for the full vindication of his Majesty's government from so foul and scandalous an aspersion.'---There remaining nothing else to be done! Not an information for a libel, but an enquiry into the matter, and a prosecution of the offenders! Now, gentlemen, then I must entreat you to observe what the troops are capable of doing: and I did intend to have read to you the cruel particulars of that narrative; but it is well enough, you will read it another time at your leisure; and it is your conviction, more than your verdict, I seek. You will know where to find it. You will see in how barbarous, how wanton, how treacherous, and how cruel a manner they slaughtered men, women, and children. And this they were told was their duty; and this they thought a proper way (as Stair, the secretary of state, who was a military man; they thought it, as he told them) a proper way to shew that they served for some use. Gentlemen, you find then, by this report and vote, that murder may be committed by the king's troops without and even against the king's orders and instructions; therefore I conclude, that it is not necessarily a libel against the king and the government to accuse his troops with murder. Indeed I go farther: I say, the king cannot give orders for such a murder. It is an impossibility: nor, if it were possible, would such orders justify the act. It exceeds the king's power; and would still, by whomsoever authorized and committed, continue to be a murder. Gentlemen, you find too, that a secretary of state may be guilty of exceeding the king's instructions (as in this case of Glenco he was upon enquiry found to have done). And as a secretary of state may exceed the king's instructions, so may all those other persons through whose hands the orders pass from the secretary of state to the soldiers who execute them; consequently, it is no charge against the king or the government to charge the troops with murder. But, whether the troops have orders or not, you see, that the king's troops who commit the fact are nevertheless guilty of murder, as it has been here voted, tho' acting under orders. Now then, gentlemen, I must beg you to compare that doctrine concerning Glenco (which has never been arraigned) compare it with this doctrine of the attorney-general concerning the soldiers at Lexington. In the trials of the printers he said, and he says now, that the advertisement is a seditious libel against the government, because it arraigned the employment of the king's troops, and called the victory they had obtained a murder. There, he said, he put his finger; 'for this (says he) arraigns all the measures of government; quelling rebels armed, to call that murder.' Now I beg of you to consider what a number of things are left out in this manner of reasoning, and what a number of things are taken for granted. In the first place, it does not appear, nor has he offered to prove any such thing, that the slaughter at Lexington and Concord was a measure of government.---Arraigning all the measures of government! and yet it does not appear that this was a measure of government; I mean, even according to the abused use of the word government; I mean, not a measure even of the secretary of state. But if it had been, how does it follow that, by abusing the measures of the ministers of state, I condemn all the measures of government? Suppose I condemn one measure of government, how does it follow that I condemn all? May not a man condemn that measure, and yet approve all the foregoing? I do not mean to be understood that I approve the foregoing measures: I abhor them. But there is nothing in the advertisement before you which condemns the measures of government directly or indirectly: it relates to no other measure but merely to that one; and you are not to trouble yourselves with what I may like, or what I may not like, but what I have expressed in that advertisement which is before you. For in this case of Glenco, it is evident that the noble commissioners who voted it a barbarous murder, did not condemn all the measures of government: for they said, 'If the king had prosecuted them by law, and taken their lives, he had done no more than justice:' it is plain therefore they did not condemn all the other measures of government, but only the slaughter by the troops; for they supported the other measures of government, and that at the risk of their lives and fortunes. And, gentlemen, I know of my own knowledge, and I dare say you do, many persons who have not disapproved of all those preceding measures relative to America, who yet did disapprove of that rash and wanton transgression. Then, gentlemen, as for the 'victory,' I think it will not appear to be quite so complete a victory as that at Glenco! and therefore you still see, that such a victory as that may be called a murder. Gentlemen, for my own part, I do not hesitate to declare, that I abhor such victories; victories by subject upon subject! And as for such a victory as this, I do declare I think that the brows of such conquerors instead of laurel should be crowned with wreaths of hemlock. And as for his---'quelling of armed rebels!' every word is falsehood.---They were not rebels, nor armed, nor quelled. They had committed no act of hostility; they had made no attack; they were sleeping quietly in their beds, unapprehensive of any attack upon themselves, at the time that this expedition took place: and that I shall prove, gentlemen. What reason have you to believe that they were in rebellion, unless the attorney-general's saying so proves them to be in rebellion? for he has offered no proof to you of it. It is now---(and pray consider this matter about rebels; though I think it does not matter; for a rebel may be murdered) but consider, it is now two years and a quarter since this slaughter was committed; and yet, to this day, no person whatever has been prosecuted as a rebel. No legal proceedings of any kind have taken place. It is two years and a quarter since that execution upon the rebels, as they are called, and yet no proof of rebellion: and yet you are to believe, that they are rebels! The attorney-general, if they are rebels, should do his duty: he should prosecute.

Now, gentlemen, observe only another contradiction in the doctrines which are brought before you. You will be told, that if they were murdered, the murderers should be prosecuted. You have been told so. Men are not to be charged with crimes; they are to be prosecuted by law. So then we are not to know, we are not to judge of murder when it is committed, till the law helps our judgment. And yet, observe, we are to judge of rebellion; which is a crime surely more difficult to be ascertained, and about which there have been more doubts and disputes than about murder. If a man, out of the court, exercises his judgment about a murder, he shall be punished; but he is at the same time bound at his peril to exercise his judgment about rebellion; to know what is rebellion, and who have committed it. And yet, gentlemen, I must beg you to observe, that if these very men, executed by military force at Lexington, had been rebels; had been taken in rebellion; had been prosecuted, convicted, sentenced, and had been leading to the gallows by the sheriff; if these same king's troops had come and shot them, or run their bayonets into them, they would have committed murder. It is not their being rebels; it is not their being sentenced---when they are even leading to execution, a man may commit a murder upon the convicts: and these troops would have committed murder, had they executed the men even in that condition.

Gentlemen, the same way of thinking of military execution has prevailed ever since that time. I shall not trouble you to repeat the particulars culars of the affair of Captain Porteous at Edinburgh. These gentlemen are so little pleased with military execution upon themselves, that Porteous was charged by them with murder. He was prosecuted, convicted, and when he was reprieved after sentence, the people of the town executed that man themselves, so little did they approve of military execution. Now, gentlemen, there are at this moment people of reputation, living in credit, making fortunes under the crown, who were concerned in that very fact, who were concerned in the execution of Porteous. I do not speak it to censure them; for, however irregular the act, my mind approves it. I beg you likewise, gentlemen, to recollect that most wanton and most wicked rebellion of the year 1745. In what a manner was the victory over them spoken of in Smollet's—'Mourn, hapless Caledonia!'—It is known, I suppose, to every body who ever reads poetry. He calls it murder:

"The naked and forlorn must feel
"Devouring flames and murdering steel," &c.

I condemn his act; I do not justify it; but he was not prosecuted for it in that mild reign.

Gentlemen, it has always been judged a meritorious jealousy in our civil officers; it was in Janssen; it was in some other sheriffs, who are still living, when they refused the assistance of the military to execute criminals. So little proper are the military, with or without orders, for civil purposes, that it has always been thought a praise-worthy jealousy in them to refuse to suffer the military to assist at the execution of criminals: how much less then are they proper to execute them themselves. In that prosecution of the king's troops for committing murders in St. George's Fields, I was particularly fortunate for this occasion; and I should have reason to rejoice for myself (if I alone was concerned), that I did by that prosecution bring out a doctrine (which I know to be false, and which if not discountenanced will be fatal) but I did draw out a doctrine from the bench which must prevent your verdict against me now. To justify the executions committed in St. George's Fields, or to save the delinquents from punishment, the judge declared from the bench that they were to be considered as any other men in the country; that it was a matter of no consequence whether they wore a white coat or a red one; that they were on the same footing, and might be employed like any other subject. I know that to be false: they are distinguished from other men, not so as to make them more qualified for execution, but less. However, this doctrine answered the purpose at that time: but this doctrine, if I am to be convicted, must now be laid aside. The king's troops must no longer be considered as on a level and on the same footing with the king's other subjects. They must now, by the 'king's troops,' mean some persons more sacred, dearer, and nearer to his majesty than any other of his subjects; and to arraign any action of theirs is to be guilty of a seditious libel against the government. Now, gentlemen, observe how rapid is their progression; from toleration to equality, and from equality to domination; and from thence you may learn how dangerous is this doctrine. Observe, that first, and for many years, they beg hard to have troops tolerated, merely to prevent surprize, and to be ready against foreign enemies: that is the pretence. The judges next connive at their employment against the subject at home, under pretence of equality, and as being merely on the same footing with the king's other subjects, and with no other difference but the colour of their coats. From this last doctrine (though it includes a contradiction to what follows) the transition has been very short indeed. They are now to be taken out of that equality with other subjects; and it is made a crime against the king and the government to condemn any slaughter which they may commit: and this too without any enquiry, without any proof concerning the nature of the execution or the manner of the slaughter; or whether it was directed, or was not directed; or by whom directed. And yet, gentlemen, I have learned from Mr. Justice Atkins (still going to my only source of law, a state trial) I have learned from him, that 'some judges are of an opinion that before a trial, or presentment, or acquittal, modo legitimo, no action upon the case for slander will lie; it not being, he says, ripe for it till an acquittal. By the same reason, he says, it is not ready for an information, which is but the king's suit, the reason being the same in both.' So that, gentlemen, if that be true, this prosecution is too soon as well as too late: too soon, because it precedes the enquiry into the fact, whether murder or not; and too late, for the reasons I have already given. And I have no doubt, gentlemen, but that you yourselves will think that the first step to be taken to remove (if there be any) aspersion on government, is to set on foot an enquiry into the murder; and then, if it shall be found a groundless charge, prosecute and punish those who charged them. They say, why do I not prosecute them? or at least, that I should have prosecuted the murderers, or not charged them with the murder. It is well known, I have always done so when I could; and I would do so now if I could. I would prosecute those troops guilty of those murders. But how is that to be done? An act of parliament was made just before the commission of these murders, to exempt the murderers from trial in America; and you will please to remember, that it is not long since an act of parliament was made in England for the more speedy execution of murderers here. An act was made a few years ago for the more speedy execution of murderers in England; and that because it was thought a means of deterring men more effectually from murder. Now then what are you to conclude? What are you to conclude even from the circumstance of delay alone? but either that what deters men from committing murder here, will not deter them from committing murder there; or else, that it was not intended to deter men from committing murder in America. Now what would any dispassionate American think even of this single difference between us? This act was made at a time too when checks for their security were more necessary than at any other time; for it was when troops were pouring in upon them. Observe, when Englishmen are murdered, as small delay as possible shall be suffered between the fact and the punishment; in America, every delay and every possible difficulty! What was this likely to produce but mutual slaughter on both sides? The soldiery were encouraged to murder by a prospect of impunity; and the Americans, by that impunity of their murderers, were taught to defend and revenge themselves. I beg you to recollect what happened in London only three or four years ago. A foreigner stabbed a coachman in Palace-Yard, Westminster. The poor man in the agonies of death called out for a knife, that he might do himself justice (the fact is notorious; I believe it came out upon the trial) that he might do himself justice; as, he said, he knew that his murderer would be pardoned! Gentlemen, he was mistaken; his murderer was hanged: but it was a very natural thought for him, after the pardons for murder which had then been recently granted. For take away from men a reliance in the protection of the law, and they will wisely, and justly, and properly, do justice for themselves. The justice of this principle is acknowledged every where; in all countries. There is a signal instance of it. Even a French despot found it; and when the king of France pardoned one of his own blood for a murder which he had committed, he publicly bade him observe, that he would likewise pardon any one that should murder him. Now, gentlemen, picture to yourselves the Americans of Lexington and Concord sleeping quietly in their beds, their wives and their infants by their sides, roused at the dead of night, with an alarm that a numerous body of the king's troops (their numbers, perhaps, augmented by fear and report) were marching towards them by surprize in an hostile manner—these troops who were not to be brought to justice by them for any murders which they might commit! What shall they do? Shall they attempt to fly, and leave the helpless part of their family behind them? Shall they stay, and submit themselves and their families to the licentiousness of these ruffians? I suppose there might be amongst them (as amongst us) some of both these sorts: but however, for the honour of human nature, there were also some of another temper. They hastily armed themselves as well as they could; they collected together as they might; and they staid waiting the event, determined not to attack, but to defend themselves from lawless insult, or to sell their lives as dearly as they could. There is nothing surely in this that will justify the slaughter of them which ensued. And you will please to observe the time when this happened; for it is a very striking fact. As soon as the act of parliament exempting them from trial for murder in America—as soon as that act got to America, and the weather would permit them, the troops did instantly and without delay commit those murders with which I now charge them. That act of parliament was proposed by the confidential friend of my judge; it was proposed by lord George Germaine; and though the attorney and solicitor general, according to custom, were instructed to bring in the bill, he proposed it in the committee. He mentioned the word soldiers—troops:—but the attorney and solicitor general, or the other gentlemen who are in office (for I believe their names are mentioned for form, I do not mean to accuse them) those who drew up the bill, knew what was the secret intention of the proposer (not the intention of the government), and therefore no soldier is to be found in the bill; but it is left at large—those assisting in the execution of the orders of the officers of justice; and the general of the army was at that time the civil governor of the town. Lord George Germaine, whom I have subpoena'd to appear, and who I understand does not mean to attend, was not then, it is true, in office; but he was very shortly after made secretary of state for the American department. You see then that secretary Germaine was more subtle and cautious than secretary Stair. Now, if we would prosecute those murderers, how is it to be done? How shall we find the surviving witnesses? Having found them, how shall we get them to England? How shall we find the individual murderers? and if found, how shall we bring them hither?

Gentlemen, do you not plainly see? The act passes that they shall not be tried for murder in America.—The murders immediately follow.—They cannot be tried by the Americans;—and (if the doctrine now attempted by this prosecution is established by you) our miserable fellow-subjects in America shall not have even the poor consolation of being even pitied here. The murderers shall not be tried there: they shall not be charged here. But, gentlemen, I shall be told (as I have been) that the Americans were rebels. I answer, that it has not been proved. Times of discontent and suspicion are not times of rebellion: suspicion may be groundless, as well as discontent.

But, gentlemen, you will be told that it was no murder, because there was a necessity for it.—Lord Stair said the same for Glencoe.—Well, gentlemen, if upon the trial of the murderers it should so appear, that would save them from a verdict of murder. But till that necessity appears, and is proved, every man is justified in calling it a murder. Necessity shall save the accused from a sentence of death; but it shall not turn the accusation into a libel, because it had a reasonable foundation. Men were killed without the sanction of the law. However, I have never yet heard any necessity, any real necessity shewn for this slaughter; and I take it that my evidence will be sufficient to make it appear that it was a voluntary act, not unexpected or waited for, but sought for by the troops. Indeed, the attorney-general has excluded any such notion; for he has called it a victory!—Necessary self-defence (and no further than that reaches is any man justified in putting men to death) necessary self-defence has, I believe, never yet been called a victory. The utmost which that could ever be called, would be a lucky or a happy escape. But necessity did never yet excuse him who attacks; it will only excuse in self-defence. The law tells you, you must go back to the wall. If you go and attack, and so invite what follows, necessity will not afterwards acquit you. But, gentlemen, let it be necessity. If it is necessity, I am sure, I am still justified in calling it murder by the greatest and (upon this occasion) the best authority for me in this country. For if, when at a critical moment, to save this nation from an universal famine, it was necessary for the ministers of state to act contrary to law—if all men with one consenting voice approved this salutary measure to save the lives of men, and both houses of parliament returned his majesty their thanks for concurring with it. I say, if, notwithstanding this, it was necessary, in order to heal the wound which the constitution was supposed to have received (by the subjects lives being thus saved contrary to law) if it was necessary to have an act of parliament to indemnify those innocently-guilty ministers of state, those meritorious offenders; what, shall it not be equally necessary to have an act of parliament to indemnify those who have put our fellow-subjects to death contrary to law! I know indeed there was a very severe judge once, who did go so far in the insolence of his delegated authority, as to affirm that,

‘Twere all as good,
 ‘ To pardon him that hath from nature stol’n
 ‘ A man already made, as to remit
 ‘ Their sawcy lewdness that do coin heav’n’s image
 ‘ In stamps that are forbid.---’Tis all as just ‘ Falsely to take away a life true made,
 ‘ As to put mettle to restrained means
 ‘ To make a false one.’

But the doctrine now held out to us goes as much farther; as revenge and tyranny are more odious, more pernicious, and more detestable than lust. Lust, for its purpose, argued only that it was an equal crime to give life contrary to law, as to take away life contrary to law. But revenge and despotism only make it a crime to preserve lives (which is a better kind of giving life than generation) contrary to law;---and deny it to be any crime to take away lives contrary to law, unless it be also at the same time contrary to the inclination of the tyrant.---Admit then, gentlemen, if you please, admit the motive for killing those our fellow-subjects at Lexington and Concord to be as necessary as you please: go farther, admit it to be useful, admit it to be highly meritorious:---yet I hope the warmest admirer of such kind of executions, the most thirsty after American blood and confiscation, I hope he will not insult our understandings by contending that it could be more meritorious, that it could be more useful, that it could be more necessary to kill men in support of the measures of some particular ministers, than to save this whole country from famine. Our law, gentlemen, has not called such an action as that illegal embargo on corn by any specific name, as it has called the illegal putting of men to death by the name of murder. Suppose then (what indeed was freely done) that any one, for want of a specific name, had called that necessary embargo on corn, an illegal action: as when we say murder, we mean illegal slaying. Now then, I ask (and I hope the attorney-general will tell us), would it have been a seditious libel against the king and the government to have called that measure illegal (for want of a specific name) which the real government itself, the legislature, by the indemnifying act declared to be illegal? Whether the attorney-general may pretend this or not, I cannot tell: but I am sure my judge must direct you otherwise.---He cannot for shame pretend, because he forced an act of indemnity upon these men, who themselves thought the act a sufficient justification of itself; he forced them to be pardoned, to be indemnified by an act of parliament; and therefore I am sure that he cannot pretend that utility and necessity shall justify the deaths of men, when he would not permit utility and necessity to be sufficient, without an act of indemnity, to justify those who had illegally saved this whole country from famine.

But, gentlemen, I am ashamed to have said so much upon a point so clear. It is not because I am tired; or because I am failing in many more arguments equally strong. But I disdain to take up more of your time, or to say a word more upon this subject. I will leave it just where it is. I leave it to the reply of the attorney-general, and the direction of the judge.

Mr. Horne having concluded, the attorney-general began to address the jury by way of reply; upon which Mr. Horne rose, and spoke to lord Mansfield as follows:

Mr. Horne. My lord, I don’t mean to interrupt the attorney-general: but, my lord, my haste, and the shame I feel for having made any defence to such a kind of charge, made me forget to examine my witnesses. The attorney-general has not proceeded far in his reply, and I hope I shall be at liberty to call them now.

Mr. Attorney-General. You will not examine witnesses to justify a libel?---My lord, I object to his calling witnesses, except he had opened to what points he meant to call them.

Lord Mansfield. You had better not object, Mr. Attorney-General; you had better hear his witnesses.

Mr. Horne. My lord, if Mr. Attorney-General make an objection, I will endeavour to obviate his objection.

Lord Mansfield. Call your witnesses.

Mr. Horne. I call the attorney-general.

Lord Mansfield. Oh! you can’t examine the attorney-general.

Mr. Horne. Does your lordship deliver that as the law?---My lord, I call the attorney-general, and desire that the book may be given to him.

Lord Mansfield. You must state then what questions you mean to ask him; for he has a right to demur to the questions, and take the opinion of the court.

Mr. Horne. If I do that, it will be more than he was directed by your lordship to do with any of the witnesses he examined.

Lord Mansfield. They were called of common course; the attorney-general may demur to it.

Mr. Horne. If I ask him an improper question, he may then object to it, if he can.

Lord Mansfield. If you call the attorney-general in any cause, if you don’t state the question, he may demur.

Mr. Horne. Can he before he is sworn?

Lord Mansfield. He may demur to being examined at all.

Mr. Horne. Yes, and I dare say he will.

Lord Mansfield. You might as well call a common attorney or an advocate employed against you in a cause.

Mr. Horne. But this, my lord, differs widely. In what I shall call Mr. Attorney-General to, he acts neither as attorney nor as advocate.

Lord Mansfield. State the question.

Mr. Horne. My lord, I have many questions to ask him. He has paraded upon his honour, his conscience, and his duty. He is not acting as an attorney or an advocate in the cause. When he files an information, he is then acting as a judge or a jury; and if he has not acted in it with that integrity with which he would have done upon oath, so much the worse for him. One chief reason why I desire to examine him is, to obtain this: that I may point out a means by which an accusation in future shall not be brought against a man without an oath, at least from somebody. My lord, one question I mean to ask him is concerning that accusation which he has now brought: how it came to be brought? how it came to be dropped? and some other circumstances attending it. He has talked so much of the fairness, and the conscience, and the integrity of his motives in doing it, that I am sure it will look very comical if he refuses to swear to those declarations. If he will not swear to these motives, without his oath I cannot believe it: and if, contrary to my expectations, he does swear to it, after his oath I shall be left to exercise my own judgment.

Mr. Attorney-General. To any matter so impertinent as that! If that gentleman had had any question of fact to have asked me relative to his defence, I would not have objected to have sworn to it; although I stand in the place of prosecutor in this cause, where in point of form I might: but I put myself upon this, that I will not be examined to questions so impertinent as those that have been now proposed.

Mr. Horne. My lord, the gentlemen of the jury will please to observe then, that here is an accusation without an accuser. Your lordship smiles! Upon my word, my lord, I do not think it a thing to be laughed at. If I had the honour to be talking with your lordship over a table, I should speak of it with the same seriousness, and not as a quibble. I hope the gentleman will upon oath justify that information, for the integrity of which he has been haranguing.---He will not!---Well, then I must do without the evidence of the attorney-general.

Lord Mansfield. I cannot force him to be examined.

Mr. Horne. No, my lord, nor do I believe any body else could.---Please to call lord George Germaine.

[Lord George Germaine was called by the cryer, but did not appear.]

Mr. Horne. He is gone to Germany too, I suppose, with general Gage.

Mr. Alderman OLIVER sworn.

Examined by Mr. Horne.

Mr. Horne. My lord, I call this witness to prove the truth of the assertions contained in the advertisement.

Q. Sir, I must desire you first to speak to the particulars of a meeting called, during an adjournment of the Constitutional Society, in the year 1775. Was there a meeting called by you in June 1775?

A. I believe there was; upon your application.

Q. Are you sure of it?---A. I am.

Q. Did you know the purpose for which it was called before it met?

A. Yes; I did.

Q. Did you approve of that purpose?---A. I did.

Q. Was a proposal made to subscribe any money, and for the purposes mentioned?

A. Yes, it was; and by you.

Q. A sum of money was subscribed?---A. There was.

Q. Did you contribute part of it?

A. I did.

Q. Was such a direction, as in the advertisement, given to me?

A. There was.

Q. There is another advertisement of 50l.---I believe I need not read it; it is well understood. Did I receive that 50l. from you in the name of an unknown contributor?

A. Through me.

Q. Was that 50l. given for the purposes mentioned?

A. It was.

Q. By whom?

A. Sir Stephen Theodore Janssen. I was also a subscriber to the same purpose.

Q. I mentioned in the course of my defence what may otherwise perhaps be represented as not true: Did I send by you, upon a relation from you of a motion made for an act of parliament to take away the right of appeal from the subjects in cases of murder, did I, or not, send that message which you heard me represent in my defence?

A. You sent a message by me; and I dare say, from your accuracy of memory and your truth, you did deliver a message from the attorney-general. Whether I thought that it would be of the same effect,---I did mention to Mr. Rose Fuller the determination of Mr. Horne to go all lengths in opposition to that act which was to destroy the right of appeal in cases of murder; and I do believe in my conscience his application prevented any further steps being taken upon it.

Q. The fact, as I represented it, the witness says is true.

A. Certainly so.

WILLIAM LACEY sworn.

Examined by Mr. Horne.

[A receipt for 100*l.* shewn to the witness.]

- Q. Is that your hand-writing?—A. It is.
 Q. Do you recollect that 100*l.* for which that is your receipt, being paid in at your house?—A. I do.
 Q. In the name of Dr. Franklin?
 A. On his account.
 Q. Do you know by whom that was paid?
 A. I have it in my book in the name of Mr. Horne.
 Q. Do you recollect me to have paid it myself?
 A. I do not: but it was paid.
 Q. Do you know of any other sum paid?
 A. No: I have got a copy as it stands in my book here.
 Q. Is there any thing besides the 100*l.* put in?—A. No.
 Q. No 50*l.*—A. No.
 Q. Where is Mr. Chatham?
 A. He is in Ireland.
 Q. He is a clerk in your house?—A. He was.
 Q. And used to receive money occasionally?—A. Yes.
 Q. Do you know his hand-writing?
 A. I believe I should.
 Q. Look at that receipt.

[A receipt for 50*l.* was shewn to the witness.]

A. I believe that to be his writing.
 Mr. Horne. Call Mr. Gould.

Mr. EDWARD THOROTON GOULD sworn.

Examined by Mr. Horne.

- Q. Did you in the year 1775 serve in a regiment of foot belonging to his majesty?—A. I did.
 Q. Was you present at Lexington and Concord on the 19th of April 1775?
 A. I was.
 Q. How came you to be there?
 A. As a subaltern officer, ordered there.
 Q. Ordered by whom?
 A. General Gage.
 Q. At what time did you receive those orders?
 A. I don't recollect immediately the time.
 Q. Was it on the 19th, 18th, or 17th of April?
 A. I believe it was on the 18th in the evening.
 Q. Did you receive them personally from general Gage?
 A. No such thing.
 Q. Whom then?
 A. From the adjutant of the regiment.
 Q. When did you set out from Boston for Lexington?
 A. I cannot exactly say the time in the morning, but it was very early, two or three o'clock.
 Q. That is in the night in April, was it dark?—A. It was.
 Q. Did you march with drums beating?
 A. No, we did not.
 Q. Did you march as silently as you could?
 A. There were not any particular orders given for silence.
 Q. Was it observed?
 A. Nor it was not observed, not particularly by me.
 Q. Were you taken prisoner at Lexington or Concord, or either of them?
 A. At the place called Monottama, in my return from Lexington.
 Q. I shall ask you no questions that you dislike; give me a hint if there is any one you wish to decline—Did you make any affidavit?
 A. Yes, I did.
 Q. Will you please to read that?

[Giving the witness the Public Advertiser, May 31, 1775.]

A. I believe that to be the exact substance of the affidavit that I made.

Lord Mansfield. It cannot be read without the attorney-general consents to it.

Mr. Attorney-General. I don't consent.

Lord Mansfield. If he consents to it, I have no objection.

Mr. Horne. May I give it to the jury?

Lord Mansfield. No; I suppose they have all read it years ago.

Mr. Horne. My lord, that is my misfortune that it is so long ago.

[Mr. Horne begins to read it.]

Lord Mansfield. You must not read it.

Mr. Horne. I have proved the publication by the printer.

Lord Mansfield. It will have a different consequence, if you only mean to prove that there was such an affidavit published. If you mean to make that use of it, then you may produce the affidavit, or have it read.—If you mean to prove the contents of it, they must come from the witness, and then you will have a right to have it read.

Mr. Horne. I mean both to prove the contents true, and the publication of the affidavit: that indeed, I have already proved.

Lord Mansfield. Then you may read the affidavit, if you make use of the publication of it.

Mr. Horne. I make use of both; that it was so published, and charged, and that it is true.

‘The Public Advertiser, Wednesday May 31st, 1775.’

[The affidavit read.]

- Q. Are the contents of that affidavit true?
 A. They are; it was made at the time I was wounded and taken prisoner.
 Q. Pray, do you know that the Americans upon that occasion scalped any of our troops?
 A. I heard they did; but I did not see them.
 Q. You saw none?
 A. I did not.
 Q. From whom did you hear it?
 A. From a captain that advanced up the country.
 Q. Was you, at the time when the orders were given to you to go to Lexington and Concord, apprehensive of any attack by those Americans against whom you went?
 A. We were as soon as we saw them; we found them armed.
 Q. Before you went from Boston?
 A. That day we did.
 Q. How many miles is Lexington or Concord from Boston?
 A. The farther is about 25 miles, the nearer is about 12.
 Q. Did you know, had you any intelligence that the Americans of Lexington and Concord were, at that time, marching, or intending to march to attack you at Boston?
 A. We supposed that they were marching to attack us, from a continued firing of alarm guns, cannon, or they appeared to be such from the report.
 Lord Mansfield. Did you say cannon?
 A. Cannon.
 Lord Mansfield. When was that?
 A. As soon as we began the march, very early in the morning.
 Mr. Horne. But did you hear those alarm guns before your orders for the march were given, or before your march began?
 A. No.
 Q. But after you had begun your march?
 A. Yes; after we began our march the alarm guns began firing.
 Q. Did you suppose those alarm guns to be in consequence of your having begun the march?
 A. I cannot say.
 Q. I will not desire you to suppose (though the gentleman has supposed that they were coming to attack him) but do you know of any intelligence whether the persons who fired the alarm guns, whether those were the persons who were killed at Lexington and Concord?
 A. No; I do not.
 Mr. Horne. How those orders came you cannot tell, therefore I do not mean to examine to it.
 One of Jury. Pray who did the alarm guns belong to; to the Americans or our corps?
 A. From the provincials.
 Mr. Horne. What do you mean by an alarm gun?—Alarm may be misunderstood.
 A. That is, what they term in the country an alarm gun; it is a notice given to assemble the country.
 Q. After you had begun your march, you heard these alarm guns?
 A. Yes.
 Mr. Horne. My lord Percy, I thank your lordship for your attendance. I will not trouble your lordship with any questions. I shall not ask your lordship those questions I intended, since general Gage has not thought proper to attend: he is gone to Germany I understand, and will not be back, I suppose, these—three or four days!
 Lord Mansfield. Then you have done?
 Mr. Horne. Yes.

(R E P L Y .)

Mr. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

May it please your lordship, and gentlemen of the jury,

The gentleman has chosen to take the conduct of his defence himself; and in the course of the conduct of it, he has proceeded in as singular a way as I believe ever any cause was conducted that was ever tried in any court of justice. He certainly has done more than the wisdom, than the propriety, than the decency of any counsel would have permitted him to do on a similar occasion; and if I conjecture his aim aright, from the manner in which he has attempted the defence, he has more cast about to be stopped in a great variety of parts, for the sake of making it a topic of complaint, than seriously stated them, as hoping they could be deemed by any by-stander (and more particularly by you that are to judge of them) at all pertinent to his defence. I did not recollect on the outset that I had so totally passed over the terms of this charge, much less that I had so profusely enlarged upon subjects foreign and impertinent to that charge, as to lay me open to any reflections upon that account. It is not to my purpose, and therefore I will trouble you with no reflections upon those various stories (histories of various adventures in many parts of the world) with which he has thought proper to interlard the speech he has made to you upon this subject; which, before I sit down, I hope I shall be perfectly justified in having stated to you as one of the plainest, and clearest, and shortest propositions that ever was laid before a jury. Gentlemen, it is certainly true, the charge in the information consists in this, that he did write and publish, and cause and procure to be written and published, a certain false, wicked, malicious, scandalous, and seditious libel. I was afraid, when my speech was loaded with the imputation of having thrown out invectives in the terms of the information, information, that the information had not been sufficiently explicit upon the true nature and quality of the libel, which it offered to bring before you. I admit that the information is explicit, that it is direct, and that it perfectly and justly qualifies the nature of the charge that is brought before you of scandalous and seditious. It is likewise inferred, that this is concerning his majesty's government, and the employment of his troops; the information has therefore undertaken to say, that the scurrilous matter which follows was delivered in writing, concerning the king's government, and concerning the employment of the troops. If it was delivered concerning either, it is sufficient: that it was delivered concerning both, I take now (by this time at least) to be perfectly clear.

Then the matter of the libel is this: that at the Constitutional Society it was proposed a subscription should be immediately entered into for raising the sum of a hundred pounds, to be applied in the manner in which it proceeds to specify afterwards. And the gentleman has been at the trouble to prove, that that was not merely a conceit and device of his, in order to introduce the charge that follows; but that the charge which follows was (in point of fact) introduced upon the previous act; which, according to my poor conception of the thing, does not deserve softer epithets than that which followed. It is no alleviation at least of the libel that he has published upon the government, that it took such a commencement as it did, and proceeded in such conduct as has been imputed. I thought it a candour, an article of fairness to names mentioned or even alluded to in the most distant way, to suppose that it had not been exactly in the way he thought fit to state it. But whether it were or were not, in what view has he even said to you, that that circumstance, true or false, goes an inch towards qualifying the virulence and indecency of the libel that immediately follows it? The next words that he puts in are—'to be applied to the relief of the widows, orphans, and aged parents of our beloved American fellow-subjects, who, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were, for that reason only, inhumanly murdered by the king's troops at or near Lexington and Concord, in the province of the Massachusetts.' Let us a little see, what is the nature of the observations he makes upon it. In the first place, that I left it exceedingly short. And the objection to my having left it short was simply this: that I had stated no more to you but this, that of imputing to the conduct of the king's troops the crime of murder. Now I stated it, as imputing it to the troops ordered, as they were, upon the public service. And imputing to that service the crime and the qualification of murder, was an expression scandalous and seditious in itself; reflecting highly upon those troops; reflecting highly upon the conduct of them; and reflecting upon them to all the purposes and conclusions which this information states. But, it seems, I did not argue it sufficiently! I confess very fairly, that to argue such propositions as those (according to that gentleman's notion of arguing them sufficiently) is far beyond all the compass of all the talents and abilities that I have in the world. I cannot speak four hours in order to demonstrate to you, that taxing people with the crime of murder, and taxing the conduct of people with that imputation, is a scandal upon the parties so reflected on. If there be a man of more diffusive talents, of better talents at speaking, who can expend four or five hours by enlarging upon that proposition in that manner, I do not envy him his talents; for my lungs would not be sufficient, if my talents were. I trusted that I had sufficiently demonstrated that position.

Now, on the other side, what is the kind of answer that is made to this? In the first place, he is to prove that it was murder! Asserting that it was murder over and over again in the speech, is the palliation, and is the defence of this! But he is to prove that it was murder! I confess very fairly, that this is the first hour in which it ever entered into my imagination, that that species of proof could be allowed to a defendant! I am not at all sorry that it has been allowed: for the consequence has been to refute more than half the speech, and more than half the application of it; therefore I am not sorry that it has been allowed. But I will never, so long as I live, accede to this as a proposition of law, that a man shall be at liberty in a libel to charge you with the crime of murder, and when he is indicted for that libel (or otherwise brought into judgment for it by information), that it should be competent for him to put you to try, whether you have been guilty of murder or no. I did say, what common sense dictates, what the law of every civilized state under heaven prescribes (and there is not a maxim of law to be fetched from any country or age that contradicts that), that the man that calumniates, and does not accuse, deserves to be punished with exemplary severity. He told you a long story of murders supposed to have been committed in St. George's Fields, where he took to himself the merit of having prosecuted that murder. As far as that part of the story goes, I don't quarrel with him. If he, seeing a transaction which he took to be murder, thought himself bound to prosecute that transaction, honestly, candidly, and with humanity and fairness to the prisoner, as well as to the friends of the deceased; if he did that, I do not quarrel with him: but whoever, in the moment of prosecuting that murder, published in the news-paper (either by advertisement or otherwise) matter that was likely to cause an impression upon the minds of the people at large, or upon the minds of the jury, before they heard that prosecution tried, did a most abandoned and a most wicked thing. Is that the way that people are to be tried for their lives? Are they to be brought before a jury in a regular course of trial, to be heard for themselves upon the evidence then laid before them? and is the integrity of a libeller to interpose, by writing down their reputation; and by endeavouring to instil into people, where they cannot be heard, where they have no opportunity to contradict, and where witnesses cannot be examined either on one side or the other, an impression that they are guilty, without the form, without the essence of trial? If therefore there was such an advertisement as that published, that advertisement I hold to be a most wicked one. Prosecuting men that are thought to be guilty, is a fair and an honest action. In this case, what is the excuse here? That they cannot be prosecuted. Supposing the accident of the distance from that side of the water and other accidents should so far intervene as to prevent the possibility of trying those men, even if they had been guilty of murder, would it follow as a conclusion upon that, that they shall be libelled? and that it shall be in the power of any man alive to raise impositions behind their backs, by publishing in the news-paper imputations to their disadvantage, which they cannot contradict or refute? calumniating them, accusing them of murder? The time would undoubtedly come in which they would be to be tried for it, if guilty: and to be tried for it under that sort of impression! I am amazed that any man of common sense could (even in his own case) imagine, that it would be tolerable doctrine in the ears of people that have lived for years in a civilized country, that that was the true way of prosecuting upon the subject of murder! He told you a story of Glenco, which, if I understand him right, went directly the reverse. They were to be tried. Unless he means to compare the authority of the Morning or London Evening Post to the councils of the whole nation! if he means to make that comparison (which he did not make, and which is too absurd for me to do for him); making that, a degree of idle analogy would seem to arise; but without that, absolutely none.

Now with respect to the rest, he has offered by evidence also to establish, that this must necessarily be a murder; and the fate of those people, it seems, is to be tried by the effect of that evidence! And what does that evidence amount to? Why, that the king's troops, under the command of general Gage, were in an hostile country; and that it was impossible for them to go upon any service (ordered by that general and conducted by his officers) without an attack: that the moment they went out of Boston alarm guns were discharged, in order to raise the power that possessed the country on the other side upon them, and to make the attack upon them. And this is the medium by which it is to be proved, that the soldiers who were ordered by their commander to advance from their post at Boston into that country, were guilty of murder; because they were surrounded upon the 18th and 19th of April, in consequence of those alarm guns, with an armed force on the other side, in order to withstand and oppose their operations, they being at that time in an hostile country! Why, if I had meant, if I had thought it consistent with law or with reason, to enter into a discussion of that question with him, whether he is a libeller or not, for having charged them with murder by a printed paper, instead of charging them in a more direct way; if I had thought it necessary to establish the case against him in the strongest and most precise manner, it would have been by calling just such a witness as that, in order to prove that the troops were themselves attacked; and that, upon the moment of their going out of the place, they were surrounded with hostile attack. But necessity, it seems, necessity, according to the notion of law, is that which self defence prescribes, that a man must go to the wall who is attacked. He must fly first; and if he can escape by flight, then he shall not justify himself by turning and repelling the attack! What sort of understandings does he imagine the audience to be composed of, when he represents an expedition and attack of this sort in that manner? That the king's troops, when they heard the alarm guns and were attacked, were to fly, to get to the wall, and drop their arms! This is the notion of military disposition in an hostile country! And this is the law that the learned gentleman has learned from the State Trials, the source of his reading! and which he has set forth with a dexterity, and a species of understanding, and a sort of eloquence, which is peculiar to him. And I must say now, it is more than I ever heard before. If I had the honour of a conversation with him nine years ago, I had forgot it. I did not take notice of the conversation perhaps enough to retain it. I had still less an idea that his abilities were so conspicuous. But this species of eloquence I take to be peculiar to himself; as it could not have been delivered by a counsel: it would have been absolutely impossible by a counsel used to practice; it would have been impossible to a counsel, used to feel the weight of his arguments, used to feel the ridicule of applying such kind of arguments as these, and deterred by that means from doing it. No counsel would have thought himself warranted to do this. He would not have had conceit enough to think his own understanding so superior to all that heard him, as to suppose he could pass such a proposition upon his auditory, that the conduct of an army, in an hostile country, was to be like the case of a man indicted for murder to fly to the wall, for fear they should do some mischief! This is the sort of defence he has thought fit to make upon this subject; and it gives me a ground for saying, that, if I was short in applying the charges of the information as I should have done, it is now completely applied.

All that part of the defence which went perfectly wide and foreign to all practical application to the case, I will now entirely drop. At the same time I cannot do it without making this observation; that, whatever be the degree of veracity claimed by and due to that gentleman, in the particular words that he thinks proper to impute to the various people whose words he has thought fit to quote; as far as my memory goes of the transactions which I do remember; as far as conjecture goes with regard to those I have not a perfect memory of; I believe, that this failing at least belongs to his representation of them: that taking, as he has done, particular passages, for the sake of remembering them to the disadvantage of the speaker, he has stripped them of their context. He has therefore made it impossible to recollect the whole, in order to see whether they would, or not, turn out such nonsense as he has imputed to those several speakers. It may be true, for aught I can tell; though if any body had asked me, whether I ever spoke upon that subject he mentions in the house of commons, I should have said no, directly; for I believe I did not. I believe Mr. Oliver will not say, that he brought any such idle message as that to me. I should have treated it with ridicule. I have no objection to converse with Mr. Oliver upon any subject he thinks proper. He does me honour by it. But if he had brought me such a message from a person in Mr. Horne's situation, respecting my conduct in parliament, a little laughing at the message he must have excused. But he does not say he brought me such a message. I don't know that I bore any part in that debate. But he says, he took down some words; and that I said, it was a Gothic custom. --If I got up to make a speech upon a proposition of law of that magnitude and extent, of such a variety of reading that that proposition was open to, and contented myself with sitting down, and saying, it was a Gothic custom; I should not have had any pretensions to the ear of that house. If I made any discourse about it; which I suppose I did, as he says I did; I suppose it is as idle, as foolish a kind of speech as it is possible for any man to make. I should not wonder if I was refused all audience there in all times to come, provided my speeches were just those which I have had the---(not misfortune, for I think it very natural) as I have heard to-day. Other people have shared exactly the same fate. Is it a fair thing, with respect to any judge, with respect to any court of justice? Is it a fair thing to state one fiftieth part of a cause depending before them with an observation which the other forty-nine parts would never have justified upon it? Is it the part of a good citizen, of a man that reverences the laws of his country, of a man that wishes any thing but anarchy to rise in a country? Is it the part of a good citizen to treat courts of justice in that manner, with respect to cases cited from their decision in the way in which those were cited? I mention them only in the way of observing that: for, to be sure, it was perfectly impertinent to any question depending before you; and unless it had been equally so with respect to the cases themselves, I should not have given you the trouble of a single word upon that. There was one thing which fell, which gave me some little astonishment to hear, and which I remember well. I don't take notes, but I have a pretty general remembrance of things delivered by me. I take myself to have stated to you in the outset the very same doctrine of intention. Why, who doubts but that the intention constitutes the criminality of every charge of every denomination and kind? But the extreme ridicule of the thing is, the talking of that doctrine upon an occasion like this! See what it is. The words are, that the American subjects for meritorious considerations upon their part, and for those considerations only, were inhumanly murdered at Lexington and Concord, in the province of Massachusetts Bay. Nobody can doubt in the world, but that imputing inhuman murder to the conduct of those troops, is abuse! I suppose he did not mean it as flattery, to extol them, to deliver them down to posterity (if such paragraphs as these had any chance of reaching down to posterity) to deliver them down to posterity in terms of heroism! He meant to abuse them: the words themselves are abuse. Then, I say, where words of direct, unqualified, indubitable abuse are printed concerning any man alive; that the very circumstance of printing calumny concerning a man, carries along with it an intention to abuse him. Why it is nonsense to doubt it. One may spin words till one loses the meaning of a sentence, and the first words that are used in that sentence; but it is nonsense to deny when you use direct abuse;---when you revile them in the very attempt to justify the charge;---and again use terms of abuse;---that those terms of abuse don't prove intention of abuse: prima facie, at least, they will. If a man is called a rascal, has he any doubt whether the man that called him so means to abuse him or not? Why that is playing with words in the most ridiculous manner. And these are the kind of words that are now called in question; and a jury are told, that where a libeller calumniates another with the imputation of a capital crime, that calumny carries along with it a proof of his intention to caluminate. That is the dreadful proposition which is to prove an intention to overturn all the liberties of this country! I wish those who talk about their liberties, would be pleased a little to have a small regard for the liberties of others. The man that robs upon the highway, while he is unapprehended, is the freest of all human creatures: but the men whom he attacks, whom he plunders, whom he terrifies, these are not free as long as they are under his dominion and power.---The man that dashes libels about him upon every one he is pleased to call his enemy, is the freest of all agents; but those that he inflicts deep injury upon, are they free? And is it talking with common sense to say it means the liberty of doing wrong? of attacking personal property, reputation, or what I please, without being controuled? Is that what you call freedom? It is a definition of freedom that I never expected to hear; and which can, I am sure, do no good to any cause upon the side of which it is advanced, before any one gentleman of common sense! That I call no freedom.

With regard to the rest, what can one argue it more? Why, yes, it seems one may; because if you will scan the construction of these words well, they will not amount to a libel.---Not amount to a libel! it seemed to me a very hardy proposition when it was first of all stated, that calling a number of men murderers was not a libel. No, says he, It is not a libel.---Observe, I called it under-writ, it is writ beyond common sense, instead of below it, which was the first apprehension I had of the thing. For, he says, non constat that there were any persons of that description! non constat that there were any widows, orphans, or parents! non constat that there were any beloved American fellow-subjects---and I believe more about that last than any thing else; for I do not believe that our love to our American fellow-subjects was that ruling principle that governed this publication.---Who, faithful to the character of Englishmen,---(that may be true, for aught I know) 'preferring death to slavery, were, for that reason only, inhumanly murdered by the king's troops.'---Non constat whether there were or were not any king's troops! It happens unluckily in the last part of the sentence, it is asserted that there were: for the sentence runs---'who, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were, for that reason only, inhumanly murdered by the king's troops:' so that if assertion was necessary, there is an assertion for you. But, however, how can any body trifle so much with his own understanding, or with the understandings of others, as to suppose that, if it had been without an assertion, suppose it had been a question,---why did the king's troops murder our American fellow-subjects?---why would not that convey a libel just as much? Is there any necessary forms of words that compose a libel? I think it fair to say, that that was given up. It was used more to shew the skill of the adversary than to the merits of the question.

But, it seems, that a soldier may commit murder: Aye, to be sure, so may any other man alive. There is no question at all about that; but if any man is supposed to have committed murder, he ought to be tried. If any man is charged with having committed murder (otherwise than in a legal course) he is calumniated; he is libelled: and that is all that I have to contend before you. But it is a little doubted, whether this relates to the employment of the king's troops! I must admit that that doubt was started a little before the explanation of one of the witnesses came: and I suppose, if that had been in the contemplation of the learned gentleman when he spoke, he would not have raised that as a matter of doubt; because, as it stands now, it seems a very plain proposition (both upon the evidence and the reason of the thing) that it was so applied, and meant to be so applied. Then he informs you, that I have used a number of words, and he gave you a list of them.---I wondered to find the words that I had used in a written speech, brought in so many volumes into the court to be used again here. But, it seems, this is a collection of all the words I ever used in my life; and he sits down in his chamber (the place he is most used to sit in) collecting all these words, and then comes here with a criticism upon them. Now I have not the least inclination to derogate from that learned gentleman's talents as a critic: and if the food of such poor language as mine will serve the gentleman to employ himself upon, he is quite at liberty to do it upon this or any other occasion, whenever he thinks proper to employ himself quite so innocently. The words, in substance, I will maintain. I really did not believe that the gentleman who had written that paragraph, would have undertaken to defend it just in the way in which he has done to-day. I thought that, instead of quibbling upon the force of it, that he would have advanced a great deal more boldly to it than he did; at least in the outset of the speech to-day: and, in the latter part of his speech, he so far justified what I foretold in my own mind upon the subject, that, I think, he has proved to a demonstration (if that were an essential part of the case) that his true reason for writing that, was to defy the laws of the country; for so I stated it. I stated it that there was no affectation of discussing any subject; that there was no pretence or colour even of reasoning upon any subject; under the mask of which many others have thought proper to cloak themselves, when they wish to write malignantly. But there was not even an affectation of that; but a blunt way of bolting out so much calumny, without qualifying it in any way in the world, or making it appear any thing more than that which I stated it to be;---an attempt to defy justice.---Either prosecute this, or never prosecute again as long as you live, is the true language of this advertisement.

What is the rest of his defence? It consists in abusing me; the judge; the jury; the Crown-Office; the law as it now stands; the counsel that appeared for the printers who were convicted of the same crime before, because they did not do enough and act to his mind; and the solicitor of the Treasury! That is the nature of the defence made in this cause! I have chosen to separate it from the case, and yet I believe I shall be forgiven if I say a few words upon the rest of the subject. The learned gentleman thinks proper to state to you that this is a prosecution of two years old; because the offence was committed on the ninth of June 1775, and because you are now trying it in July 1777. Now if he could have made any thing of the observation, it would have been just as handsome to himself (it is nothing to me, for I despise all those things) it would have been as handsome to himself, if he had thought proper to state the facts precisely as they were. This information was filed in Michaelmas term 1776; and it was not my fault, but his fault, that it was not brought on to trial in the Hilary term following. But still there is between the 9th of June 1775 and Michaelmas 1776, some time, though not two years; a year and something more. Then he complains that I thought proper to file my information against the printers first, although I might have applied to those printers in order to have obtained evidence against him. In the first place, I have made it a rule to myself not to apply to any printers, in any other way than by charging them for their delinquency, and bringing them before a jury to be tried. That is the application that I make, and always will make to the printer of a libel. In the second place, if I had thought proper to apply, as he calls it, to the printer, I might have had a fictitious conversation put upon me, in order to prove that I had practised with them to get Mr. Horne delivered up. Now in the third place, it is a matter of perfect indifference to me whether I prosecute the printer or the author. And I will tell you why. My notion with regard to authors are, that most of them are generated by printers; at least more authors are produced by printers than printers by authors; and if the press was never to go till the good sense of some author set it to work, it would prevent a great deal of the groaning of the press upon publications and subjects much too frivolous to be regretted if they were lost; and I believe authors have grown more from the press, than the press has grown from authorship. If I stop the publication of libels, I think I do an essential good to the country. I know if they are printed and published ostensibly, where to apply to stop them: but I never did, nor ever will stop them by applying to the printers. He has explained, by examining the printers themselves, that no such application was made to them. I cannot state exactly upon memory the time when I commenced this prosecution. I suppose it must have been about the time when the others were tried. If so, the consequence is, that the Michaelmas term following, in consequence of that application, was the very first time that I could file an information at all. I was told when the printers were tried here, Why do not you resort to Mr. Horne? You are afraid of Mr. Horne. To be sure, there was some reason. If I had known that I should have been obliged to hear so much eloquence! especially to have the trouble of replying to it; it would have been a prospect I should not have liked. But, I believe, I should have waded through all that prospect, if I had been ever so much apprized of it before. And when Mr. Horne was disclosed to be the author, I certainly should have prosecuted him. But before he made that disclosure, what I said is true; that he defied the laws of his country under the screen of the printers. And he has proved himself that he was not to be disclosed without without a prosecution. He gave no authority to the printers to go to the solicitor of the Treasury, and make a disclosure of him: or, if he did, they made no such disclosure. And yet this manner of delaying the cause is one of the grounds upon which he has thought proper to treat me just in the manner in which he did. Now I would beg you a little to recollect how that part of the conversation arose, when the learned gentleman spoke without book; when he spoke at first, and had not his words so well measured as the well-timed labour of his closet enables him to measure his words upon paper: he certainly took the freedom of charging me of using all means, right or wrong, foul or fair, in order to get a conviction.

Well, what is the next article of his harangue? I am reproached for having boasted of the integrity of my character, because I denied the truth of a false and impertinent charge; because it is neither true nor pertinent, that ever I had employed myself in the way in which I am so represented to have employed myself. And what is the boast upon that? It is a very high one; for I called upon him to name his instances. That was my boast! and innocence, when it is able to call upon its reveller to name his instances, does make a proud and magnificent boast. So far I boasted. Well, when called upon, what are the instances? The first is, that I prosecute before a special jury. That in a prosecution which I (the servant of the public) think proper (for reasons of public weight and importance) to produce, I wish to have men of the first character, of the first situation, men of the highest and most approved honour, my judges! that is the first article in which the opprobrium is to be justified of my using all means, foul or fair, in order to obtain a conviction! In this he has all the advantage that an accuser can possibly have: I confess the whole charge. It is my desire to have all my actions so tried; it is my desire, and I will, whenever I can, obtain a tribunal of that sort; which (from the great dexterity and wisdom of eloquence) is looked upon to be the best topic (before them) to condemn me for resorting to! This is another matter he would have been totally deprived of, if he had submitted, as those poor printers did, to be defended by counsel. They would never have thought of abusing the attorney-general (before a special jury) only because he thought proper to lay his cause before that jury! It is a singular way to take those topics which go beyond the ability or practice of any counsel whatever!

Then the next attack is upon the poor master of the Crown-Office, Mr. James Burrow. I do not believe that there exists in this world a man of more inflexible integrity than Mr. James Burrow. I never heard him charged in my life with any thing like opprobrium. I know perfectly well that if I were to apply to Mr. James Burrow, in order to get any particular manner of striking a jury, either in London or Middlesex, that he would set himself, for the whole evening after, to contrive how he could best cross the purpose of that application. I know he would. I know him very well. I am sure he is a very honest man; and I am sure I should fare exceedingly ill, if I was to attempt to make any such application. None such is suggested. But it is said, that the solicitor of the Treasury desired Mr. James to take this part; to take two special jurymen out of every leaf; giving this reason for it, because the books might be made up; and that if it was once known to be the practice of Mr. James to begin in the middle, or the end, or any part, they might be made up by the address of the officer, so as to get a particular set of men for a jury. I will take it as said by the gentleman: the solicitor proposed that there might be taken two out of every leaf, which would produce the fairest collection of the jury in the broadest manner, and out of the greatest number and variety of names and people. So far I think nothing unfair in the solicitor's application: and I do not know, I protest to God, at this very moment, what earthly reason Mr. James Burrow could have to refuse that, except the one which I strongly suspect him of, namely, that one---that it was desired by the solicitor for the crown:---for if he apprehended that it would give the slightest ground for suspicion by taking any one article of conduct whatever, he is very nice, I know, and very obstinate; and I am sure, nothing would bind him more surely to refuse to take a jury in that, which appears to me to be the most impartial way; stronger and quicker than an application on the part of the solicitor of the Treasury. That is not all; but the sheriffs of London are abused: the jurors are named merchants, who are not so! Why, do I make up that book? Is that one of my crimes? The sheriffs of London make it up. When it is returned to the Crown Office, the names are taken out of it, in the most impartial manner; and the whole state of that, instead of loading me or any one concerned with the slightest calumny, is the fullest acquittal that could be had! It does not therefore relate to any one concerned in this prosecution. Then I am wrong in another thing; for under all bad administrations, there is nothing so rife as prosecutions for libels! I should be glad to know in the abstract (without referring to those documents, so many of which the learned gentleman produced himself) in the eight years I have had the honour of being attorney-general, how many prosecutions for libels have been brought? I wish that was stated, in order to shew the monstrous number of prosecutions for libels! They are not so many as I could wish; for if you compare the prosecutions with the daily publications, that man that looks at those publications, and sees how rife and rank the scandal is upon all orders and denominations of men, upon all branches of the government and the state, as well as private men; whoever sees that, must look at them with a very peculiar eye, if he does not see that the encrease of the scandal is a great deal more than the encrease of the prosecution for that scandal! and yet this is one of the topics also for which I have been abused! It is said also that I am corrupt in another respect, because I condescend to consider myself as the servant of the whole public, and so liable to receive orders from every branch of the legislature. The arguments that one hears used upon these occasions, they are made only for the moment. I should not be astonished if from the same quarter I had heard that it was one of the most monarchical sentiments in the world, to insist that there is any public officer who was not under the orders of either house of parliament. I always took it to be the assuming of those that call themselves Whigs (for want of a better nickname) what I hold---that in a free state the representatives of the people assembled in parliament are a sovereign member of that state; and that every public officer, great or small, is amenable to them. But how amenable to them? I wish that had been a little more stated. Amenable to them to do wrong? No man ought to be amenable to the greatest and the proudest body of men whatever to do wrong: I have not been so amenable: for in those instances in which I have thought it would be wrong to prosecute, I have stated it to the house, and the house has forborne the prosecution upon my representation. That has been the conduct which I have held upon the occasion; and a conduct which, if I am questioned for it (in any place where it would be pertinent), I should be very glad to render an account of that conduct. But, says the gentleman (with a strain peculiar to himself), will you submit to be sworn in order to be examined by me?---To what? Yes, sir; to any one fact which can be alledged in your defence, I will submit to be sworn to the truth of it. But will you submit to be sworn in order to undergo impertinent questions about the motives and steps of your conduct from time to time; such as I shall think proper to put to you?

Gentlemen, I put myself upon your good sense! I put myself (for the question was not meant for you) I put myself upon the candour and the good sense of the audience, that I was impertinently treated in the proposal; and that I should have been ridiculous to have submitted to that proposal! I spoke to some persons about it (whose authority I am not permitted to cite to you) who concurred in opinion with me: but I am sure, and I put it to the mind of every gentleman, whether I did not act right in that matter. To have refused him justice would have been a hard and improper measure; I did not refuse that. To refuse to answer impertinent questions, I did refuse it; and I appeal to the candour and good sense of this audience that I did right to refuse it; and it would have been ridiculous to have done otherwise.

These are the topics which, as far as I can recollect, have been produced against me. With regard to the rest, the gentleman informs you; that the law as it stands is full of a great variety of hardships. I don't know that system of law under heaven which may not be perverted to purposes of hardship. I don't know any thing so perfectly ridiculous as to argue from the possibility of the corruption of a good thing to its worthlessness. In order to make any thing of that, he should have gone the length not only of stating what might have been done, but what was done; otherwise you may sit and hear that glorious constitution (which I have known so many able and eloquent writers and speakers extol in the highest terms to the skies) you may sit and hear it reviled from one end to the other: not for the mischief that it actually does; not for the inequality in point of justice that it actually administers; but which it might! But let him prove that there is any thing in my conduct of this prosecution that deserves those epithets with which he charged it, and I must submit to be covered with them. But that will not make an iota of difference in your verdict. What does it signify to you (who sit to consider whether this be a true or a false charge) that it comes at this time or at any other? The gentleman taxes me with folly in saying, that if it were a crime in 1775, it must be so in 1777! I should hold it to be the utmost folly to say otherwise. If there were any improper practices with regard to the prosecution, it might be a reason of objection to those who prosecute; but with regard to the mere question to be put to the jury---is he guilty in manner and form?---it is absolutely nothing; it would be folly to assert it.

I have now stated to you the progress of this business, referring to his own witnesses for the truth of that progress; and I trust, that upon that representation, I shall not be found to have misconducted myself even in the course of this prosecution. I have gone very much out of my way, and very contrary to the turn of my temper, when I have embarked so far in a defence of myself at all; but when facts are stated, I thought it necessary to re-state and explain these facts. Beyond that, let general and loose reflections take what place they please. I put myself upon my public conduct for my justification, without boasting of that conduct either one way or the other. If I am wrong in that conduct, let it condemn me: if I am right in that conduct, let it approve me. It is upon that only that I desire to rest it; without boasting or without disclaiming, either on one side or the other. I will say no more upon that subject, but refer it to you to determine what ought to be done upon a charge thus stated, and thus industriously proved upon the part of the defendant, if any proof had been wanting to support it upon the part of the prosecutor.

Lord Mansfield. Gentlemen of the jury, if ever there was a question, the true merits of which lay in a very narrow compass, it is the present. This is an information against the defendant for writing and composing, and printing and publishing, or causing to be printed and published, that is, for being the author and publisher of a paper, which the information charges as a seditious libel. If it be a seditious libel in its own nature, there is no justification attempted: why then there are but two points for you to satisfy yourselves in, in order to the forming of your verdict.

Did he compose and publish; that is, was he the author and publisher of it? Upon this occasion, that is entirely out of the case; for it is admitted. As to the excuse of ignorance, or being imposed upon (which is a topic in the case of printers and others) it is out of this case, because it is avowed to be done deliberately; and it is now avowed, and the contents of it. Why then there remains nothing more but that which reading the paper must enable you to form a judgment upon, superior to all the arguments in the world; and that is,

Is the sense of this paper that arraignment of the government, and the employment of the troops, upon the occasion of Lexington, mentioned in that paper? Read! You will form the conclusion yourselves. What is it? Why it is this: that our beloved American fellow-subjects---(therefore innocent men)---in rebellion against the state---They are our fellow-subjects; but not so absolutely beloved without exception! Beloved to many purposes: beloved to be reclaimed: beloved to be forgiven: beloved to have good done to them: but not beloved be so as to be abetted in their rebellion!—and therefore that certainly conveys an idea that they are innocent.—But farther it says, that they were inhumanly murdered at Lexington by the king's troops, merely on account of their acting like Englishmen, and preferring liberty to slavery! The information charges the libel to relate to the king's government and the employment of his troops. Read it, and see whether it does relate to them. If it does, what is the employment they are ordered upon? what is the employment that they execute? To murder, the paper says, innocent subjects; because they act like Englishmen, and prefer liberty to slavery! Why then, what are they who gave the orders? what are they who execute them? Draw the conclusion. It don't stand upon argument. If any man dares to give orders to murder a subject, or to execute those orders, or to make any subject a slave, he is as high a criminal as can exist in this state. Evidence has been examined, and though (unusual) I was very desirous every thing offered should be heard; and you have had Mr. Gould examined: and whatever doubt there might be with regard to the occasion of hostilities at Lexington; whatever weight the observations might have before; yet now, upon his evidence, you see how it stands! The unhappy reluctance to the legislative authority of this kingdom by many of our fellow-subjects in America, is too calamitous an event not to be impressed upon all your minds; all the steps leading to it are of the most universal notoriety. The legislature of this kingdom have avowed that the Americans rebelled, because they wanted to shake off the sovereignty of this kingdom; they profess only to bring them back to be subjects, and to quell rebellion: troops are employed, money is expended upon this ground; that the case is here, between a just government and rebellious subjects; for a just and a good purpose, for the benefit of the whole. If I don't mistake, the first hostilities that are committed—(though many steps on both sides leading to them existed before)—but, if I do not mistake, the first hostilities are those committed upon the 19th of April, 1775. If some soldiers, without authority, had got in a drunken fray, and murder had ensued, and that this paper could relate to that, it would be quite a different thing from the charge in the information; because it is charged as a seditious libel, tending to disquiet the minds of the people. Now what evidence has Mr. Gould given? Why, he says, that he was sent with a part of the king's troops, by the orders of general Gage, the governor of the province, the commander of the king's troops; that when they began their march (which was about two or three in the morning) he heard (I think he says he heard) a continual firing of alarm cannon, which is a signal, at certain distances, used in America to raise the country; and that they heard as soon as they began their march; and from thence they concluded that the provincials were marching to attack them. When they came within sight of them, they found them armed, in bodies of troops armed. This was not a stated time of peace when the king's troops, under the authority of the governor, go from one part to another; to have bodies of men, in military array, armed, and signals fired! but this they found. And he says, he cannot tell himself; but to a question asked him, he says, he heard the provincials charged our troops. He says in his affidavit, which he has likewise sworn to, and which you may compare, that he saw, on their arrival, he saw a body of provincial troops armed, to the number of about 60 or 70 men: 'on our arrival they dispersed, and soon after firing began; but which party fired first I cannot exactly say.' And then, towards the latter part of the affidavit, he says, 'the provincial troops returned, to the number of about three or four hundred. We drew up on the Concord side of the bridge. The provincials came down upon us; upon which we engaged, and gave them the first fire.' And says he, 'this was the first engagement after the one at Lexington. A continued firing from both parties lasted the whole day. I myself was wounded at the attack of the bridge, and am now treated with great humanity as a prisoner.' Now from this account you see, that they had erected in effect their standards; each had their troops in battle array; they were ready to fight. Who (from this evidence) fired first, he cannot tell; that is, originally the first. He heard that the provincials charged; but whether the one or the other fired first, he cannot tell; when the two bodies were in the field, each expecting the other to attack.—This is the account given by the defendant's witness: that it was the king's troops, by order of the commander and the government, that were engaged in this fray, in which those lives were lost! Then if there is nothing particular, but it is a consequence of the general dispute, of the cause of this most lamentable and unhappy war, no good man but must lament it, and wish them reclaimed. If it is barely the consequence of that which has led to further hostilities since, you will read this paper, and judge for yourselves. You will judge whether it conveys a harmless, innocent proposition for the good and welfare of this kingdom, the support of the legislative government, and the king's authority according to law; or whether it is not denying the government and legislative authority of England, and justifying the Americans; averring that they are totally innocent; that they only desire not to be slaves; not disputing to be subjects, but they desire only not to be slaves; and that the use that is made of the king's troops upon this occasion (for you will carry your mind back to the time when this paper was wrote) was to reduce them to slavery. And if it was intended to convey that meaning, there can be little doubt whether that is an arraignment of the government and of the troops employed by them or not. But that is a matter for your judgment. You will judge of the meaning of it; you will judge of the subject to which it is applied, and connect them together; and if it is a criminal arraignment of these troops, acting under the orders of the officers employed by the government of this country, to charge them with murdering innocent subjects, because they would not be slaves, you will find your verdict one way: but if you are of opinion that the contest is to reduce innocent subjects to slavery, and that they were all murdered (like the cases of undoubted murders, of Glenco, and twenty other massacres that might be named) why then you may form a different conclusion, with regard to the meaning and application of this paper.

Without giving you any reason, you will easily guess why I pass over a great deal that has been said, that ought not to have been said. but there is one thing that is relative to the subject, and therefore it ought to be said: that was, a doubt (upon one of the former trials upon the printers) that occurred to the jury, in which they had a difference of opinion; and they agreed to come in and leave it to my decision. I had told them (as I told you) that one of the points to guide your verdict was, whether you understood the meaning of the writing to be as charged by the information. One of them understood, or doubted, whether (this was in the case, you see, of a printer, of a third person) whether actual proof of a seditious intention (distinct from the inference from the act itself) was necessary to be proved. The other thought that a seditious intent was by law to be inferred from the seditious act; and they came in and proposed their doubts. And I told them what I tell you (and what I believe never was doubted, and what was not questioned upon that occasion, though I desired they would move the court upon it, if they had any doubt) that it is not necessary to prove an actual intent, which is the private operation of a man's mind; but a jury were to exercise their judgment from the nature of the act, as to the intent with which it is done. As, if a man writes and publishes a seditious libel, a libel that has a seditious tendency, that is a ground to a jury from whence to infer—(when it is without any justification, without any excuse)—that is a ground from whence to infer a seditious intent. Just as if a man murders another without any justification of that act, it is a sufficient ground for the jury to infer that he did it maliciously. That answer was given to the jury.

Gentlemen, here I conclude every thing I shall trouble you with, by way of charge, because you will exercise your judgment, as I have said before, upon the paper and the information, by reading them, which you may have to carry out with you. But merely for the sake of the audience, as something has been so much mentioned in the cause (for I don't give you any reason for taking no notice of any thing out of it) I think proper to state it in so particular a manner, that when you come to see it misrepresented, you may all of you remember what it is, and what it was, and upon what ground it passed; and that is, with regard to the attorney-general's reply. You see, as the case is, it is entirely out of this cause: for the defendant has called witnesses; and I thought it right that he should know it early, that he might not abstain from calling witnesses to avoid the reply, and in that manner be surprized. Now I will tell you what I take to be the practice with regard to that matter. The nature of a reply is the plaintiff's answer to new matter advanced by the defendant. The plaintiff knows his own case; he knows his own witnesses; he opens it; he observes upon his witnesses; and he draws such conclusions from them as he thinks proper, to persuade a jury to increase the damages. The defendant, if he only makes observations upon the same evidence, and only draws conclusions from the same evidence to the jury, to lessen the damages; why there, there is nothing new, there is no new matter at all: and by the practice, for the expedition of business in civil causes, and in prosecutions in the name of the king, with common informers, the practice is, that they don't reply where that is the case. But, notwithstanding that, if the defendant was to start a point of law, the other must be heard. If he was to throw out to the jury, to catch and to surprize them, allegations of fact which he called no witnesses to prove—you recollect how many millions of facts you have had urged to-day, for which no witnesses were called—(how many extrinsic to the cause)—there the counsel for the plaintiff may set the jury right, and lay them out of the cause, and shew that they are absolutely irrelevant and immaterial. But, in solemn trials, in state prosecutions, where the attorney-general attends, I never knew it denied but that he had a right to reply. I was many years solicitor-general: I was attorney-general: I have known it often, where nothing has been said for the defendant that they thought called for a reply. I never knew it denied to the attorney-general, where he insisted upon being heard in reply: and I believe the present attorney-general has replied several times. This is so much the law of the land, that (if my memory does not fail me) in the most solemn cases (and as I speak from memory only, if there should be any slip in it, I hope I shall be excused) and, to the best of my memory, in the trial of my lord Byron (if any gentleman can correct me, I shall be very glad to be corrected—I dare say there are some here that were of counsel in that cause) in the trial of lord Byron, who called no witnesses, no evidence, the attorney-general replied. The house of commons, as the public prosecutor for the nation, insist upon it as an absolute right, that they are to reply. It is a great while ago; but, if my memory does not fail me, I think I replied for the house of commons upon the trial of lord Lovat, though he called no evidence. I speak from memory, it is many years back; and therefore, if I am mistaken, I do it with that reserve and qualification to be set right.—This has nothing at all to do with the cause; but it at least explains, to those who want to understand it, the light in which I see that matter, and the ground upon which I determined it.

[The jury withdrew about five o'clock, and returned into court about half an hour after six; and gave in their verdict, that the defendant was Guilty.]

Further Proceedings in the Court of King's-Bench at Westminster (a).

Wednesday, November 19, 1777.

(The attorney-general moved for judgment against Mr. Horne.)

Lord Mansfield. Is the defendant here?

Mr. Daniel, the defendant's attorney, answered, that he was.

(The information was read by order of the court.)

Mr. HORNE.

MY lords, with great submission and respect to your lordships, and in full confidence and security of protection by the laws of my country, I presume to offer to your lordships that I am not, upon this information, a proper object for the judgment of this court. And, my lords, I cannot mention what I have to say in arrest of the judgment which Mr. Attorney-General has prayed against me, without first acknowledging the obligations which I have, and the thanks which I owe, to my prosecutor and to my judge: for, my lords, it is to them, and to the arguments which they used in order to obtain a verdict from the jury, it is to them that I am indebted for that argument which must prevent the judgment. At the same time, my lords, it is but justice in me to declare, that whatever ill-founded doubts might, at the beginning of the trial, have harboured in my mind concerning any personal enmity, hostility, or prejudice towards me, before the close of the trial they were all entirely effaced: for enmity, my lords, is not a supine and careless, but an active and curious principle, prompting men to neglect nothing which may tend to produce the desired mischief. And your lordships, I am persuaded, will see reason to believe with me, that, so far from any uncommon diligence having been used against me, neither my prosecutor, nor my judge, nor my jury had ever so much as once cast an eye over the information brought against me; for your lordships will instantly perceive, by looking at the record, that I am not therein charged with any crime.

My lords, when first I saw the charge in the information, I thought of it the same which I now offer to your lordships; and therefore, fearing nothing but the inattention of the jury, the greater part of my defence consisted of motives pressed upon the jury for their attention: and when I hoped I had secured that point (the only favour, as I then declared to them, which I had to request) I then proceeded to shew that there was not any crime in that which was alledged against me; keeping my eyes always fixed upon that with which alone I had to do, namely, the charge in the information; and I desired the jury to take the information out of court with them.

But, my lords, when I heard the reply of Mr. Attorney-General, and the address of the judge to the jury, I was no longer at a loss to understand how it happened that I could not see in the charge against me that criminal matter which they imagined it to contain: for, my lords, I then heard, for the first time, that there was an insurrection or rebellion in the colony of Massachusetts-Bay; that certain persons—and those persons denominated king's troops—were employed by his Majesty and by the government for the purpose of quelling that insurrection or rebellion; that in this their employment and service an engagement ensued between the said rebels or insurgents and the said king's troops so employed; that in this engagement certain of the said insurgents or rebels were slain by the said king's troops; and that my advertisement and the charge of murder, said to be contained in it, related to the said insurgents or rebels so slain by the said king's troops so employed.

And, my lords, the judge did very fairly, and very plainly and precisely, and in express words shew to the jury, that on these circumstances did depend the whole criminality of the charge against me.

Now, my lords, though the jury did, through want of attention, forget to consider that these circumstances were neither proved nor charged; your lordships, I am sure, who are to look to nothing but to the record itself; your lordships, I am sure, will not fail to consider, that no indictment or information can be cured or made good by any implication, argument, supposed notoriety, or intendment whatever. Nothing can be assumed or intended against me, but what is expressed in the record itself. If therefore in the whole range of possible occurrences there can any one be imagined in which it would not be criminal to say that the king's troops (no technical term, my lords, troupeaux,—flocks—companies—even deserters may be comprehended under that term)—if therefore any one possible occurrence can be imagined (and I suppose there are a great many, the judge who tried me helped me to some, above twenty)—if any one can be imagined, in which it would not be criminal to say that the king's troops have committed murder, then your lordships cannot, upon this information, proceed to judgment; because the information wants those necessary averments, which cannot by any means be intended. For your lordships will find, by looking at the record, that in each of the various counts which this information contains, it is simply averred, that I did write and print and publish, and cause and procure to be written and printed and published, to the tenor and effect following.

Your lordships will therefore be pleased to examine the record; and I have not the smallest doubt that your lordships will do me that justice which my jury, through want of attention, did not.

Mr. Attorney-General. My lord, if I understand the effect of this motion, it is, that the matter of the information, as charged, does not state a crime. That indeed is the necessary form of the objection to be made in this stage of the business; for, in this stage of the business, every thing is to be taken to be solemnly true which that information has stated as essential to the constitution of the crime, and which the jury consequently have found. Now, my lord, it is said that nothing is to be assumed but what appears upon the record; and that the information wants some averments. I was very attentive to collect, if I possibly could, what species of averment it was that the information was supposed to want. But I missed it, if it has been stated on the part of the defendant. What kind of averment inserted in this information would have supplied it, and have made it a perfect description of the crime? I shall take up the information itself to shew, in the course of the argument, that there is enough stated in it to make the crime. The information does not end, as is supposed on the part of the defendant, merely in these words,—that he had 'written and published, and caused and procured to be written and published, according to the tenor and effect following.' The information states expressly that he had---'written and published a certain false, wicked, malicious, scandalous, and seditious libel of and concerning his majesty's government and the employment of his troops, according to the tenor and effect following.' So that the matter found by the jury, and upon which your lordship is either to pronounce judgment, or to say that, stated so upon the record, it amounts to no crime in estimation of law, is, that he did write that false, wicked, malicious, scandalous, and seditious libel of and concerning the king's government and the employment of his troops.

I own I expected that he would have gone farther, and that he would have endeavoured to prove that such words as are included under the tenor and effect following, delivered in writing to be printed and published concerning the king's government and concerning the employment of his troops were, in themselves, so manifestly innocent, that it was necessary for a court of justice, upon this record, to say that, notwithstanding the jury has found a libel published according to the tenor and effect following, yet there is, in truth, no LIBEL.

Your lordship will observe what it is that he had said concerning the king's government, and concerning the employment of his troops;---that 'our beloved American fellow-subjects, faithful to the character of Englishmen, preferring death to slavery, were, for that reason only, inhumanly murdered by the king's troops, at or near Lexington and Concord in the province of Massachusetts-Bay, in New England, on the 19th of last April.' This therefore is what he has said concerning the government and concerning the employment of the troops;---that they were to commit murder upon the king's subjects, only because they were, something better than innocent,---meritorious, in being faithful to the character of Englishmen, and in preferring death to slavery. If it be possible to state that these words (uttered and applied in the manner in which this record applies them, to the public government of the country, and the employment of the troops) are innocent words, then the argument might have taken some foundation. But to say that there is any want of averment in this---till I hear what averment could have made this charge more plain, more distinct, as a charge of murder upon the king's subjects, against the employment of the troops, against a national exertion of public force; it cannot, in my mind, by words be made more strict and plain than it now stands upon the record.

The effect of these words I industriously avoid to speak of now: the degree of favour that belongs to them will be the subject of farther discussion: the only question that is at present before the court, is simply this;---whether the libel, as stated in the record, does or does not contain sufficient matter of slander.

Mr. Horne. I should be very happy, my lords, at all times to pay to Mr. Attorney-General all those compliments which are personally and officially due to him; and I would rather have risked the chance of exposing myself, than not to pay to him the compliment of a reply; if indeed I could have found in his answer any thing to which even the appearance of a reply could be given. However, I will do for him what I can.

Mr. Attorney-General has said, that he could not discover from any thing which I had advanced, what omitted averments were suggested by me to be necessary to the information. My lords, though Mr. Attorney-General may have missed them, your lordships, I am sure, did hear me very plainly and distinctly: and though I did not formally say, such and such averments are necessary to the information; yet when I to d your lordships, that in the reply of the attorney-general, and in the address of the judge to the jury, I then heard, for the first time, that there was a rebellion in Massachusetts-Bay, and that certain persons were employed to quell that rebellion; your lordships, I am sure, and the whole court very well understood that those were the averments which were necessary to the information. And, my lords, it was not out of any satirical inclination that I imputed the omission of those averments to carelessness; I had other reasons. For, indeed, I know very well (and upon reflection I dare say your lordships will know very well) why those averments were omitted. My lords, the truth is, that Mr. Attorney-General found himself between Scylla and Charybdis. If he inserted these averments, he split on one side, on the proof. My lords, the advantages are very numerous and great which I should have derived from those averments. The information would have been destroyed, for want of proving what was averred; therefore he did not chuse to aver them. By the nature of his answer to me, I am persuaded he was aware of it: and, from certain intelligence, I know that there was a consultation on the drawing up of the information against me. It was proposed to alter the information; but having obtained verdicts upon the other informations, it was, upon consultation, agreed by the learned gentlemen, the king's counsel, that the information against me should be literally the same. I know it from certain information, which I obtained without the least treachery in my informants; for the gentlemen who caused me to know it, had not, in what they said, the least notion that they were telling me any thing.

(a) "Further Proceedings on the Trial of John Horne, Esq. upon an Information filed ex officio, by his Majesty's Attorney-General, for a Libel, in the Court of King's Bench, Vol. XI.

"Bench, on Wednesday the 19th and Monday the 24th of November." Published by the defendant, from Mr. Gurney's short-hand notes.

My lords, before I heard Mr. Attorney-General's answer, I was a little apprehensive that I might meet with some difficulties. I was sure I ran no hazard in the principle of my objection. I thought, indeed, that I might perhaps be puzzled in the application of it, by cases of law, or by precedents that I had never before heard of. Now, my lords, tho' Mr. Attorney-General has not favoured me with any, and though I cannot myself give you an adjudged case; yet your lordships will forgive me, unused to these matters, if I read to you the opinion of a learned judge in a matter exactly similar to this. It is in the case of lord Russell. The opinion I mean is that of Mr. Justice Atkins. His words are remarkably fortunate for me; and it being that kind of law obvious to persons who pretend to understand no more than what common sense will direct them to, I did happen to have read that book long ago. I beg leave to read some little of it, because it literally applies. He takes notice of that part of the indictment where it is averred against lord Russell, that he was at a consultation for the purpose of seizing the king's guards. He says, 'guards' [there is no difference between guards and troops,---except indeed that troops is a much wider word than guards,---Troops! we say a troop of strolling players.]

'The guards---What guards? What, or whom does the law understand or allow to be the king's guards, for the preservation of his person? Whom shall the court that tried this noble lord, whom shall the judges or the law that were then present, and upon their oaths, whom shall they judge or legally understand by these guards? They never read of them in all their law-books. There is not any statute law that makes the least mention of any guards. The law of England takes no notice of any such guards; and therefore the indictment is uncertain and void.'---He says, 'the love of his subjects is next under God, the best guard of kings.' He says,---'The very judges that tried this noble lord were the king's guards, and the kingdom's guards, and this lord Russell's guard against all erroneous and imperfect indictments, from all false evidence and proof'---(What immediately follows does not, indeed, apply in my case)---'from all strains of wit and oratory'---(there has been none here, my lords)---'misapplied and abused by counsel. It had been fit for the court that tried this noble lord on this indictment, to have satisfied themselves from the king's counsel, what was meant by these guards.---But admit the seizing and destroying of those who are now called the king's life-guard, had been the guard intended within this overt fact, or OPEN DEED, (these, my lords, are the averments which are similar to those that I propose---these are the averments which Mr. Attorney-General enquired after) 'yet (he says) the indictment should have set forth, that de facto the king had chosen a certain number of men to attend upon and guard his person, and set forth where they did attend, as at Whitehall, or the Mense, or the Savoy, &c. and that these were the guards intended by the indictment to be seized and destroyed; that by this setting forth, the court might have taken notice judicially, what and who were meant: but to seize and destroy the king's guards, and not shew who and what is meant, makes the indictment very insufficient.'

My lords, Mr. Attorney-General (I beg the court's pardon, I shall take up very little of their time) the attorney-general says, he expected I should have said that the matter contained in the information is no libel.---I should perhaps have said so, if libel had been such a technical term that I could have known what it meant: and if it was such a definite and technical term, then perhaps my objection would not have all that weight with you which I now believe it will.---The sending of a wooden gun was adjudged by this court to be a libel. There are many other things that might be adjudged libels. It is impossible for me to say what libel means. It is not a technical term; and perhaps if it had been, the attorney-general would not have had quite so much difficulty to make this information good: but not being a technical term, it makes those other averments the more necessary.

Mr. Attorney-General has then tried to help the deficiency of the averments in the information by, of and concerning---'of and concerning his majesty's government and the employment of his troops.'---I believe there is no crime comprehended in of and concerning; for it may be of and concerning good, as well as bad. The word concerning means, looking at together; and that is the only, and the single meaning of the word concerning.

Now, my lords, if Mr. Attorney-General should succeed in this his prayer, he will be a very fortunate, though not a very reasonable gentleman.

My lords, a proof of all those matters which should have been averred (which I am founded in saying by the opinion of the judge, who pressed them upon the jury as motives for their verdict, and which I firmly believe he would not have done, if he had not believed that they were contained in the information) a proof, my lords, of all those circumstances was supplied for the attorney-general by the judge on the trial; for he produced no evidence of them himself: and he will be very fortunate, indeed, if he can now prevail upon the court to supply likewise the deficiencies in the information.

Lord Mansfield. Whatever the degree of guilt may be, how strongly soever it may have been proved, or whatever observations may have arisen in this case; yet if the defendant has a legal advantage from a LITERARI FLAW, God forbid that he should not have the benefit of it. It is most certain, that at the trial the information was considered to be words spoke of and concerning the king's government and his employment of his troops; that is, the employment of the troops by government. Upon that ground the defendant called a witness, Mr. Gould. The attorney-general rose to object to him; but it was very clear that he was a proper witness; and he acquiesced immediately, because it was extremely material to shew what the subject-matter was to which the libel related---if it was the employment of the troops under proper authority that came within the charge in the information.---Had it been a lawless fray (which I believe I said at the trial), had it been a lawless fray, it would not. Though the saying so might have been a libel of the individual's, yet it would not have been this libel: it would not have been this libel of the king's troops employed by him. Now at first, and at present, it seems to me, that 'of and concerning the king's government and the employment of his troops,' pins it down. But I doubt a little upon it. There is some weight in the objection, whether in the form of drawing there should not have been inuendos. In common reason and understanding, it is charged; but whether technically charged or not, I do not know; and therefore as to this point, without prejudice we will take some time to consider of it; to see whether precedents can be found which require this technical scrupulosity over and above that certainty which is sufficient to every reader: and we will go on with the rest, de bene esse, as we could not pronounce judgment upon it now, and will consider of it till he comes up again, if we find sufficient to satisfy us to over-rule the objection.

[Lord Mansfield then read his notes of the evidence given upon the trial as follows.]

Lord Mansfield. This is an information filed by the attorney-general against John Horne; and it was for publishing the advertisements that have been read from the information.

Thomas Wilson proved the advertisements in question, the manuscripts, to be the hand of Horne; and Henry Sampson Woodfall, he published the advertisements. He swears that the defendant gave him a paper the 7th of June, to publish in his own and send to the other papers; and that the defendant paid the fees. Then he produced two advertisements to publish. The defendant cross-examined him, and he assented to the question of the cross-examination, by saying, "By your desire I inserted these advertisements, and published them as your act and deed. You never desired to be screened; but you desired to be given up. You said, they should not want full evidence." William Woodfall proved likewise a paper given him by the defendant to be inserted in The London Packet and Morning Chronicle; which were the advertisements in the record. Therefore, upon the fact of printing and publishing there is no doubt at all.

The defendant called a witness to prove, that really and in truth there was a subscription, and that the money was actually raised; and he likewise called William Lacey, who proved that 100*l.* was paid to him, and by him remitted to Dr. Franklin: that was 100*l.* and no more. And then the defendant called Thornton Gould. And he said, that at Lexington, on the 19th of April 1775, he was a subaltern officer. He was ordered there by the adjutant of general Gage, the commander in chief of his majesty's troops, and governor of the province: and he, together with the other troops, set out; and between two and three in the morning he was taken prisoner: that he heard the provincials charged our troops.---"We found them armed. We supposed they were marching to attack us, from a continual firing of alarm cannon, early in the morning, as soon as we began to march. Notice or alarm guns are to raise the country." Upon this evidence the jury found him guilty.

Lord Mansfield. Mr. Attorney-General, have you any thing to say?

Mr. Attorney-General. Mr. Horne, I suppose, will say what he can in extenuation.

Lord Mansfield. Mr. Attorney-General, have you any thing to say?

Mr. Attorney-General. It belongs to the defendant, I apprehend, to state what he can to the court in his extenuation.

Mr. Horne. I shall state nothing in extenuation till your lordship's decision has told me that there was a crime. I do not know where the crime lies at present: My objection goes, that there is no crime in the information. It is impossible for me to extenuate that which I do not acknowledge.

Lord Mansfield. Have you no affidavits of circumstances, or any thing?

Mr. Horne. None in the world.

Lord Mansfield. Let him be committed.

Mr. Horne. Will your lordship commit me before it appears whether I am even accused of any crime?

Lord Mansfield. No, then you may come up on Monday.---You came voluntarily now?

Mr. Horne. I did.

Lord Mansfield. Then come up voluntarily again.---If you should find any precedents on either side, I wish you would give them to us.

[This recommendation to bring precedents was repeated to the attorney-general and to the defendant, two or three times.

To which Mr. Horne replied, that he was not himself very likely to produce precedents.]

King's-Bench, Monday, Nov. 24, 1777.

LORD MANSFIELD.

I N reading my notes the other day in the case of The King and Horne, I overlooked the reference to a written piece of evidence that was given by him at the trial, and I am told I did not state it; and therefore I will state it now.

He produced to captain Gould the Public Advertiser of the 31st of May 1775, which purported to be the copy of an affidavit made by captain Gould, while he was a prisoner in the custody of the rebels at Medford, and printed in that paper: and he asked him whether the contents were truly printed. I told him, that if he meant to prove the facts to be true as above, it could not be proved by affidavit, the man being present; and even if he was absent, they could not be proved by affidavit: but that if he meant to shew that, at that time, there existed a public account of it in the paper; that might be of use to restrain or qualify the meaning of the paper that was in question by the information. He said, he desired it to be read in that light; and in that light it was read, and is as follows:

I Edward Thoroton Gould, of his majesty's own regiment of foot, being of lawful age, do testify and declare, that on the evening of the 18th instant, under the orders of general Gage, I embarked with the light infantry and grenadiers of the line, commanded by colonel Smith, and landed on the marshes of Cambridge, from whence we proceeded to Lexington. On our arrival at that place, we saw a body of provincial troops armed, to the number of about 60 or 70 men. On our approach they dispersed, and soon after firing began; but which party fired first, I cannot exactly say, as our troops rushed on shouting and huzzaing previous to the firing, which was continued by our troops so long as any of the provincials were to be seen. From thence we marched to Concord. On a hill near the entrance of the town we saw another body of the provincials assembled. The light infantry companies were ordered up the hill to disperse them. On our approach they retreated towards Concord. The grenadiers continued the road under the hill towards the town. Six companies of light infantry were ordered down to take possession of the bridge, which the provincials retreated over. The company I commanded was one. Three companies of the above detachment went forward about two miles. In the mean time the provincial troops returned, to the number of about three or four hundred. We drew up on the Concord side of the bridge. The provincials came down upon us; upon which we engaged and gave the first fire. This was the first engagement after the one at Lexington. A continued firing from both parties lasted through the whole day. I myself was wounded at the attack of the bridge, and am now treated with the greatest humanity, and taken all possible care of by the provincials at Medford.

Signed

Edward Thoroton Gould.

There was a motion made the other day in arrest of judgment, and many objections, I understood, that were taken to shew that the charge, as it stands upon this record, is insufficient in law to support any judgment: that there was no averment as to the state of the Massachusetts colony at that time; either that there were riots, insurrections, or rebellions: that there were no averments that the king had sent any troops: that there was no averment that there was any skirmish or engagement; or how it began; or the nature of it: how it began, or how it went on, or ended: and that it was not averred that the employment of the troops was by the king's authority. The only objection that had colour in it was, what I mentioned last—that the employment of the troops was not averred to be by the king's authority. I thought then, and said, that the averment of the words being written 'of and concerning the king's government,' was an answer; but no precedent was cited or alluded to on either side. I fancy the attorney-general was surprised with the objection. But there was no precedent; and I could not say upon my memory whether precedents might not require some technical form of expression as to that medium through which words are averred to be written of the king's government. And if any flaw had happened formally, technically, or verbally, that were not at all founded in the sense or reason of the thing, I should in this case be of the same opinion that I was in the case of an outlawry—that the defendant ought to have the benefit of it: and therefore I desired that we might think of it for some time, that precedents might be searched, and the books looked into. We have fully considered of it, and the precedents have been looked into, and we have fully considered the information, and all the objections that were mentioned, and all the objections that we could think of; and we are all clearly of opinion, without any doubt, that the information is sufficient. An indictment or information must charge what in law constitutes the crime, with such certainty as must be proved: but that certainty may arise from necessary inference; in the manner settled in the case of The King and Lawley in Strange. Plain words, in a libel, speak for themselves. If they are doubtful, their meaning must be ascertained by an innuendo. Here the words are plain; they want no innuendo. They are averred to be written 'of and concerning the king's government and the employment of his troops.' The obvious meaning is, that the employment of the king's troops must be under his authority; and it necessarily is so, if the words also relate to and are written of and concerning the king's government. This must now be taken to be true; because the verdict finds it. Had the question arose upon a demurrer, it must equally have been taken to be true. The gist of every charge of every libel consists in the person or matter of and concerning whom or which the words are averred to be said or written. In The King against Alderton the information was held bad, because it was not laid in the information, it was not laid that the libel was of or concerning the justices of Suffolk. Where the words are averred to be written of the king's government where—(there are several precedents)—or of the government of the kingdom, or of the government, suppose, of the navy; as to any thing further as to which they are also written, through the medium of which they calumniate the king's government, there is no form of expression technically necessary. And it cannot be; because there may be cases where the king's government might be calumniated through an imputation upon the gross licentiousness of his troops. The question to be tried is, whether the words laid are written of the king's government. It may vary the degree of mischief, guilt, or malice; but it is totally immaterial as to the constitution of the crime upon the record, whether the words refer to something that has existed, or are an entire fiction. Had Lexington been left out; or had any other place been mentioned, where there had been no skirmishes, or engagement, instead of Lexington; it would without any innuendo have been equally a libel. It is the duty of the jury, to construe plain words and clear allusions to matters of universal notoriety, according to their obvious meaning, and as every body else who reads must understand them. But the defendant may give evidence to shew that, in the case in question, they were used in a different, or in a qualified sense. If no such evidence is given, the obvious meaning to every man's understanding must be decisive. Before this trial, five several juries had found those words, from their necessary meaning, to be of and concerning the king's government. Here, in this case, the defendant gave evidence: and the evidence he gave demonstrated that the words related to troops acting under the king's authority; and consequently related to the king's government. And I am the more confirmed that upon this occasion there is little colour of doubt of any flaw in the information, that in those five trials that I allude to, in one or other of them, a great variety of counsel of learning, eminence, and ability, were employed. They were called upon to pry with all the sharpness that they had into the information, to pick a hole in it: there were three judgments given upon conviction upon them; and no counsel saw or imagined there was any flaw in it. THEREFORE we are all satisfied that the information is sufficient.

Mr. Attorney-General. The defendant has been convicted on the oaths of twelve of his countrymen with having written, printed, and published, and caused to be written, printed, and published, a certain false, wicked, malicious, scandalous, and seditious libel of and concerning the king's government and the employment of his troops; asserting, that the national force of this country has been employed in the murder of the king's subjects, for as meritorious an attribute as can be imputed to man: and he has specified the time and place at which that was done.

The charge, as contained in the information, rests within a narrow compass. I might have stated, perhaps, and proved a different crime to have arisen upon it; but I did state that which, according to my judgment, was a crime of such quality, was a crime of such heinousness, and of such a size, as fairly called for the highest resentment which any court of justice has thought proper to use with respect to crimes of this denomination. My lord, although the crime, upon the state of it in the information, rests within the compass which I have now mentioned; yet, as it now comes before the court, the matter that now requires the consideration of justice does not lie within that narrow compass. The defendant himself has thought it important to the situation which he wishes to hold with a certain body of men in this country, not to leave it just in the place in which the information does: he has thought it essential to his views (which I don't enter into particularly what they are), but he has thought it essential to his views, to prove how much he meant by writing in that manner to the public; and also to prove how much he meant, and how directly, how pointedly, and how confidently, to insult the public justice of the country, by not only committing as high a crime as could be committed within the description of misdemeanor against the public authority and welfare, but by stating himself to have committed that crime with a view of insulting the public justice of the country. My lord, if it had been essential to us to prove that that crime, and that that case which is specified in the indictment, was the subject of a murder committed under public authority by the national forces of the country, he has himself thought proper to state and to prove by his witnesses, that he meant the attack made by the king's troops upon a body of rebels. Your lordship has taken notice of the addition of this affidavit that was introduced into the cause. The effect of that evidence was to prove that which was but too well known before, namely, that in the time there specified, the 19th of April 1775, the rebels had arrayed themselves in arms; had formed magazines; had taken stations in the country in which they had placed themselves; were ready to surround the forces of the king, as far as their abilities could do it, upon any motion to be made by these forces: that upon the instant, very early in the morning, (and whether accidentally or otherwise let that be decided by the witnesses) the king's troops, marching in perfect silence—that, upon the instant of that happening, the first demonstrations that were made upon the part of the rebels was the firing alarm-guns; understood exceedingly well by the witness, and exceedingly well explained by him: it proved that he understood them perfectly, namely, by the rebel troops instantly surrounding them. I state that to have been industriously proved on the part of the defendant, in order to mark that he meant to fly at the very highest subject, and to offend in the most heinous manner in which it was possible for him to contrive to offend.

My lord, he did not think it enough to have proved that such was the intention of the paper with which he was at that time charged; but he also thought it incumbent upon him to produce witnesses to prove another part of the contents of that paper; namely, that he had attended a solemn meeting; at which meeting he, with certain other persons there assembled, had contributed money to the amount of about 100*l.* and that the purpose for which they contributed it, was the comfort and relief of those whose merits with them was stated to consist in no other particular than the circumstance of their relation to those rebels that stood in arms against against the king's forces: he brought witnesses to prove the fact. That the money was actually paid, is not the thing that I pin upon: let it be doubted whether the 50*l.* came actually to the hands of the banker; or that the money was afterwards applied to any of the purposes that are there stated. To be sure, there was not proof alledged upon that subject. Whether it is to go to those people, or whether it is to go to any other purposes similar to those, in the intention of those who subscribed the money (that is, the insulting and affronting government and the king), it is a matter of very little consequence to the point I am now speaking to. He was at the pains to prove that they went through that business that I am stating to your lordship, in order to afford comfort and relief to those who stood in that species of relation to rebels; which, as far as it goes, is to excite that rebellion, by offering that degree of encouragement to those who shall happen to perish in such a flagitious offence: as far as it goes, it amounts to that. The libel therefore that now stands before your lordship, which the occasions of the defendant of a different sort (which I shall have occasion to speak more particularly to presently) obliged him to aggravate, obliged him to go to the extent that I have now stated, is such a one that I believe it will be totally impossible for the imagination of any man, however shrewd, to state a libel more scandalous and base in the fact imputed, more malignant and hostile to the country in which the libeller was born, more dangerous in the example, if it were suffered to pass unpunished, than this which I have now stated to your lordship.

Your lordships have seen that the libel is such, that it is impossible by any epithets to aggravate it. I depend entirely upon the state which I refer to—-which your lordship has delivered to the court—-I depend upon that for the most emphatical description of every circumstance that tends to create criminality, which is possible to be alledged not only against this, but against any other libeller whatsoever.

My lord, such was the nature of the libel. The next question that I meant to trouble your lordship upon, is the conduct of the present defendant in the article of publishing the libel; and, subsequently to that publication, in the article of avowing it, holding it up, maintaining it to the world, thrusting it in the face of justice, and proclaiming—Sic honor et nomen divinis vatibus. It is a language addressed to the lowest and most miserable mortals. There is no man of any value in point of understanding in this country, that does not know that the information contained in it is false, absurd, impossible, even below the worth of refutation; but it is addressed to the lowest of the mob and to the bulk of the people, who it is fit should be otherwise taught, who it is fit should be otherwise governed in this country. My lord, the occasions of this reverend gentleman to keep up the opinion of a particular part of the factions in this country, his private occasions obliged him to be very distinct, and very anxious to explain it. On the part of the prosecutor, it was enough to prove that he had published the libel. The evidence for the prosecutor went plainly and distinctly to that fact. We produced the original paper under his hand. We produced the man to whom it was delivered, Woodfall, in order to publish it in a paper which he printed himself, called The Public Advertiser. We proceeded to prove that the occasion of delivering it to him, and the office in which he was employed, was not merely to publish it in that paper, but to carry it round to all the other public papers, and to make the dispersion of it as universal as he possibly could. Here therefore we did establish upon him, by these plain facts, a publication of as universal a sort as it was possible for him to obtain.

One would have thought that these facts so stated had constituted crime enough. But it is not enough to be criminal, with this man; he must be criminal in a way that may shew himself able to defy justice; in a way to convey to the people, who believe in those foolish representations, that they actually do trample upon justice. I believe a great multitude of those gentlemen called authors, Mr. Woodfall's contractors, are men, in fact, who are just capable of writing in an impudent style. The single, simple merits of an impudent style is, I suppose, qualification enough to prevent any material distinction between his whole rabble of authors. If there is any distinction at all, it must arise from the superior confidence of those who cannot only write in that style, but stand forth in the face of the justice of the country, and say—'punish me if you dare.'—These men lose their credit, these men lose their opportunities with their own faction, if, when called upon for their crimes, they don't preserve the same impudence. That made it necessary for the present defendant not to be satisfied with what the prosecutor had proved upon him, but to undertake a proof of his own; to put him upon still higher ground with his connections. By the examination of Woodfall, he has undertaken to prove that the method of his transactions with him had been at all times, that he should at all times, for his own sake, if called upon, give him up to justice. A good decent sort of contract, that long way back, between a divine of the church of England and his printer! that he should print for him upon the terms of the said divine being ready to be given up to justice, at all times when he should be called upon! My lord, the first instance of the execution of that contract was upon a polemical subject of divinity, between this gentleman and one of his parishioners, Mr. John Gibbons. Mr. Woodfall did not state to the court which part was taken by which: I cannot possibly tell how the controversy ended: but in an extract upon the subject of religion, for the edification of the parish, it was necessary that there should this contract intervene, that the reverend author should be ready to stand forth, in case the printer was called upon. But with regard to the present publication, this was to be much more emphatical. He had been called upon in another place. He was afraid that he had not been thought by his friends to be confident enough in maintaining what he was charged with; and that, if he escaped, it was upon some doubt, whether the guilt was proved upon him or not: upon which he called upon this Woodfall to depose, that, in the manner of delivering him that paper, it was done with an industrious and affected solemnity. The words of it were, '—did I, or did I not, formally before the witness, when called in, deliver that paper as my act and deed; as if it had been a bond?'—And, in the latter end of the evidence,—'if they now chuse to take notice of this advertisement'—it was to that purpose; for this reason, that 'in the last transaction before the house of commons it was pretended they let me off because they could not get full evidence. Do you remember I said, that if they now chose to take notice of this advertisement, they should not want full evidence?'—Now, my lord, to be sure what had passed between this author and this printer, (whether it was more or less in confidence) would have made it of no consequence whatever to the public. It would have been impossible for us to have known it; or, if it had, to have adduced it in evidence. That would have been of no consequence whatever to the public. It never could have attained to the public knowledge, excepting that interest I have so often alluded to, that interest of recommending himself to his patrons, and defying public justice.

I don't state the offence to have consisted in the conversation that was held between him and the printer; but I state the offence to arise in his anxiety to proclaim to the public, that such is the manner in which he dares to insult the justice of the country. There arises the aggravation of the crime, in the manner in which I have stated.

With regard to the rest, the strange conduct of the defendant—I don't know whether that is properly before the court, any more than his misrepresentation of the proceedings of the court; which I shall urge for no earthly purpose but this: in order to demonstrate that the aim and object of publishing so very infamous a libel as this, went even beyond the libel itself; to endeavour, if he could, to make a paradeful triumph over justice. That, I take it, is the aim and object of the whole.

I have done my duty with regard to the charge that is now before the court. With regard to the punishment also, it is my province and my duty to speak.

All other crimes of specific denomination are followed by the letter of the law with peculiar punishments: and they are held forth, by that punishment and by that denomination, to the people in the true point of view in which it is the interest of the public that they should be seen. The law, by enacting particular punishment upon specific crimes, has stated to the public that degree of terror to arise from the example of punishment, which in wisdom, it is hoped, will be sufficient to restrain offenders from committing the same crimes. My lord, that is not so in the case of a misdemeanor; which in its variety and consequences may involve crimes of a different nature and complexion, and of very different degrees of guilt. Concerning those crimes the public neither has a right nor can possibly be informed in any other manner than by the judgment of this court. My lord, this court, in pronouncing judgment upon this offence, is to do by this species of offence, with regard to the rest of the public, and to the purpose of deterring crimes, what the law does when it specifies particular punishments. Your lordships are in these cases to supply the deficiencies of the law, and to shew to those who have been desirous to offend the laws of their country, by the example of its punishment, in what sort of estimation this degree of guilt is held by the law: and I, whatever I have thought upon the subject, shall be obliged to confess, that if the punishment is less than the old deliberate judgment has gone to and rested upon, that I have been mistaken in the nature of the crime. All my apology for the mistake must consist simply in this single circumstance: that, lying so near to high treason, it was very difficult for my imagination and judgment to draw the line between them. That must be my apology, if I have mistaken the nature and quality of this crime.

My lord, the punishments to be inflicted upon misdemeanors of this sort, have usually been of three different kinds; fine, corporal punishment by imprisonment, and infamy by the judgment of the pillory. With regard to the fine, it is impossible for justice to make this sort of punishment, however the infamy will, always fall upon the offender; because it is well known, that men who have more wealth, who have better and more respectful situations and reputations to be watchful over, employ men in desperate situations both of circumstances and characters, in order to do that which serves their party purposes: and when the punishment comes to be inflicted, this court must have regard to the apparent situation and circumstances of the man employed, that is, of the man convicted, with regard to the punishment.

With regard to imprisonment, that is a species of punishment not to be considered alike in all cases, but varies with the person who is to be the object of it: and so varies with the person, that it would be proper for the judgment of the court to state circumstances which will make the imprisonment fall lighter or heavier, as the truth is, upon the person presented to the court. I say, my lord, that would be proper, if I had not been spared all trouble upon that account by hearing it solemnly avowed in your lordship's presence, by the defendant himself, that imprisonment was no kind of inconvenience to him: for that certain employments, which he did not state, would occasion his confinement in so close a way, that it was mere matter of circumstance whether it happened in one place or another; and that the longest imprisonment which this court could inflict for punishment, was not beyond the reach of accommodation which those occasions rendered necessary to him. In this respect, therefore, imprisonment is not only as with respect to the person not an adequate punishment to the offence, but the public are told, and told by a pamphlet which bears the reverend gentleman's name (may-be his name may have been forged to it; but by a pamphlet that bears that name) that it will be no punishment. And your lordships (according to the usual style with which he has affected to treat justice, from the beginning to the end) are told that you cannot punish him in that way: and therefore, if that is a species of punishment which cannot affect him, as your lordship has been before told in a manner to be relied upon, he has made it manifest that your lordships judgment in that part of the punishment, operates nothing with respect to him personally; and consequently that it will lose its whole force and efficacy as with respect to that example which the public justice ought to hold out to the world.

I stated

I stated in the third place to your lordships, the pillory to have been the usual punishment for this species of offence. I apprehend it to have been so in this case for above two hundred years before the time when prosecutions grew rank in the Star-Chamber, and to those degrees which made that court properly to be abolished. The punishment of the pillory was inflicted, not only during the time that such prosecutions were rank in the Star-Chamber, but it also continued to be inflicted upon this sort of crime, and that by the best authority, after the time of the abolishing the Star-Chamber, after the time of the Revolution, and while my lord chief justice Holt sat in this court. In looking over precedents for the sake of the other question, I observed that Mr. Tutbin (an author of some eminence in his day) was angry with Holt, the lord chief justice, for transferring, as he called it, the punishment of bakers to authors. That was upon a personal conceit which such an author as Tutbin thought himself entitled to entertain of the superior dignity of that character all along. He thought that the falsifying of weights and measures was a more mechanical employment than the forging of lies; and that it was less gentleman-like to rob men of their money than of their good name. But that is a peculiarity which belongs to the little vanity that inspires an author. I trust therefore, when I speak of lord chief justice Holt, and of the time in which he lived, I speak (for all; but particularly for this) of as great an authority as ever sat in judgment upon any case whatever. His name was held high during his life, and has been held in reverence in all subsequent times. He deserved popularity, by doing that which was right upon great, trying, and important occasions. He obtained popularity, because he despised all other means of aiming at it, but that of doing right upon all occasions. From the temper of those times, from the vehemence and designs of that faction that opposed him, sir John Holt would have been reviled; if the revilers of that day had not observed in the greatness of his spirit and character, that it was impossible to reach him: and he has preserved a name which was highly honoured during his life, and which will live as long as the English constitution lives. Citing him, therefore, in support of this as a proper punishment to be inflicted upon this sort of offence, is giving, in my apprehension, the greatest authority for it.

My lord, in pronouncing an opinion upon the objections started by the defendant, I would desire no better, no more pointed, nor no more applicable argument than what that great chief justice used, when it was contended before him that an abuse upon government, upon the administration of several parts of government, amounted to nothing, because there was no abuse upon any particular man. That great chief justice said, they amounted to much more: they are an abuse upon all men. Government cannot exist, if the law cannot restrain that sort of abuse. Government cannot exist, unless when offences of this magnitude, and of this complexion, are presented to a court of justice, the full punishment is inflicted which the most approved times have given to offences of much less denomination than these, of much less. I am sure it cannot be shewn, that in any one of the cases that were punished in that manner, the aggravation of any one of those offences were any degree adequate to those which are presented to your lordship now. If offences were so punished then, which are not so punished now, they lose that explanation which the wisdom of those ages thought proper to hold out to the public, as a restraint from such offences being committed again. It was my duty also to consider this as with a view to the public conviction.

I am to judge of crimes in order to the prosecution: your lordship is to judge of them ultimately for punishment. I should have been extremely sorry, if I had been induced by any consideration whatever to have brought a crime of the magnitude which this was (of the magnitude which this was when I first stated it) into a court of justice, if I had not had it in my contemplation also that it would meet with an adequate restraint; which I never thought would be done without affixing to it the judgment of the pillory. I should have been very sorry to have brought this man here, after all the aggravations that he has super-induced upon the offence itself, if I had not been persuaded that those aggravations would have induced the judgment of the pillory. The punishment, however, to be inflicted for this crime rests finally with your lordship. If the court is of opinion that that judgment is not to be pronounced, it will be my humble duty to submit with the most perfect acquiescence. I have no interest in the business but as the officer of the public. I am nothing near so good a judge of the interest which the public have in the business as your lordships sitting in this court; but when I am stating a matter to the court for judgment, I must state it as I feel it; and I feel it so. And if it were my province to do more than to state it so, I should still continue to think of it as I do at present.

Mr. Horne. My lords, though your lordships judgment is to be pronounced upon myself, I shall attend to hear it with the indifference and curiosity of a traveller; which I was early instructed to do in such circumstances as these, long before I could imagine I should ever be in them. My lords, I am a little the more at a loss to address your lordships, because (and I am not ashamed to be laughed at for my disappointment) I acknowledge that I came this morning into the court in the full assurance, that I should find less difficulty to go out of it than I did to come in. My lords, I had no notion at all that evidence could supply the defects of the information; or that it would be attempted to be so supplied by evidence. I did not, it is true, at the time I objected to the deficiencies of the information, I did not, amongst other things, add evidence. I believe I am time enough now to move any thing in arrest of judgment; and if I am, I desire that your lordships would understand me now to object to the supplying of the defects of an information by any evidence whatever. My lord, I apprehend that your lordship had directed Mr. Attorney-General and myself (and I ought, if what he has said of me be any thing like truth, to beg his pardon for coupling my unworthy name with his) but, my lord, I thought that he and I were directed, if we could, to produce precedents. I own to your lordship,

Vol. XI.

I did not well understand the direction when I received it; because I had laid before you a sacred principle, with which I was much better acquainted than with precedents; and for one of which I would willingly give up all the precedents that ever existed.

My lords, I shall no doubt be very irregular in the order of what I shall say to your lordships; and I should not have said a word, if there were not in Mr. Attorney-General's harangue some things that might easily stir a man to anger, if he was not as little susceptible of it as I am. My lords, I feel not the least anger at any thing that has passed. The gentleman on the trial had stripped me of common sense; but he allowed me a sort of understandings. My lords, he shifted his ground in his reply. He first, out of kindness and compliment to me, supposed what I had written to be beneath common-sense: my lords, he afterwards found it proper to make it beyond common-sense. At first I was a fool; at last I was a madman. My lords, at first he thought it---(I forget his expression) but he thought it candor (I think he said) to the names of persons alluded to, though distantly, to suppose that what I had written was false. To save others from some scandal of imprudence or impropriety, he thought it candor to impute falsehood to me. My lords, when that was proved to be true, he only said, that he did not mend the matter: indeed, whichever side of the case I took, nothing could mend the matter.

It is not my business, my lord, to take the smallest notice of what fell from your lordship; nor shall I mention a number of things, which I might justly be permitted to mention, of wilful and gross misrepresentations of the evidence upon the trial: I should not have mentioned it at all; but Mr. Attorney-General has hinted, though not specified, misrepresentations by me of the proceedings of the trial.

My lords, he has endeavoured to alarm me with monstrous fines, with long imprisonment, with infamous punishment. My lords, infamy is as little acquainted with my name as with that gentleman's or with your lordships. I feel no apprehensions from the pillory. I do feel some little pain that a gentleman, taking advantage of my situation, should say and offer those things, unfounded in appearances even of truth, against me, which neither he nor any man like him dare to insinuate in any other station but this.

He has attempted likewise to insinuate, my lords, a species of robbery. When he did so he was guilty of falsehood. He said, that my witness did not prove that the 50*l.* was paid into the bankers. My lords, he literally proved it.

My lords, he represents me as speaking the language of---'if you dare to punish me;---and he says, 'it is a language addressed to the 'lowest of the mob'. Indeed I think so too: but it is his own language, not mine.

My lords, he has dwelt upon my occasions, my desperate situation, my want of character and fortune. My lords, it is my misfortune that from my cradle I have had as effeminate an education and care and course of life as Mr. Attorney-General. It is my misfortune that there was not a greater want of fortune: and as for my occasions, my means have always been beyond them. I should rather, my lords, if I was speaking in extenuation or to mitigate your punishment, I should rather close in with Mr. Attorney-General, and acknowledge myself that desperate, helpless wretch that he has represented me: perhaps it would be the most effectual motive to your lordships compassion. My lords, I never in my life solicited a favour: I never desire to meet with compassion.

My lords, he has talked to your lordships of my patrons. I have had in my life, and very early in my life, the greatest of patrons; ay! with all their power, greater than any that now hear me. My lords, I renounced my patrons, because I would not renounce my principles; repeatedly, over and over again, of different descriptions, and in different situations. My lords, I am proud, because I am insulted; or else I certainly should not have held any of this language.

My lords, Mr. Attorney-General through a blameful carelessness has told you a story of a theological, polemical dispute between myself and a parishioner. I can easily conceive that he let himself fall into that mistake for the sake of drawing a smile from your lordships and the court upon the reverend gentleman. But in this, like the rest, my lords, there is not a syllable, not the smallest foundation of truth. I never had a theological, polemical dispute. My lords, I am free to acknowledge, that no theological disputes that ever I read, and I have endeavoured to read all that ever happened, none of them ever interested me in the manner that the present disputes do interest me. My lords, I never was made to be a martyr. I have opinions of my own; but I never intended to suffer for them at the stake.

My lords, he has endeavoured to insinuate that all that I wrote, and all that I said, was for the sake of a paradeful triumph over justice: and he has talked again and again of the mob. My lords, the mob have conferred no greater favours upon me than upon Mr. Attorney-General. I have been repeatedly followed by very numerous mobs in order to destroy me, single and alone, for a great length of way; not once, or twice, or three times, but four and five times; two or three thousand at my heels. I am sensible of the ridicule of the situation, even whilst I mention it. These are the only favours that I have ever received from the mob; these are the only favours that I have ever solicited; and I protest to your lordships I had much rather hear the mob hiss than halloo: for the latter would give me the head-ach, the first gives me no pain. My lord, I have heard of those who have expressed more wishes for popularity than ever I felt. I have heard it said, and I think it was in this court, that they 'would have popularity: but it should be that 'popularity which follows, not that which is sought after.' My lords, I am proud enough to despise them both. If popularity would offer itself to me, I would speedily take care to kick it away.

My lords, as for ambition, and bodies of men, and parties, and societies, there is nothing of it in the case. There is no body of men with whom I can think, that I know of. There is no body of men with whom I am connected. There is no man or men from whom I expect help, or assistance, assistance, or friendship, of any kind, beyond that which my principles of services may deserve from them individually. Private friendships I have, like other men; but they are very few: however, that is recompensed to me, for they are very worthy.

My lords, Mr. Attorney-General has said, that I represented imprisonment as no kind of inconvenience to me. As no kind of inconvenience, my lords, will not certainly be true; because the great luxury of my life is a very small but a very clean cottage: and though imprisonment will be so far inconvenient to me, the cause of it will make it not painful.

My lords, I find that not only I have a sort of understanding very different from that of Mr. Attorney-General, but my notions of law, and my notions of humanity, are equally different. My lords, between the time that I had last the honour of appearing before you and the present time, it happens very unfortunately for Mr. Attorney-General that he has proved, that not only my notions of law and decency, but my notions of propriety and humanity, are widely different from his: and I mention it, my lords, because it goes immediately to the doctrine now attempted to be established. Mr. Attorney-General has heard a person, as great as himself, between that time and this, justify the legality, the propriety, the humanity of the tomahawk and the scalping-knife. Between the last time I appeared here and this time, these have been the sort of king's troops justified, by a high officer of the law, to be employed, as legal, proper, mild, and humane.

My lords, Mr. Attorney-General has said, that I declared upon the trial that I had a certain employment which made it necessary for me to be confined as long as your lordships should or would confine me. That is not true. My lords, I did say that I had an employment, had something to do, that would confine me to my room longer than your lordships would confine me. I believe I said more---I neither intended when I said it to affront you, nor will attempt at this time to appease you.---I said longer than your lordships dare to confine me; those were the words: and I said it, because I did believe and do still believe that your lordships dare not wilfully do injustice. My lords, as for that certain employment, I did not say it was necessary. It is an employment of amusement merely; an employment that I meant to make public; but not for the sake of gain or praise. My lords, when first I began my life, I was encouraged to worthy and to virtuous actions by the temptation of praise: I have long since learned, my lords, to be able to do those actions which I think virtuous, in despite of shame.

My lords, Mr. Attorney-General has done what I have before heard attempted to be done with very great sorrow: he has attempted to reinstate the Star-Chamber. The fault he finds with it is only its rankness,---'before the prosecutions grew so rank in the Star-Chamber, and which rankness caused it to be abolished.'---I don't recollect the words of that act by which it was abolished; but I am sure that its rankness alone is not the reason given. If the gentleman would lend me his memory, I should then repeat that none of the powers, nor none like them (your lordships know better the words, I don't recollect the words) but nothing like them was ever to be put in use again in that or in any other court, as well as I can remember.

Mr. Attorney-General has talked of the personal conceit of Tutchin concerning authors. I thought myself, till a strong zeal made me act otherwise, as little likely to become an author as any of those gentlemen who hear me. I have never been a contractor with any news-papers; he knows I have not. If I desired the printer of the Public Advertiser to give me up always to justice, my lords, I cannot easily conceive how Mr. Attorney-General could find any thing to justify his oratory upon that subject. Is that a defiance of a court of justice? Is that flying in the face of the justice of the country? To be willing to abide its sentence; not to withdraw myself from its censure; not to wish even to avoid any enquiry into my conduct, is that to be that bold-faced audacious man that defies the justice of his country? My lords, if it is, I can only again deplore that a gentleman, who must have great understanding, and great talents and abilities, from the office which he holds, that the understanding of that gentleman should be so very different from mine.

My lords, I have already appeared in this situation often enough; and if I had, as he imagines I have, any luxury or pleasure in holding myself forth in public; if I had, it would long before this have been satisfied.---There are many other things which I might say to your lordships; but as I trust, and fully trust, that I shall still find a remedy, my lords, against the present decision, I shall forbear saying one syllable in extenuation of what the attorney-general has been pleased to charge me with; and leave your lordships to pronounce your judgment without the least consideration of me, without the smallest desire that you should abate a hair from what you think necessary for the justice of my country. I shall leave it entirely to your lordships discretion.

Mr. Justice Aston. John Horne, clerk, you stand convicted, upon an information filed against you by his majesty's attorney-general, of writing and publishing, and causing to be printed and published, a false, wicked, and seditious libel of and concerning his majesty's government and the employment of his troops. The libel has been openly read in court from the record; and, upon the report of his lordship who tried this information, it appears that, upon your own cross-examination of one of the witnesses, you gloried in the publication of it; that you avowed you did not desire to be screened; and that you avowed yourself the author of it. Since that indeed, in this court, you attempted to gloss over parts of this libel, and to confine its tendency to a possible private charge upon the king's troops, and not concerning his majesty's government; to treat that word to be indeterminate in its signification, and not to carry with it the construction which the information avows, and which the jury have found, of its concerning the king's government and the employment of those troops by his authority. You have said very truly that evidence is not to supply any defect in an information. There is no defect in the information: the information sets forth the libel at large; and the information charges that libel to be of and concerning his majesty's government, as I before-mentioned. Upon that the court has now decided agreeable to the finding of the jury; and no man can really mistake the malicious meaning and insinuation of it. It is a libel which contains a most audacious insult upon his majesty's administration and government, and the conduct of his loyal troops employed in America. It treats those disaffected and traitorous persons who have been in arms and in open rebellion against his majesty, as faithful subjects---faithful to the character of Englishmen: and it falsely and seditiously asserts, that for that reason only they were inhumanly murdered by his majesty's troops at Lexington and Concord. By this same libel subscriptions too are proposed and promoted for the families of those very rebels who fell in that cause, traitorously fighting against the troops of their lawful sovereign. This is the light in which this libel must appear to every man of a sound and impartial understanding; this is the plain and the unartificial sense of it. The contents of this libel have been too effectually scattered and dispersed by your means, as charged in the several counts of the information, and they have been inserted in divers and different newspapers. The contents are too well known, and I trust abhorred, to need any repetition from me, for the sake of observing farther upon their malice, sedition, and falsehood. The court have considered of the punishment fit to be inflicted upon you for this offence: and the sentence of the court is,---That you do pay a fine to the king of 200l. that you be imprisoned for the space of twelve months, and until that fine be paid; and that upon the determination of your imprisonment, you do find sureties for your good behaviour for three years, yourself in 400l. and two sureties in 200l. each.

Mr. Horne. My lord, I am not at all aware of what is meant by finding sureties for the good behaviour for three years. It is that part of the sentence that perhaps I shall find most difficulty to comply with, because I don't understand it. If I am not irregular in entreating your lordship to explain it to me---your lordships, I suppose, would chuse to have your sentences plainly understood, and I know not the nature of this suretyship.

Lord Mansfield. It is a common addition.

Mr. Horne. And it may be a common hardship.

Mr. Justice Aston. Not to repeat offences of this sort.

Mr. Horne. Of this sort?

Lord Mansfield. Any misdemeanour.

Mr. Justice Aston. Whatever shall be construed bad behaviour.

Mr. Horne. If your lordships would imprison me for these three years, I should be safer; because I can't foresee, but that the most meritorious action of my life may be construed to be of the same nature.

Lord Mansfield. You must be tried by a jury, by your country, and be convicted. You know it is a most constant addition. You know that yourself very well.---Where are the tipstaves?

No. I. Proceedings on the Case concerning the King's Prerogative in respect to the Education and Marriage of the Royal Family. Hilary Term, 4 Geo. I. 1717.

[The following case is chiefly taken from the Reports of lord Fortescue, who was a judge of the Common-Pleas at the time the opinion of all the judges was taken upon it. Fortesc. Rep. 401. The only addition, we make, to lord Fortescue's state of the arguments, is to supply a considerable deficiency in the copy of the written opinion given by the two dissenting judges. What we have introduced for this purpose is the opinion of the two dissenting judges at length, instead of the imperfect copy of it in lord Fortescue. This part is taken from a book intitled the Life of Judge Price.—In lord Fortescue's Report, the case is called 'The grand Opinion for the prerogative concerning the royal family.'

Since the case we now present to the reader, one part of the subject of it has undergone a parliamentary discussion, the occasion of which was the act passed in 1772, for better regulating the marriages of the royal family. 12 G. III. c. 11. The preamble to that act contains a declaration, that 'the kings of this realm have ever been intrusted with the care and approbation' of such marriages. The generality of this recital, together with the restraints introduced to guard the descendants of George the second from improper marriages, caused much debate in parliament, both on the ancient law and the policy of the new regulation concerning this important subject. In the house of lords two protests were signed against passing the act; and these will enable the reader to judge, what were the principal objections to it. See the History and State Papers in the Annual Register for 1772, and Almon's Parl. Deb. for the same year. Whilst the act was under consideration of the lords, they consulted the judges on the extent of the prerogative of the crown in respect to marriages of the royal family; who concurred in opinion, that the approbation of the marriages of the king's grand children belonged to his majesty, and also the approbation of the marriage of the presumptive heir of the crown, in whatever degree related to the king; but confessed, that they could not precisely ascertain, to what other branches of the royal family this prerogative extended. Besides the instances of the crown's interposition noticed in the following case, our late most distinguished commentator on the law of England refers to many others, which he arranges according to the degrees of relationship. 1 Blackst. Comment. 8th edit. 225. See also the case of the countess of Shrewsbury, ante page 108 of his volume.]

THE judges met on the 22d day of January in Hilary term in the fourth year of his late majesty king George, and in the year of our Lord 1717, at the right honourable the lord Parker's chambers in Serjeants-Inn in Fleet-street, he being then lord chief justice of England, (afterwards lord chancellor of Great Britain) in pursuance of the then lord chancellor Cowper's letter from the king.

The judges being met, the chancellor's letter was read, which was to signify the king's pleasure, that all his judges should meet, with all convenient speed, and give him their opinion upon the following question, viz.

'Whether the education, and the care of the persons of his majesty's grandchildren, now in England, and of prince Frederick, eldest son of his royal highness the prince of Wales, when his majesty shall think fit to cause him to come into England, and the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors, governesses and other instructors, attendants and servants, and the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, do belong of right to his majesty, as king of this realm or not.'

Soon after the judges were met, they had a message sent them, from his royal highness, George, then prince of Wales, now king of Great Britain, by his secretary Mr. Molinex, now deceased, and by his own solicitor-general, Mr. Carter, since sir Lawrence Carter, a baron of the Exchequer, to this effect: that his royal highness the prince of Wales, understanding that a question relating to his right of guardianship to his children was before them, desired, that before any determination was had upon it, they would give leave that he might be heard by his counsel concerning the same, and then the messengers withdrew.

After which the judges having consulted together about this message, agreed on this answer, viz.

We have considered of what you have been pleased to propose from his royal highness the prince of Wales, and we are all of opinion, that in cases wherein our advice is required by his majesty, we cannot hear counsel without his majesty's leave.

The same messengers being called in again, the said answer was given to them by the lord chief justice Parker in the name of all the judges.

Thereupon the judges agreed to acquaint the lord chancellor with this message, and with the answer, in order to acquaint the king.

Immediately after this, without loss of time, the judges entered on the consideration of the question referred to them.

Blencow justice. I don't see, my lords, but marriage takes in the whole question, but let us debate the whole matter minutely, and give our opinions seriatim.

Dormer justice, for the king. What is very material to this purpose, is, the marriage articles of Car. 1. then prince of Wales, with the infant of Spain, in the life-time of his father, king James I. under the great seal. One of those articles relates to the education of the issue of that marriage, which was, that the sons and daughters, born of that marriage, should be under the care, and brought up by the infant of Spain until the age of ten years. Thereupon the prince himself says, if they thought that term was not enough, that he would intercede with his father, the king, that the ten years of education with the infant might be lengthened to twelve years: and says further, 'and I promise, and freely, and of mine own accord swear, if it happen that the intire power of disposing this matter be devolved to me, I will approve of the said term of twelve years.' And these articles were sworn to by both king and prince. 1. Rushworth 86, 87.

Chief justice King, afterwards lord chancellor, quoted Rymer, 4 tom. fol. 605, 608. 8 Edw. 3. and fol. 620 and 624.

Lord Parker chief justice. The case of H. 3. is very material. The king's sister Joan was abroad, and with her own mother in France, and yet the king here in England made the match with Alexander king of Scotland. The king says, dabimus in uxorem, et nos & concilium nostrum fideliter laborabimus ad eam habendam. Rymer 1 tom. p. 240, 356. 4 H. 3. Anno 1220. Et si forte eam habere non poterimus, dabimus si in uxorem Isabellam junior sororem nostram. And many other strong expressions there are, as maritabimus et concessimus in uxorem; laborabimus per nos & amicos nostros. Rymer, vol. 1. 241, 407. Madox Tit. Aid 412. H. 3. had aid to marry his sister. 12 Co. Rep. 29, 30.

The king of Sweden was proposed to the lady Elizabeth, (afterwards queen Elizabeth) for marriage; but she refused, because it was not first communicated to her majesty the queen. Cotton's Records 326.

There is also the famous case of the countess of Shrewsbury, and she was sent to the Tower, and imprisoned there for a high misdemeanor and great contempt, in being privy to the flight of lady Arabella, who being of the blood royal, had married one Mr. Seymour without the consent of the king, and he was likewise imprisoned in the Tower for that marriage. Co. Rep. 12. p. 94.

In the case of the duke of York, being to be married to the duchess of Modena, there was an address of the house of commons to the king, that that he might not be married to that princess. The king's answer (which was remarkable) was, that the marriage was completed, and by his royal authority and consent. See lord Clarendon's History.

About December 1699, an address was moved for by the house of commons to the king, to remove the then bishop of Salisbury from being preceptor to the duke of Gloucester, and it passed in the negative, which shews the parliament thought the power to be in the crown.

Another instance is, the case of the earl of Marlborough. The king appointed him governor of the duke of Gloucester, as a mark of his qualifications for an employment of so great a trust, and as an instance of this prerogative.

So in the case of the marriage of the princess of Orange, it was made wholly by the king, against the father's consent.

In Rymer, tom. 8. 698. there is a power given by the king to certain lords to treat of a marriage of the king's son, the prince of Wales, with one of the daughters of John duke of Burgundy, and earl of Flanders.

Friday, Jan. 24, 1717, the judges met again at the same place, and thereupon the passage in Edw. 5. was read out of Kennet's History of England, viz. The queen continuing in the sanctuary with her son, the duke of York, the archbishop of Canterbury was sent by the duke of Gloucester, and other lords, to the queen, to persuade her to deliver up the duke of York, or else they were to take him away by force.

Here the prince of Wales's secretary, the said Mr. Molineux, attending the judges, with Mr. serjeant Reynolds the prince's counsel, sent in to the judges, and brought an order with them from the king in the following words :

The king having been informed, that his royal highness the prince of Wales desired to be heard by his counsel, his majesty's pleasure is, that any one single person that his royal highness shall think fit to appoint may apply to the judges, and shall be admitted to lay before them what he has to offer in behalf of his royal highness, in relation to the question before them. Upon this Mr. Molineux offered to come in, but he was refused to be admitted, because he was not within the order of his majesty ; but Mr. serjeant Reynolds, afterwards lord chief baron, was admitted as counsel for the prince of Wales, according to the king's leave, and argued as follows :

Reynolds serjeant at law, for the prince. My lords, I have orders from the prince of Wales to attend on a question relating to the guardianship of his children.

Whereupon the lord chief justice Parker informed him exactly what the true question was, which was read to him verbatim, though he confessed he knew what the question was before he came.

And then the serjeant went on thus. The guardianship of the children of right belongs to the father. 3 Co. 37. Ratcliff's case. 2 Roll's Abr. 40, 41, 42. The case of the father and grandfather is distinctly considered, and the custody appears to belong to the father, and not to the grandfather, and so is 30 Ed. 3. 17. a. and Vaughan 180. None can have the custody of the son and heir apparent but the father. Co. Litt. 84. a. In the case of younger children the argument is as strong against the grandfather, and so is 4 & 5 Ph. & M. cap. 8. Now why is the power here supposed to be in the grandfather, when 12 Car. 2. is positive that the power is in the father, and that the father can appoint a tutor and guardian, and the prince of Wales is within that act? 2 Roll's Abr. tit. Guardian, p. 37. Though the prince is but a subject, yet in dignity he is made much greater, and supposed in some cases to be almost equal with the king, as Seld. tit. Honour, 495. So that the reason should be stronger for the prince to have greater power than ordinary persons have. Now as to Bracton, who treats of this subject, that is transcribed from Justinian. Therefore that book and the instance there ought not to be regarded, for he deviates from the common law, and is nothing but civil law. Vide Selden's Dissertation on Fleta.

There is little to be found in Rymer concerning this matter, for there is no instance where there is a father and grandfather alive together, but one in the 8th vol. Rymer, p. 608. In H. 4th's time, grants were indeed made by the king for the maintenance of the earl of March in the custody of the prince of Wales. But there is nothing here can establish a prerogative in the crown. I have only looked over the first ten volumes of Rymer, and shall not trouble your lordships with history, as that of Ed. 5. in Kennet's History, where the queen said that she had advised with learned counsel, and they told her that she had the right of wardship to the duke of York.

There is no instance or case whatsoever in any law book or record, in the case of the crown, or indeed any where else, that the custody belongs to the grandfather, nor was ever claimed or pretended to by the grandfather.

As to marriage, every man may marry his daughter where he pleases. The ancient feudal law did extend pretty far as to marriages. Britt. cap. 67, 68. p. 168. b. So is Co. Litt. 140., and never denied but only in the case of a widow holding of the crown, who cannot marry without leave of the crown. Mag. Cha. cap. 7. 2 Inst. 18. 6 H. 6. Cotton's Records.

Marriage always belongs to the father, and the prince of Wales here would be intitled to aid pur file marrier. It is true the statute of 28 H. 8. cap. 18. makes it high treason to marry any of the royal family ; but then this shews it was lawful before this act, because restrained by act of parliament, and now that act is repealed.

Rymer, vol. 4. 605, 608. which was in 8 Ed. 3. several procuratorial letters quantum in nobis were granted to the archbishop of Canterbury to marry, and in page 620. are procuratorial letters, in the case of Edmund earl of Cornwall, quantum in nobis to be married. Sandford 216.

There is one instance indeed in Rymer of the marriage of a daughter in the life-time of the father, who was the king's sister, which is in vol. 1. Rymer 407. and in 26 H. 3. de matrimonio contrahendo, &c. promittimus & modis quibus poterimus laborabimus per nos & per amicos nostros. But this shews it was not done by the prerogative alone, and indeed there is nothing to support any notion of that nature. As to the case in Rush- worth, page 87, 88. concerning the oath and marriage articles there mentioned, they were allowed to be contrary to the known laws of England, and the treaty therefore confirmed by parliament.

The prince's counsel, serjeant Reynolds, having ended his argument, withdrew : and then the Lord chief justice Parker went on with the case of Ed. 5. The queen being in the sanctuary says, my son, as my learned counsel tell me, is my ward, because he hath no lands by descent holden by knights service, but only by socage, and therefore to me by law the guardianship of my son does belong. Kennet's History 490. Then

The story in Ed. 3. was read, to shew Richard the second, then prince of Wales, and son of the late Black Prince, was in the custody of his mother, for he was at Lambeth with his mother, which is nothing to the purpose. But what brother Reynolds says about the statute 12 Car. 2. it is neither law nor reason, nor is, or can the prince of Wales be within that act of parliament.

As to the authority of Bracton, to be sure many things are now altered ; but there is no colour to say it was not law at that time, for there are many things that have never been altered and are law now. And as to what is said as to the articles and oath quoted out of Rushworth, their being against law, that is only gratis dictum ; for whether it was a fair treaty or no, is not the question, for this matter was only between the king and the prince.

Price baron. There is such an oath on the occasion of the said marriage as has been mentioned ; but I do not know whether it has not been protested against. We must trust to collectors for these articles. The articles of marriage of Car. 1. with Henrietta Maria, are in Rymer, vol. 17. 673, 676. one of the articles much like what was mentioned before, which was, that she was to have the nurture of her children till 13 years old, these articles were agreed on in king James's time, 12 Rymer 658. The prince's counsel seemed to agree, that marriage and education go together.

King chief justice of the Common-Pleas, afterwards lord chancellor. In the bill of precedency it fully appears, that the king's grandchildren are children. In the case of children of the royal family sent beyond sea, the king's grandchildren are within that law. So prayers for the king and his royal family, includes all his grandchildren, though the king had no son living.

Chief justice Parker. The law of God and law of nature are rather with the grandfather, and the succession cannot be altered, for that every man has a right in the royal family.

Eyre justice. It is the constant custom for all the king's servants to ask the king's leave to marry. Rymer, vol. 16. p. 710.

Price baron. There is no judicial determination, nor any case that comes up to this. The question here is, whether this power be in the king, exclusive of the prince? If there be an ill king upon the throne, it may be very mischievous.

King chief justice. The question is, whether the king's grandchildren can marry without the king's leave ; for the father cannot compel them. It is impossible this question ever should come into Westminster-Hall to be determined there, and therefore to say there is no legal determination, is to say nothing to the purpose. This is in its nature so great a trust that it cannot by the constitution be lodged any where but in the crown.

Parker chief justice. There is no law against any one for marrying without the father's consent ; but the crime is to marry any of the royal family without the king's consent. The king's consent was always held necessary, in the case of marriage of any of the royal family, always used and never contested. Were it otherwise it would be setting up two independent powers, and is a trust too big for any subject.

The case of the princess of Orange's marriage, and that of the princess Anne of Denmark, are great instances of the power and prerogative of the crown. These matches were publicly declared by the king himself, and against the consent of the father.

Montague baron quoted Stair's Institutions of the Laws of Scotland, fol. 38. which agrees with Bracton, lib. 1. cap. 9. exactly, and with Fleta, lib. 1. cap. 6.

Eyre justice quoted Cowell's Inst. tit. 9. p. 14. de patria potestate ; then he said that Edward the Black Prince disposed of the governance of his son Richard of Burdeux, afterwards Richard 2. to Simon Burleigh made his tutor at Burdeux. Hollingshead 414.

And in the case of the countess of Shrewsbury no offence was declared. Hob. 235. Dugdale's Baronage.

Dormer justice quoted Rushworth's Collect. 1st part. 168. Eachard 974. Bacon of Government, fol. 14. And in lord Clarendon's History, Baby Charles is said to be the child of the kingdom.

Then the judges proceeded to give their opinions seriatim, beginning from the junior, which was baron Fortescue Aland, who had been solicitor-general to the then prince of Wales, one of the first officers in his service, as follows.

Fortescue Aland baron. My lords, this is a question of great importance to the whole kingdom, and I am content for the better discussing it to divide it into two parts ; because it has been so done by some of my brothers, though I should have thought that if the king has the marriage of his grandchildren, of necessary consequence he had their education too.

I will then consider first, whether the king has the care and approbation of the marriage of prince Frederick, and his other grandchildren ; and whether of right it belongs to his majesty, as king of this realm, or not.

This subject, touching the power of a grandfather, may be treated of, either as a public or a private right. It has been treated of pretty much as a private right by the two judges that differ, and by the counsel for the prince of Wales, which I think is an error, in the foundation of their argument ; for it ought manifestly to be treated as jus publicum, such a right as our law books express it to be, quod ad statum reipublice spectat, and that makes it the king's prerogative, and that is the king's inheritance, as king of this realm ; which is too great a point to be governed governed by the narrow rules of private property. Now to treat this otherwise, I think, is injurious to the prince himself and all his children. Our law books say he is esteemed as one nearest to the king. So it has been determined in full parliament, in the case of the prince of Wales in H. 6th's time; and in his patent, which was made by authority of parliament in 33 H. 6. the introduction of the patent is, ut ipsum, qui reputationis juris censetur eadem persona nobiscum, digno preveniamus honore, &c. so that in the eye of the law, they are to be reckoned but as one person.

It is for the same reason that an act of parliament which relates to the prince, is a public law, of which every body is to take notice, because whatever concerns the prince, concerns the king, and whatever concerns the king concerns every subject in England; and therefore the act that relates to the duchy of Cornwall has been held to be a public law. Now let us see what is said in my lord Coke's 8 Rep. called the Prince's Case. Speaking of the prince, 'tis said, coruscet radiis regis patris, & censetur una persona cum ipso rege. So says lord Hobart, who was the prince's chancellor, Hob. Rep. p. 226.

'Tis for the same reason, that it was high treason, by the common law of England (before any statute) to compass and imagine the death of the king's eldest son and heir, who is generally made prince of Wales, though now born duke of Cornwall (but is not so of a collateral heir to the crown); and this offence is called crimen læsæ majestatis, a crime that hurts the majesty of the king himself. It follows then that as they are but one person in law, so in point of law they are supposed to have but one will in relation to the education, marriage, and management of the grandchildren; and the prince of Wales in point of law is supposed in every thing to concur with his majesty; which quite subverts and destroys the distinction in common persons of grandfather, father and son. Now the king as he is parens patriæ, he is also parens nepotum, parent of his grandchildren, as lord Coke himself expounds the king's nephew to signify his grandson, also from the Latin nepos, which signifies both. So in the case of a queen consort, she is the first wife in the kingdom, Queen in the Saxon language signifying wife. And therefore by reason of excellence it was the name for the king's wife, who consider her in her private capacity, as the private wife of a common subject, she cannot sue or be sued by herself, nor can grant to or from (a) her husband; but then consider her in her public character and capacity, as a queen, she can sue and be sued by herself, and make grants to and from the king her husband, by her prerogative; and antiently she had a great many. Now I think in this case much may be argued from the names and appellations of the children of the royal family.

In history they are called the children of England, and all of them born princes and princesses of England, before they had any title, and all of them kings and queens in potentia, and may one day reign over us. Selden calls them heirs apparent of England, and they are called so in the parliament rolls. This agrees with the most early times in our kingdom, for till H. the first's time they were distinguished from all other persons, by calling both the eldest and the rest of the king's sons Clito and Clitones, and they had no other titles. Now Clito is a Latin word which comes from the Greek word κλυτος, which signifies Inclytus, most noble and famous. So the word Etheling, as Edgar Etheling, who was not the king's son, but his great nephew, from the Saxon word Ethel, nobilis; which shews that all the royal family were called by the same name as the king's sons, and so sets out the admirable union of the royal family. Selden's Tit. Hon. 498, 499.

The first son of the king is called prince of England, before any creation. And so it is in Scotland. Before the Union he was called prince of Scotland. And so says Mr. Selden it is in other nations. As in France, the duke of Orleans, regent of France, was called Petit Fitz de France, grandson of France, not grandson to the king. So Henrietta Maria, in the marriage articles with Charles the first, was called Fille de France, daughter of France, and not daughter of the king. Rymer 17. tom. p. 674. Selden's Titles of Honour 493, &c.

Having then made it appear, I think clearly, that all the children and grandchildren of the royal family are public persons, and princes of the nation, and the prince of Wales himself one and the same person with the king; it follows manifestly, as a just corollary and consequence, that the king, who has the executive power in him, is to have the care and command in the marriages of these children, for the good of the whole nation. It is part of that original trust, which, by the constitution of our government, is reposed in the king, for the security of his people.

And as this is a prerogative vested in the crown, in the reason of the law, and nature of a monarchy; so in all ages the crown has practised, and been in possession of this right.

Now in the point of marriages there are precedents from the time of H. 3. down to this time.

In 28 H. 6. it was one of the articles of impeachment of high treason against the duke of Suffolk, for attempting only to marry his son to Margaret the daughter and heir of the duke of Somerset, who had a right to the crown, after the death of the king without issue, although she was not heir apparent, for there was a prince of Wales then living. Cotton 42, 643.

When he came to his trial he did not deny but it was an offence, but insisted it was not true, for that some of the lords then present knew, that he intended to marry his son to the earl of Warwick's daughter.

And this is still the stronger, because this lady was in ward to him, and so he had a private right in her marriage.

By an act of parliament of 28 H. 8. it is made high treason to marry any of the royal family. It is thereby enacted, that if any person presume to marry any one of the king's children lawfully born, or otherwise, or commonly reputed or taken for his children or grandchildren, without the special leave of the king, he shall be adjudged a traitor to the king and the realm; and thereby it is made high treason in the lady too, against the king and realm; which shews plainly, the whole kingdom is concerned.

And though this act is now repealed in a crowd with other acts, to bring all treasons to the standard of 25 Edw. III. yet it is impossible the parliament should make that high treason that was no crime at all before, and especially high treason in his own children, nay when it was lawful before to marry any person of the royal family, (if the doctrine we are taught be true) and each had a private right to marry as they pleased. And it is observable here, the parliament makes no difference whether the father be living or not, nor takes any care of that paternal right which is pretended.

In queen Mary's time, though this offence ceased to be high treason, yet it did not cease to be a crime: for in the year 1558, the king of Sweden sent a message secretly to the lady Elizabeth, the queen's half sister only, afterwards queen Elizabeth, who was then at Hatfield, to propose marriage to her; but she rejected it with warmth, for this reason, because the proposal came not to her by the queen's direction. And upon an excuse made by the king of Sweden, that he first made love as a gentleman of quality to gain her consent, and then he would, as a king, address himself to the queen in proper form; her answer was, she was to entertain no such propositions, unless the queen sent them to her. Upon this the queen sent sir Thomas Pope to the lady Elizabeth, to let her know she well approved of the answer she had made; and the lady Elizabeth further declared, she would never see the messenger more, because he had presumed to come to her without the queen's leave. Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. 2. 361.

So that here is one foreign king and two queens of England concurring in the same sentiment; which seems strongly to argue it is the law of nations, as well as the prerogative of this crown.

The next instance I shall mention, is the case of lady Arabella, and a law book to support it, and that is the countess of Shrewsbury's case, 12 Co. 94. in the tenth year of king James the first. The countess of Shrewsbury was then in prison, and sent for before the council to answer to a contempt of dangerous consequence, because she refused to answer, when examined about lady Arabella's flight, for marrying Mr. Seymour, she being of the royal family: and there the attorney and solicitor-general of the king charge it as a crime, that lady Arabella being of the blood royal, had married Mr. Seymour, second son of the earl of Hertford, without the king's privity and consent. Now it appears Seymour was committed to the Tower for this offence, but escaped; and that lady Arabella was also committed, and she escaped, and was taken flying beyond sea, before she got over.

The first crime charged upon the countess, was her abetting the flight of lady Arabella her niece, and the immediate crime was her not answering in that case. Now, if marrying without the king's leave was no crime, she could never have been accused, for not answering to her abetting the flight for such marriage; so that the marrying without leave was plainly charged as a crime. They both were committed for a crime, and they both fled as for a crime, and it is admitted and taken for granted to be a crime; and her contempt in not answering, in the case of marriage in the royal family, resolved to be a crime: and this was done by all the great ministers of state, and by the chancellor, and two chief justices, Fleming and lord Coke, and chancellor of the Exchequer and duchy, and chief baron, in the fifteenth year of king James the first; and in the end she was fined 10,000 l. and committed to the Tower.

The next case I shall mention is the marriage of the princess of Modena and the duke of York. There was an address of the house of commons to the king, to prevent this marriage. The king's answer is very remarkable. 'It is completed,' says the king, 'but it was with my consent and authority;' and the parliament acquiesced in that answer.

Now this address was absurd, if the king had no power to prevent it; so that this amounts to the judgment and opinion of the king and parliament, that this right was in the crown, exclusive of his brother. So here is the king claiming this authority, even against his own brother, and his private right, and the parliament confirming it.

Then there is the marriage of the princess Mary, daughter of the duke of York, with the prince of Orange. This match was made intirely by the king's consent, even without the knowledge of the duke her father, and against his liking and consent. The king, speaking to sir William Temple about this match, says, 'If I am not deceived, the prince of Orange is the honestest man in the world, and I will trust him; therefore he shall have his wife, and you shall go and tell my brother so, and that it is a thing I am resolved on.' The duke was chagrined a little, but said, 'the king shall be obeyed.' See sir William Temple's Memoirs.

Here is a father acknowledging the right to be in the king, to marry his own daughter, who was only a collateral relation to the king, and married against the father's will, as every one knows.

In 1683, the match with the princess Ann, the other daughter of the duke of York, was made by the king, in the same manner. And both these marriages were established by a public declaration of his majesty to the whole nation.

And thus I beg leave to conclude the instances of marriage; but with this remark: that happy it is for this nation, that the king in the two last instances had this prerogative; for had this pretended paternal right then prevailed, the English nation had been for ever undone, and our religion destroyed, and we had never seen the many and great blessings we enjoy, and are likely to enjoy by this family sitting on the throne of Great Britain.

Thus the nation sees the trace of this happy prerogative, from Henry the third's time to this very day, being the compass of almost 500 years, uninterrupted, undisputed, and not one single instance to the contrary.

These instances concerning marriages of the royal family being so numerous, and the light so glaring, from histories, records, public acts, statutes, and law books, the two judges, who differ, could not resist this part of the question; but have retired to the other part, that of the education, though I hope to prove that if the king has the marriage, he must have the education too.

The reason that my lord Coke gives, why the queen dowager cannot marry without the king's leave is, ne capitalibus inimicis regis maritentur. Now the reason for the king's having the wardship of his grandchildren, and education too, is stronger, viz. lest the heir of the crown himself be led aside by ill principles, and bad politics, and become himself an enemy to the constitution, and to the kingdom. Marriage is one of the main ends of the education, and that education is a principal qualification for that marriage, and therefore can never be so properly placed as with him who has the marriage. Vide 6 H. 6. 2 Inst. p. 18.

Besides, these two powers, if placed in different persons, may clash, and be repugnant; for which of them is to determine when the marriage is to begin, and to whom, and when the education is to end.

Again: if the king has the marriage, he has the appointment of the time of that marriage, and consequently he can at any time appoint it; and he that can at any time appoint the marriage, can at any time call for the custody of that person; and he that can at any time demand the person out of custody of another, has the intire power over that person.

Again: it is a true and regular argument, and conclusive to say, that whoever has the end, must have the means also, otherwise he cannot be said to have the end.

If I have the marriage of any person, I can never be sure of that, unless I have the custody and education of that person. But his majesty's prerogative, in this part of the question relating to the education, is as clearly to be made out, though not by so many instances as the case of marriage.

When prince Charles had by surprize got leave of his father to make a journey to Spain, to fetch home his mistress the infanta; revolving in his mind the hazard of that expedition and the ill influence it might have on the people, king James then declared that the prince was looked upon by his people as the son of his kingdom. Clarendon's History, p. 14. And this being related by him, carries with it his authority too, who was a very great lawyer, and chancellor of the realm.

The law books of Bracton and Flota, which have been quoted, are the antient law of the land extending to all cases; but this law being altered only in private cases by usage and statute, it remains law to this day, as to the royal family; because as to them this law has had no alteration by any law or statute whatever, and the usage has gone accordingly.

These law books are so strong, that there has been no way thought of to evade them, but by denying the authority of them, and calling it civil law. But I own I am not a little surprized that these books should be denied for law, when in my little experience I have known them quoted, almost in every argument where pains have been taken if any thing could be found in those books to the question in hand; and I have never known them denied for law, but when some statute or usage time out of mind has altered them. We have been told indeed that they were quoted in the case of ship-money; but I believe that objection would not have been made, if they had been aware, that these very books were quoted on both sides the question: which destroys the objection, and shews they were approved of by all who argued in that case, both of one side and the other.

But if it be meant civil law, because it is in force in all civilized nations, I believe that is true; for I take this to be the prerogative of all kings: nor has there been any instance given in any monarchy, where the law is otherwise.

Mr. Selden says the king of England is an emperor, and this realm an empire, and so called in statutes and records without number; and if so, he will have this prerogative equal with other kings and emperors, if no statute, law, or usage says the contrary.

If the prerogative then be the law of nations, that is part of the law of the land, and will give the king a clear title to it.

See the statute of precedency which is 32 H. 8. cap. 10. It enacts, that no person presume to sit at any side of the cloth of state (except the king's children). Then when it goes on to place the great officers of state, it says, that being barons they shall be placed on the left side of the parliament chamber, above all dukes, except the king's son, the king's brother, the king's uncle, the king's nephew, i. e. his grandson, or the king's brother's or sister's son.

Now this shews that the king's son, and the king's nephew or grandson, is comprehended under the term, king's children, because the latter is substituted in the place of the former.

17 Edw. 3. archbishop of Canterbury came into parliament and demanded, si les enfans nostre sen. le roy, born beyond sea, should inherit in England, because born out of the king's dominions, and aliens; and all the parliament agreed, let them be born where they would, they should inherit. Cotton 38. It would be a jest to imagine that the king's grandchild was not within that law, and within the words les enfans children: and there is the same reason in this case.

Another reason is, that the king's grandson is higher in dignity, because nearer the crown, than any other of the king's sons, except his own father, therefore ought to be esteemed equal with his own sons: and therefore if prince Frederick were here, and the king had other sons besides the prince, he would take place of all those, as Richard of Burdeaux did, when his grandfather placed him at a public table, above all his own children who were his uncles. Speed 723.

Pursuant to this notion, grandchildren of the crown are stiled children in records.

There is 50 Edw. 3. Richard prince of Wales, his writ of summons to parliament is directed thus: rex Edwardus charissimo filio suo Ricardo principi Wallie. Cotton 143.

So is 51 Edw. 3. This prince Richard holds a parliament, by commission from his grandfather, and that runs in the same manner: de circumspiciendis & industriis magnitudine charissimi filii nostri Ricardi principis Wallie. Pat. Rol. 51 Edw. 3. m. 41.

Now, I think education is of greater consequence than marriage, both to the person and to the people of England. To the person, because if he be bred either in the Popish religion, or is trained up in any other communion, though Protestant, except the church of England, he is not capable of reigning; and if bred up in arbitrary principles, inconsistent with a limited monarchy, the whole nation will then be in danger: whereas an ill chosen match will only be the most uneasy to the prince that marries, and will little affect the state, so long as the prince is steady, and adheres to the constitution.

Where is a prince to be educated, who is to be bred up a king, but in the palace and court of a king, and under his special care and influence?

The learned sir John Fortescue, called by sir Walter Rawleigh the bulwark of the law of England, who was chief justice and chancellor, and also tutor to the prince of Wales in H. 6th's time, in his Treatise De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, which consists of dialogues between him and the prince about his education, says, that there were two things that a prince, who is like to be heir to the crown, ought principally to be instructed in; that is, martial discipline, and the laws and constitution of England: and where are those to be had but in the king's armies, and among the great officers and ministers of the king?

The same sir John Fortescue says, speaking of the king's wards in knights service, the princes of the realm also holding of the king, must be well educated, since these orphans in their childhood are brought up in the king's house; therefore I cannot but greatly commend the riches and magnificence of the king's court, because it is the supreme school for the nobility of the land, whereby the realm flourishes and is preserved: ca. 45. p. 107.

There is a patent in the 13th of Edw. 4. from the king to the bishop of Rochester, whereby he was constituted tutor to the prince, and president of the prince's council, which is very remarkable. In the preamble it says, Howbeit every child in his youngage ought to be brought up in virtue and knowledge; yet nevertheless such persons as God has called to the pre-eminent state of princes, and to succeed their progenitors in the state of regality, ought more singularly to be informed and instructed in knowledge and virtue. We therefore, desiring our dearest son the prince, perfectly, knowingly and virtuously to be educated in his youth, and wholly trusting in the truth, wit, knowledge and virtue, and also love and affection that our reverend father hath to us and to our issue, we have committed and deputed him to teach and inform our said son, and also appointed him president of his council, giving him power to assemble all the counsellors of our said son.

Now, what I would observe from this patent is, in the first place, that it shews the great regard that is to be had to all the prince's or king's children, all who are like to succeed to the crown, that they above all others ought most singularly to be educated, and makes no distinction in the education between the first or any other of the princes of the royal blood, and the education to be perfect in knowledge and virtue.

In the next place, it shews the qualifications of such tutors, and who is to choose them.

This does not invade the paternal right, but is consistent with it. It is very possible that a grandson may obey both father and grandfather, nor can it be supposed that the father and grandfather will give contradictory commands without breach of duty in the son: but it ought to be presumed by all reasonable men, that they will both concur in material parts of the education, both for the good of their child and for the safety of the kingdom; so that in this concurs the law of God as well as man: for I believe nobody never yet doubted but a grandson was within the fifth commandment; and in obedience to that law, the patriarchs always conformed themselves. But these sticklers for paternal right seem to have forgot the right of the mother, which by the fifth commandment is as well established as the right of the father; and some civilians give a superiority to the mother, at least by the law of nature: and I believe that nobody ever thought that giving this power to the father excluded the right of the mother: nor can the supposition that the mother should contradict the command of the father, any more destroy the superiority of the husband in the one case, than the same groundless supposition in the son, destroy the right of the father in the other case.

But to suppose for once an unreasonable thing, and what will never happen, that there should be contradictory commands, the public good must be preferred, and duty to parents must be always subject to the safety of the whole community; and the king, who is parens patriæ, as well as parens nepotis, must be obeyed; to whom there is a double obligation, by nature and by allegiance, i. e. by the law of God and law of man.

As to what was said by brother Reynolds, the prince's counsel, in relation to the statute of 12 Car. 2. cap. 24. that the prince was within that act of parliament, I deny it to be law, or any thing like it: for then it would be in the power of the prince to grant or appoint by deed or will the guardianship, custody or tuition of his son to the king of France, the Turk, or any person whatever; which would be in effect to give him a power of disposing of the crown. And by this learned doctrine, the royal family might be dispersed all over Europe; and this nominee would be intitled to take the profits of all the lands of such heir to the crown, and the management of all his estate.

What was said by my brother Eyre, as to the Black Prince's disposing of his son's governance, that was a case of absolute necessity, and in the absence of the king in foreign parts, for he was then on his journey to the Holy Land. Vide Acta Regia.

Montague baron. I do not know that I ever was or could be of any other opinion than for the king in this case. What gave me the first impression was the government and discipline among the patriarchs, who educated and governed all the grandchildren and great-grandchildren under them.

In the patent for the sole making of cards, the king is called parens patriæ, et custos regni, et pater-familias totius regni.

I insist on Bracton and Flota being good authorities. It is objected, indeed, this is civil law. That may be, and yet it may be and is the law of the land also; and these books take notice of several things that are law now, besides this case. These books are often quoted by the greatest judges and lawyers heretofore in England, and allowed as law. The lord chief justice Holt in the case of Coggs and Bernard, Trin. 2 Anne which was (a very fine case) in the King's Bench, grounded himself on Bracton in giving the opinion of the court. There is too but one family and the prayers of the church are formed accordingly; and it would make great confusion if the prince of Wales should differ from his majesty. On great reason then, is this prerogative founded; because the royal family should not be of any other religion whatsoever than that of the church of England: and not only that, they should not be Papists. If you secure the crown, the king must have the education, and so the children of the crown will be bred up accordingly; and children do include grandchildren, no doubt. Now the law of purveyance was for all the royal family, not confined to children, but extends to grandchildren.

As to the case of Edward 5. there may be some satire in it, but no argument, so as to bind us to take notice of what was said only in the sanctuary by the queen. And as to what was said about the governance of Richard, son of the Black Prince, he was abroad then, as has been observed.

Pratt justice, afterwards chief justice of England. The case of marriage in the royal family is an undoubted prerogative of the crown, proved by all the arguments the nature of the thing is capable of; constantly claimed, always enjoyed, and constantly submitted to; and when done and acted contrary, it was always taken to be a great offence, and some time thought high treason. And that the crown has been in possession of this prerogative, appears by the many instances out of Rymer, where it appears the crown granted proxies for that purpose very often.

The counts of Shrewsbury's case in 12 Co. Rep. p. 94. is strong, though it did not proceed to judgment, nor pretended to be said, nor was it said to be no offence. The case of the duke of Suffolk's attempt only was thought to be high treason: from thence it may be inferred it was a very great offence. Then there is the opinion of the parliament in 28 H. 8. 18. and no instance is or can be given to the contrary. The case of the prince of Orange is very material: the king made the match, and the duke of York, her father, was against it. But it was said the prince of Modena desired the king to prevent it: but what was the king's answer? His answer was, it is too late, it was by my consent. Here is the claim of prerogative, against the opinion and consent of the father. So much as to the point of marriage.

Now as to the education of the children and grandchildren of the royal family, that is a natural and necessary consequence, that if the crown has the marriage of the royal family, it hath the care of their education. If not educated well, they cannot be married well. The king having the end should have the means; he should take care of their persons, that they should not be disposed of to the prejudice of the nation, for it cannot be undone afterwards. I do not see any answer given to that case in Rushworth, about the infant of Spain. The son might in fact have contracted as well as the father, though perhaps wrong; yet he does not any way contradict the power of his father. And this carries authority of parliament with it. I am of opinion this prerogative was never disputed by any of the royal family, and many have been prosecuted for the breach of it; and indeed we never can have any instances in this affair, but when there is discord in the royal family. Great inconveniences attend the contrary. How great distractions and confusions attended the differences between the houses of York and LANCASTER, when one of the family was at home, and the other abroad!

Eyre justice, and the prince of Wales's chancellor. I am of a contrary opinion to my brothers that spoke last. The question is, whether the king has a legal right to dispose of the marriage and education of his grandchildren, exclusive of the father? The inconveniences are above me to expatiate upon; but if any thing be amiss, the legislature will set it right. No authority has been produced out of any of our law books, no guardianship by the prerogative has yet been proved. The lord chief justice Coke says nothing of this prerogative: he would tell us surely when these prerogatives began, and where they ended. As to Bracton and Fleta, what is quoted out of them is not law, nor accounted so. There is no such term in our law, as emancipatio or forisfamiliatio: Dr. Cowell restrains it to the father's dying. Cowell's Inst. tit. 9. Grandchildren may be children, but that argues nothing as to wardship; but whether the practice in the crown, as to this prerogative, be otherwise, is the question. It doth not appear in any of these custodies, whether it was in the life of the father or not; and there is reason to think it must be by reason of some tenure. As to the case of the duke of Gloucester, that does not appear to us, but it was by consent. A motion was made in parliament, to remove him from his preceptor, and it passed in the negative. To be sure, the public has an interest in all the king's children. The parliament sometimes interposes in the case of proclaiming peace and war, and yet the king has that right. So the king has interposed in these cases; but it cannot be inferred from thence it is a right. And give me leave to say, the crown has not always been in possession of this prerogative; for Edward the Black Prince came over and returned to Berkhamstead till the death of the grandfather, Hollingbush: and it is material that he had the governance and education of his son Richard. In the case of Edw. 5. it was not pretended, nor thought of, that the king had this right. The queen's insisting, and being in possession, is an instance against the usage. They did not insist on any law to take the duke of York out of her hands. The prince is the guardian to his son by nature and by law; and no law book makes any other distinction. Inconveniences are not what is left to my consideration, and the usage is on our side the question.

As to marriages of the royal family, they are of a public consideration. Alliances and treaties depend upon them. The crown has always interposed in these. So in private families the grandfather has interposed sometimes.

As to the case of the duke of York's children, though those marriages might be without the actual agreement of the duke, yet it does not appear that it was against his consent; so is no instance at all: and indeed there is no instance appears that they have been disposed of against the consent of the father.

As to that case of the duke of Suffolk's being impeached of high treason, can any one say it was high-treason? In the case of lady Arabella, there was no such declaration there: it was a contempt indeed, but not said so by the judges. There may be instances of high treason concerning those marriages in former ages, but there is no law case, or law book, or statute, that now declares the king has this prerogative; therefore I cannot be convinced that the king has any legal right to it.

Dormer justice. I am of a contrary opinion to my brother Eyre, and that the king has a legal right to this prerogative. The king is pater patriæ, and his grandchildren are the children of the kingdom, and of the public. And I think the king that has the marriage has the care of education also. The duke of Norfolk at his trial confessed it was a great contempt in him, to attempt to marry the queen of Scots. So in the case of the king of Sweden, queen Elizabeth would not hear of it, nor see the person who was to propose the match to her, without the queen's leave, though sui juris. The father has not the disposition of his eldest son in the case of the royal family. In the case of the duke of Gloucester this right was taken for granted. As to the case of Edward 5. what the queen said there in the sanctuary, that argues nothing; and she did deliver him up at last. It is said, here is no particular case. If no particular law book in the case, yet there are many notorious facts, records and instances out of Rushworth and other books, which amount to usage with such a constancy, as makes it law, and gives this prerogative to the king.

Price baron. This is a case of great consequence, so that I am in great perplexity. Not that I am afraid to give my opinion, but I cannot come into the opinion which most of my brothers have given. The question is, whether the king has this prerogative, exclusive of the prince his son? The father hath the guardianship against the grandfather. So is Roll's Abridgment, and 30 Edw. 3. and Littleton, sect. 114. Prescription to the marriage of the tenant's son against the father, was against the law of nature. Vaughan's Reports on 12 Car. 2. is strong. The father is guardian by nature, Dyer 190. It's against any law whatsoever, between subject and subject. It is very plain and clear the prince is a subject, and the prince held by tenure at first, and that tenure is taken away by the act of 12 Car. 2. But this they say does not bind the king's prerogative. And why so? The court of wards and liveries were once his prerogative, but not so now. I wish there is nothing in the belly of this question, to get something after it: they must have distinct settlements, if you set the grandson above the father: dependance creates duty. It was an article of impeachment, to endeavour to introduce the civil law. Bracton and Fleta are old civil law books. They may fetch out of these books, ship-money, and dispensing power: they were all fetched out of these old books. As to Rymer, he is answered by this: either the king had the right of wardship in those cases, or he interposed out of care to the royal family. The nobility themselves did sometimes maintain and portion their relations abroad. To call all bounties, rights, is very hard. As to the case of H. 6. not to marry a queen, without the king's consent, they would not make that law if they had a law before. Owen Tudor married the widow of H. 6. That was the reason of that law; and when repealed, that shewed it to be unreasonable. Nobody can shew any legal prosecution for these things. As to the articles of marriage of Car. 1. I can hardly think the king would make such an oath, I have such an opinion of his piety; for those articles are void; and it is no wonder that kings will not treat but with kings. That case of the prince of Orange was with consent, there being an agreement between the two brothers. That of the duke of Gloucester was also by agreement, for who would deny the king? All these are no more than concessions or agreements. We have a legislature which will interpose, if there be any mismanagement in the prince. I will suppose for once, the prince could be a Papist or an Atheist: the parliament would interpose in such a case. It is with great anxiety I speak in this case.

Tracy justice. I differ from my brother that spoke last. This power is part of the original trust reposed in the king. We owe the blessings of this government to a marriage made against the consent of the father. Here are all sorts of proofs, from Henry the third's time to this very time, of marriages in the royal family; the expressions are not only laborabimus, but dabimus et concessimus. The case of the prince of Orange is a strong case. The king made that match by his own authority: no notice taken of the father, who was forced to submit to it. So that of queen Elizabeth is very strong when sui juris; no need to compliment in such case. That case of lady Arabella is very material. She was committed to the Tower and charged with this crime, and ran away, and escaped with hazard from this crime. If it were not criminal, there could not be all that solemn examination by two chief justices and a chief baron, and other ministers of state. The parliament also has affirmed this power. The statute 28 H. 8. is a strong argument that the parliament thought it to be unlawful, when it was once made high treason. That address in the duke of York's case to stop the marriage with the prince of Modena is very material; and, in short, I think this power in the crown has been proved very well. And this I would observe, does not exclude the father's advice and counsel. Now if this be so in the case of marriages in the royal family, it is a great argument it is so as to education. Suppose the duke of York had brought up those two princesses Papists, we should have been all undone, and lost our religion. Nothing can be of greater concern than the care of education. To be deprived of education is of much more consequence than marriage: the law must then of necessity be the same in both. We cannot expect like instances in education as in marriage, because these are transacted with other persons, with princes, and of the greatest quality abroad, and beyond sea, and are to be made public; but directions about education are of a private nature, and not likely to be transmitted beyond sea. Of latter times we have them in Spanish matches, as in the articles of the prince of Wales himself. The case of the duke of Gloucester is directly in point, and which I rely upon. King William named all his servants by his own authority, without any notice to any body: so the supposed consent has no proof nor probability. The very address to the king supposes he had a right. I think there are more inconveniences in denying this prerogative, than in any other prerogative whatsoever; and the prerogative must prevail. The Stat. of 12 Car. 2. could never intend that any father had power to dispose of the royal family. They would have prevented such inconveniencies by this act, if they had imagined any such thing, or that it would be so construed.

Blencow justice. I am of the same opinion with my brother that spoke last. The precedents are so strong, and the objections so weak, that I am clear of opinion the king has this prerogative: it is a prerogative so essential, that the kingdom cannot subsist without it. Instances of marriage go to full age, as well as infants. They have produced no instances on their side of the question. Marriage is nothing without education. It is a dreadful thing to separate the interest of the king and prince. Children of the crown are the greatest strength of the nation, greater than the shipping or militia: it is of infinite consequence, and the nation cannot subsist without it; and we are to advise the king according to law.

Powis justice. I am of the same opinion this prerogative clearly belongs to the kings of England. This being of such infinite consequence, it would destroy us all if it were otherwise. We always consider inconveniencies, in all matters of law. And in other nations it is said, Salus populi est suprema lex. To give the children of the king education, and to breed them up for kings, is a necessary prerogative; and particularly, to see them brought up in the Protestant religion, and to reform their morals, and to learn the constitution, and how to govern. The king is the fittest and only person to breed them up with the love of their king and country; and he is the head of the family; and he is most able to do it, because he is assisted with the pockets of his subjects. As to marriages, Rymer is full: and to say they were by agreement is an odd argument; for this is an answer to every right and prerogative of the crown. There are no facts or instances on the other side, but all on this side the question; but they would have them all to be by accident or agreement. The main objection is, there are no book cases. That is impossible, as has been mentioned. As to this peculiar prerogative, how could such an affair come into Westminster-Hall? Countess of Shrewsbury's case is a great authority, and she was fined ten thousand pounds. Afterwards was the marriage of the duke of York to the duchess of Modena, and the princess of Orange's case; which are very strong. As to education, that is a consequence of marriage; a fortiori, because education is of greater concern than marriage; for the education concerns the public much more, the other private life only. Now the principal article, in that match of Charles the first, was the education of those children; and by securing the education, they secured our religion from Papery, in the opinion of both courts. The case of the duke of Gloucester runs throughout as an authority, and the governor or preceptor submitted to it after a contest.

If the contrary were true, this would be a monstrous inconvenience; for then the father might devise away the heir to the crown, and they might bring him up as they please, a Mahometan, or what not; and this devise could not be altered until the heir came of age. Vaughan 180. That case of Edw. 5. was only about the sanctuary: that was the contest there and nothing more.

Bury chief baron. As to marriages, that prerogative in the crown is very clear. The crown has had it in all ages, and claimed it as their right. That of dabimus et concessimus in Rymer, is very strong. In all times it has been accounted a crime to marry any of the royal family without leave from the crown; and all that have had a hand in such marriages have been accounted criminal. As to education, so many instances cannot be expected, because it has seldom happened that there are grandchildren in the royal family. The case of the duke of York's children is strong: the king claimed it as a right, and made the contract, and the duke gave it up. As to the authority of the house of commons, they did not interpose as a legislature; and that affirmed the power of the crown. Though there be a law to the contrary, yet the parliament may interpose. I own I did not think that so many precedents could be found, as are here produced both as to marriage and education too.

King chief justice, afterwards lord chancellor. The question is, whether the care and approbation of marriages in the royal family, exclusive of the father, belong to the crown? That question doth not touch the paternal right, to be sure; but the question is, whether such marriage can be without the consent of the crown? And that is plain it cannot. As to marriages in fact in the royal family, nobody can instance any to be made these five hundred years without the crown's consent. The crown in fact has done it; and where the crown has not been consulted, it has been considered as a crime. The case of lord Brandon in Henry the eighth's time, and the case of lady Arabella, are strong precedents. It was taken for granted that it was a crime and contempt, in the last case. If this had been no crime, the countess of Shrewsbury could not have been guilty of any crime whatever. The house of commons address in 1673, was ridiculous, if the king had no power. As to education, so many instances of marriage is a good argument for education too. But it is objected, this invades the right of the father. Not at all so; nor is this against the law of God in any sense: for duty to parents is still subject to the public good; and there is a duty still to the mother, as well as to the father.

In the next place, this is not a guardianship by tenure; so is not within 12 Car. 2. And if there be a guardianship by prerogative, as this is, it could not be within that statute; which shews, that this could not come in question in Westminster-Hall or our law books: we can learn it no otherwise than by facts or usage. You could have no instance but from Edward the Black Prince to Charles the first's time: you could have none in all these reigns. As to that case of Edw. 5. that is only of a queen who claimed it in the sanctuary, but it does not follow that it was law. Rushworth, in all the addresses about the Palatinate, mentions the children of the Palatinate. It is reasonable to suppose the king did take care of the education of the princesses of Orange and Denmark. By order of council, the king declares he had concluded that marriage; and that shews it was done by the king's authority. In that of the duke of Gloucester, every body knows the king appointed him his tutor. The address of the house of commons was to remove him. Why should the king remove him if he had no power over him? So that I am clear the king has this prerogative.

Lord Parker chief justice of England, and afterwards lord chancellor of Great-Britain. I am of the same opinion with my lord chief justice King. The first question is as to the care and approbation of marriages in the royal family. In private families, if a daughter grows up and is marriageable, there is no law against the daughter's marrying against the father's consent; but if against the king's consent, and she is one of the royal family, that is against the law expressly. The fifth commandment requires obedience from the grandson, as well as from the son. If the grandfather command the son any thing, the son ought to comply, else it is disobedience, and in the king only to command. Then as to the education of the royal family, that is in the king only, as his peculiar prerogative. The marriage articles of Car. 1. is a very strong case, and stronger than I could expect to find it. There being no grandchildren since Edward the third's time, so many instances cannot be produced; nor can this happen, but where there is a disagreement in the royal family. In this case of Car. 1. it is not only an agreement, but a solemn treaty upon oath, and many years a-doing. The king did not need to enter into a treaty, if the prince had it in his own power intirely; but he says conditionally, if this devolves to me, then I will alter it. The contract was not of so much use if the grandfather lived; but if he died it would devolve to him, and then he would alter and enlarge it. And whether this contract was well or ill made, is not the question, and nothing to the purpose: there was a power to make this contract in the king; nor is it a question, whether an ill use be made of the power or not. But the prince has almost in express words said, he has not that power. The power is not in the prince till it devolves to him as king. And this was on a very solemn occasion. It is never to be supposed the king will make an ill use of any power he has by law, nor is it to be presumed the king will do wrong, because all power is committed to him by law. You may suppose any subject, though never so great, to be in the wrong, but not the king. No man that talks like a lawyer can say otherwise; and therefore I think clearly this is the king's prerogative.

Both these opinions were afterwards drawn up in short by the ten judges, for the prerogative, and also in short by the two judges, that differed in opinion from the ten, against the prerogative, and were delivered severally under their hands to the lord chancellor, to deliver to the king. They are as follows.

To the KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

May it please your Majesty,

IN humble obedience to your majesty's commands, signified to us by the right honourable the lord chancellor, requiring the opinion of all your majesty's judges upon the following question, viz.

'Whether the education and the care of the persons of his majesty's grandchildren, now in England, and of prince Frederick, eldest son of his royal highness the prince of Wales, when his majesty shall think fit to cause him to come into England, and the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors and governesses, and other instructors, attendants and servants, and the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, belongs of right to his majesty, as king of this realm, or not?

We whose names are hereunto subscribed, being ten of your majesty's judges, together with the other two judges, having taken the same into consideration, and after the most diligent search that we could in this time make into acts and proceedings of parliament, treaties, public instruments, and records, histories and law books, and consideration of the powers and prerogatives, which from time to time in very many instances have been exercised, and owned to belong to your majesty's royal ancestors and predecessors, with relation to the marriages and care of the persons of the branches of the royal family, and of the great concern of the whole kingdom in so important a trust; and after having, pursuant to your majesty's farther command, signified in like manner to us, heard a learned serjeant-at-law, who, by the command of his royal highness, laid before us several things relating to the question aforesaid; and after several conferences, and deliberations upon all the matters aforesaid, and what occurred to us, and the other judges thereupon; we are humbly of opinion, that the education and the care of the persons of your majesty's grandchildren now in England, and of prince Frederick, eldest son of his royal highness the prince of Wales, when your majesty shall think fit to cause him to come into England, and the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors and their governesses, and other instructors, attendants and servants, and the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, do belong of right to your majesty, as king of this realm.

All which we most humbly submit to your royal majesty's great wisdom.

Mr. baron Price's and Mr. justice Eyre's opinion upon the prince's case.

Feb. 1, 1717.

To the king's most excellent majesty.

May it please your Majesty,

IN humble obedience to your majesty's commands, signified to your judges by the right honourable the lord chancellor, we have taken into consideration the following question, viz.

Whether

Whether the education and care of the persons of your majesty's grand-children, now in England, and of prince Frederick, eldest son of his royal highness the prince of Wales, when your majesty shall think fit to cause him to come into England, and the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors, governesses, and other instructors, attendants, and servants, and the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, belong of right to your majesty, as king of this realm, or not?

And we are humbly of opinion, that the education and care of the persons of your majesty's grand-children, the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors, governesses, and other instructors, attendants, and servants, belong to the prince their father. But, that the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, belong to your majesty, as king of this realm.

This, sir, is our humble opinion. But when we acquaint your majesty that the care and approbation of the marriages of your grand-children belong to your majesty, as king of this realm, we desire to be understood, as speaking of a care and approbation not exclusive of the prince their father. But as your majesty's care will be always employed for the good of the royal family, and the welfare of your people; so it is a duty incumbent upon every member of the royal family to apply to your majesty, and receive your royal approbation upon every occasion of this kind; for we find that all negotiations of marriages in the royal family have been carried on by the intervention of the crown, and such marriages as have been contracted without the royal consent and approbation, have been thought contempts of the regal authority: but we find no instance where a marriage has been treated by the crown, for any person of the royal family, without the consent of the father; and we beg leave to assure your majesty, that there is no one expression in any of our law-books that warrants any such assertion.

As to the other part of the question, in answer to which we cannot concur with the other judges; it is our duty humbly to lay before your majesty, that in our opinion the father hath in all cases a right to the custody and education of his children, and this we take to be clear from the general rule of law.

This right of the father is said in our books, to be founded jure naturæ, and to be annexed by nature to the person of the father. In case of younger children, it never was disputed; and in regard to the eldest son, or daughter and heir, to whom lands descended from a collateral ancestor, the right of the father obtained even against the lord, though his seigniorial right to the wardship of his tenant during the minority prevailed against the grandfather, and all other ancestors lineal and collateral. Littleton, Coke, and Vaughan, all agree that none can have the custody of a man's son and heir apparent from the father; and in the common case of a tutela in ætate, even the mother has the right of guardianship, after the death of the father, preferable to the grandfather. From hence we take it to be the general rule of law, that the guardianship of the children is a right common to every subject of this kingdom, who is a father, without exception.

Upon the best search we have been able to make, we can find but two books written by English lawyers, that can possibly induce a contrary opinion (Bracton and Fleta). Bracton treating de patria potestate says, Qui ex filio tuo & ejus uxore nascitur, i. e. nepos tuus & neptis, æque in tua potestate sunt, & pronepos & proneptis, & deinceps cæteri; and, in potestate patrum sunt filii qui nascuntur in iusto & legitimo matrimonio, idem in nepotibus & pronepotibus, quantum ad avos & proavos paternos; which Fleta has also said in, almost, the same words, and which both have taken from Justinian's Institutes. This shews it to have been a part of the Roman law; but it neither is, nor, as we conceive, ever was, a part of the law of England. It is well known that Bracton and Fleta wrote their several Treatises upon the plan of the imperial laws; and it is as well known, that those laws never obtained, here, through the general aversion this nation (always zealous of its liberties) had towards them; and accordingly, wherever these writers differ from our year-books, and authentic reports, they are not allowed to be of authority. And as to this part of the Roman law in particular, which relates to the patria potestas, it is acknowledged by all, even by Justinian himself, that it was so peculiar to the Romans, that it never obtained among any other people whatsoever. Jus autem potestatis, quod in liberos habemus, proprium est civium Romanorum; nulli enim sunt homines, qui talem in liberos habeant potestatem, qualem nos habemus.

But to give a more particular answer to these passages, which are the only ones that have the least appearance of law, it is evident they cannot be made to affect the case of the royal family, by any other construction than what will equally affect every other family in England. But that from these passages nothing can be concluded, to determine the extent of the patria potestas in any family here, is clear from the reason, on which the power of the grandfather among the Romans is founded.

Now the reason of the Roman law, why children should not be in the power of the father, but of the grandfather exclusive of the father, was, because the father himself was not sui juris, and in his power, but in patria potestas sui manet potestate, mancipioque; which are the words of the Laws of the XII Tables; and it was manifestly absurd, that he should have others in his power, who was not in his own.

This servile condition of the son to the father, which had ordinarily no end, till the father himself was pleased by emancipation to put an end to it, being the sole foundation of the grandfather's right to the grand-children, as well as to every thing else the father was possessed of; when this state of the father ceased, the power of the grandfather necessarily ceased with it: and so it is declared in Justinian's Institutes, that if the son was emancipated, and set free from the power of his father, the children begotten after such emancipation are not in the power of the grandfather, but of the father.

Quod si pater emancipationem conceptus fuerit, patris sui emancipati potestate subicitur. Justin. l. 1. tit. 12. §. 9.

But not to insist that by the laws of England no father has such a power over his children, even in their minority, as the Roman law gave; it is undeniable, that with us marriage hath the nature of a true and proper emancipation of the person of the son; and by consequence, even upon the grounds of the Roman law, the grandfather with us can have no right to the children of the son, but the father only. If therefore nothing otherwise appears to distinguish the case of the royal family, there can be no foundation upon which any prerogative can be established in the instance now in question; and we humbly apprehend that the only precedents which can be alleged to support such a prerogative, when considered, will not be found sufficient.

The first, in the 22 H. 3. intitled in Rymer, De Alianora filia Galfreda, &c. is only a declaration under the great seal, that William Talbot had surrendered to king Henry 3. the castle of Gloucester, & Alianoram consanguineam suam Janamet intuslumen. What can be inferred from hence is hard to determine, any further than that this Alianora was in ward to the crown, and had been committed to the care of Talbot, who had surrendered her and her estate safe again to the king.

The other precedent, which is in 11 H. 4. is a grant of an annual sum of 500 marks to the prince of Wales for the expence of the maintenance of Edmund earl of March; and his brother, so long as they should remain in the prince's custody, to whom they had been committed the February before. As to this, it appears by the history and records of those times, that Roger de Mortimer their father was killed in Ireland 22 R. 2. and that their mother soon after married Sir Edward Charlton lord Powis, and died 7 Hen. 4. so that the eldest son was then in ward to the crown, by reason of his lands held of the crown, as were his lordships of Wigmore and Clare, inter alia; and his brother Roger was then an infant of very tender age, and under the care of the king, as next relation: and it appears that he died very young; in which latter case, we humbly conceive, that the care which the king was pleased to take of an infant and orphan so nearly related to him, will not be a precedent to establish a power in the crown to dispose of the custody of a child while the father is living.

If any stress can be laid upon printed history, the case of Richard, son to Edward the Black Prince, will be an instance against this power supposed to be lodged by law in the grandfather. He being a minor, lived with his father as part of his family, and his father appointed his governor, of which we have this relation in Holingshead: that Sir Simon Burley, kinsman to Dr. Burley, one of the instructors of Edward the Black Prince, having been admitted among other young gentlemen to be school-fellow with the prince, he grew in such credit and favour with him, that afterwards, when his son Richard of Bourdeaux was born, the prince, for special trust and confidence which he had in the said Simon Burley, committed the governance and education of his son Richard to him; and after the death of the Black Prince, it appears by two very remarkable instances in our history, that Richard continued with his mother till the death of his grandfather king Edward the third.

The younger children of Edward 4. lived with their mother, whose wardship she declared she claimed by the advice of learned counsel, according to the relation given us by Sir Thomas More, afterwards lord chancellor of England, in his History of those Times; nor was it then pretended, that the king had any right to their education, or the care of their persons; and although the queen was prevailed upon to part with her son Richard duke of York, her daughters remained in her custody till she herself was contented to send them to court.

As to the education of their late majesties queen Mary and queen Anne, during their minorities, it does not appear to us, that their uncle king Charles the second appointed their governesses and servants, or any one person that attended them; and we are not enough acquainted with the circumstances of the duke of Gloucester's case to make the proper remarks, but it seems to have been by agreement with the king: and we humbly conceive, that the motion in parliament, 13 December 1699. for an address to the king to remove the then bishop of Salisbury from being his preceptor, can be of no weight in this matter, since it passed in the negative.

It is possible that something may be inferred in favour of this prerogative, from that article of the treaty, said to be made by king James the first concerning the match with Spain, which related to the nurture and education of the children of that marriage. It is not to the present question to consider, whether there ever was such a treaty as is related by Rushworth or not. It is certain, that it is not to be found upon record, the proper evidence of all publick treaties. The articles of the treaty are said in Rushworth to be stiled by the cardinals, propositions for the right augmentation and weal of the Roman Catholick religion. And, in truth, almost every article is so derogatory to the supremacy of the crown, and the statutes made for the establishment and security of the church of England, that it could have carried no sort of authority with it in point of law, even though it had appeared, in a regular manner, under the great seal, and not from the reports of historians only. Nor can the oath said to be taken by prince Charles, while in Spain, to intercede with his father, that the ten years of the education of the children which should be born of this marriage with the Infanta, accorded in one of the articles of this treaty, might be lengthened to the term of twelve years, as the prince desired, be looked upon as a precedent to determine what the law of England is. The right to the care and education of the children of that marriage, had it taken effect, was not then in dispute: and had it been so, nothing can be concluded from the voluntary engagement of the prince, in favour of a marriage so much desired by himself, himself, as well as by his father, wherein the question of this right was never the subject of debate.

There was indeed an article in the treaty with France, upon the marriage of king Charles the first with princess Henrietta Maria, whereby it was agreed that the children of that marriage should be brought up with their mother till their age of thirteen; but it is evident, that treaty was made with king Charles the first, after his accession to the crown, and not with king James his father. King James, it is true, sent over the earls of Carlisle and Holland to treat of that match; but the treaty was not concluded till after his death, and then by powers from king Charles the first, whose stipulations for the education of his own children could need no assistance from his prerogative.

Thus have we humbly laid before your majesty, what we have to offer in relation to the books and precedents that have fallen under our consideration upon this head, which we cannot think sufficient to infer a prerogative in your majesty, as king of this realm, in the care and education of your majesty's grand-children, during the life, and without the consent of their father; a prerogative, as we humbly apprehend, hitherto unknown to the laws of England.

All which is most humbly submitted to your majesty's great wisdom.

RO. PRICE.
R. EYRE.

These opinions of the judges his majesty was pleased some time after to communicate to his privy council in manner following.

At the Court at Kenfington, the 1st of July, 1718.

P R E S E N T,

The king's most excellent majesty in council.

HIS majesty was this day pleased to communicate to the lords of his most honourable privy council, that his royal pleasure had some time since been signified to his judges, by the late lord chancellor Cowper, that they should give their opinion upon the question just before mentioned.

And that his majesty, having afterwards been informed that some of the counsel of his royal highness the prince of Wales expressed a desire to lay before the judges something relating to the question aforesaid, had further signified his royal pleasure to his judges, that any one single person, that should apply to the said judges for that purpose, should be admitted to lay before them what such person should have to offer from his royal highness. And that the judges had returned their answer to the said question; which answer his majesty was pleased to order to be read this day in council; and the same was read, whereby it appeared that the said judges had taken the said question into consideration, and had heard a learned serjeant at law, who by command of his royal highness had laid before them several things relating to the question aforesaid; and that ten of the judges, that is to say, Thomas lord Parker, now lord high chancellor of Great-Britain, then lord chief justice of the court of King's Bench; sir John Pratt, knight, now lord chief justice of the said court of King's Bench, then one of the justices of the said court; sir Peter King, knight, lord chief justice of the court of Common Pleas; sir Thomas Bury, knight, lord chief baron of the court of Exchequer; sir Littleton Powys, knight, one other of the justices of the court of King's Bench; sir John Blencowe, knight, Robert Tracey and Robert Dormer, esquires, justices of the said court of Common Pleas; sir James Mountague, knight, one of the barons of the court of Exchequer; and sir John Fortescue Aland, knight, now one of the justices of the court of King's Bench, and then one of the barons of the court of Exchequer, were of opinion,

That the education and care of the persons of his majesty's grand-children now in England, and of prince Frederick, eldest son of his royal highness the prince of Wales, when his majesty shall think fit to cause him to come to England, and the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors and governesses, and other instructors, attendants and servants, and the care and approbation of their marriages when grown up, belong of right to his majesty, as king of this realm.

And that Robert Price, esquire, one of the barons of the court of Exchequer, and sir Robert Eyre, knight, then one of the justices of the aforesaid court of King's Bench, and chancellor of his royal highness the prince of Wales, were of opinion,

That the education and care of the persons of his majesty's grand-children, the ordering the place of their abode, and appointing their governors and governesses, and other instructors, attendants and servants, belong to the prince their father; but that, the care and approbation of their marriages, when grown up, belong to his majesty, as king of this realm.—Adding, that in what concerned the marriage they desired to be understood as speaking of a care and approbation not exclusive of the prince their father.

II. The Case of JOHN WILKES, Esq. on a Habeas Corpus, Common Pleas, Easter Term, 3 Geo. III. 1763.

The following case is from the late Mr. Serjeant Wilson's Reports, 2 Wils. Rep. 150. But we have added another Report of the judgment from a book, intitled, "A Digest of the Law of Libels;" as on comparison it appeared to supply some defects in the Serjeant's account. It was attempted to obtain a fuller report of the judgment than either of the two notes we lay before the reader. But we were unsuccessful.

The great point of the case, namely, whether the privilege of parliament extended to a prosecution for a seditious libel, was the chief inducement to our inserting it.

Mr. Serjeant Wilson's Report.

A member of parliament discharged, without bail, being committed for writing a seditious libel.

ON Saturday April 30, 1763, in the morning the defendant Wilkes was arrested by two of the king's messengers, by virtue of a warrant from the secretary of state; the TENOR of which warrant is in the words following: "George Montague Dunk, earl of Halifax, viscount Sunbury and baron Halifax, one of the lords of his majesty's most honourable privy council, lieutenant general of his majesty's forces, and principal secretary of state: These are in his majesty's name to authorize and require you (taking a constable to your assistance) to make strict and diligent search for the authors, printers and publishers of a seditious and treasonable paper, intitled, THE NORTH BRITON, NUMBER XLV, SATURDAY APRIL 23, 1763. printed for G. Kearsly in Ludgate-street, London, and them, or any of them, having found, to apprehend and seize, together with their papers, and to bring in safe custody before me, to be examined concerning the premises, and further dealt with according to law: and in the due execution thereof, all mayors, sheriffs, justices of the peace, constables, and all other his majesty's officers civil and military, and loving subjects whom it may concern, are to be aiding and assisting to you, as there shall be occasion; and for so doing this shall be your warrant. Given at St. James's the twenty-sixth day of April, in the third year of his majesty's reign.

Dunk Halifax.

"To Nathan Carrington, John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore, four of his majesty's messengers in ordinary.

The same morning, a copy of the above warrant having been obtained from the messengers, who then had Mr. Wilkes in their own custody, and an affidavit being made of the truth of such copy, and that Mr. Wilkes was then in custody of two of the above messengers at his house in Great George-Street in Westminster, the same were produced in the court of Common Pleas the same 30th day of April at twelve o'clock at noon, or a few minutes before or after that hour; whereupon, at the same time, it was moved by my learned brother Glynn, that a writ of habeas corpus might be allowed to issue instantly, returnable forthwith. The lord chief justice Pratt was pleased to say, that this was a most extraordinary warrant; and the court ordered an habeas corpus to be issued instantly, returnable forthwith. It being now about one o'clock, the rule of court for the issuing the habeas corpus could not possibly be drawn up and entered, nor could the writ be made out, signed and passed under the seal of the court before four or five o'clock in the afternoon: and although it was certainly known by the officers under the crown, particularly by Mr. Webb, then solicitor to the Treasury, that this writ had been ordered to issue by the court between twelve and one o'clock, while Mr. Wilkes was in the custody of the messengers at his house in Great George-Street, yet, before the coming of the writ to the messengers, (the same afternoon about five o'clock) Mr. Wilkes was hastily (I had almost said in contempt of the king's high court) committed to the Tower of London.

Mr. Wilkes's solicitor, and one of his counsel, soon after they heard of such commitment, went to the Tower in order to consult and advise with him, but were denied admittance to him; major Rainsford informing them, that he had received orders from the secretary of state not to admit any person whatsoever to speak with, or see Mr. Wilkes; and further informed them, that he had just before refused the right honourable earl Temple such admittance, ut audiui.

On Sunday May the first, the same gentlemen went again to the Tower, between the hours of twelve and one, on the same occasion, but were again denied admittance to see or speak with Mr. Wilkes; and soon afterwards, several noblemen and gentlemen of the first distinction were refused admittance to see or speak to Mr. Wilkes, and particularly his own brother was refused, ut audiui.

After such denial, Mr. Wilkes's solicitor demanded of major Rainsford a copy of the warrant of commitment of Mr. Wilkes to the Tower, which was readily granted by the major, the tenor whereof is in the words following: "Charles earl of Egremont and George Dunk earl of Halifax, lords of his majesty's most honourable privy council, and principal secretaries of state: These are in his majesty's name to authorize and require you to receive into your "your custody the body of John Wilkes, Esq. herewith sent you, for being THE AUTHOR AND PUBLISHER OF A MOST INFAMOUS AND SEDITIOUS LIBEL, INTITLED, THE NORTH BRITON, NUMBER XLV. TENDING TO INFLAME THE MINDS AND ALIENATE THE AFFECTIONS OF THE PEOPLE FROM HIS MAJESTY, AND TO EXCITE THEM TO TRAITEROUS INSURRECTIONS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT, AND TO KEEP HIM SAFE AND CLOSE, until he shall be delivered by due course of law; and for so doing this shall be your warrant. Given at St. James's the 30th day of April 1763, in the third year of his majesty's reign.

Egremont, Dunk Halifax.

To the right honourable John lord Berkley of Stratton, constable of his majesty's Tower of London, or to the lieutenant of the said Tower, or his deputy.

Mr. Webb, solicitor to the Treasury, being present in major Rainford's room when the copy of the said warrant of commitment was granted, Mr. Wilkes's counsel and solicitor applied to Mr. Webb for admittance to Mr. Wilkes; whereupon (it is true) Mr. Webb desired the major to allow such admittance, and said he would be answerable, and indemnify the major: but the major, with the true spirit of an excellent officer, answered, "he would not, or he could not disobey orders." Mr. Webb replied and said, he imagined, or he believed, there must have been some mistake in the orders, and that if either of the secretaries of state were in town, he would apply and endeavour to obtain the desired admittance; and that if he could succeed therein, he would send or bring an order for that purpose in the afternoon of the same Sunday, May the first; whereupon Mr. Wilkes's counsel and solicitor departed from the Tower for some hours, and between the hours of eight and nine in the evening of the same day, returned again to the Tower, and applied for admittance to Mr. Wilkes; but the major not having received any orders or message from either of the secretaries of state, or from Mr. Webb, refused admittance, as he had done before, ut audiui.

On Monday the second day of May, at the sitting of the court of Common Pleas in the morning, the messengers returned the writ of habeas corpus which had issued and been delivered to them on the thirtieth of April in the afternoon, after Mr. Wilkes was out of their custody, and committed to the Tower as above; the tenor of which return indorsed on the same writ returns thus, viz. "In obedience to the within command, we humbly certify, to his majesty's justices of the court of Common Pleas at Westminster, that at the time of the coming of this writ to us, the within named John Wilkes was not, nor at any time since hath been in our custody, or in the custody of either of us; signed by two of the messengers to whom the writ was directed."

Upon reading the writ and the return thereof, it was moved by the king's serjeant, that the same might be affiled of record.

To which serjeant Glynn for Mr. Wilkes objected, and insisted that the return was too general in this particular case, (although it might be a good return in another case not circumstanced like the present) for that it clearly appeared to the court by sufficient evidence, viz. the affidavit and warrant of arrest and seizure of Mr. Wilkes, upon which the writ was founded and granted last Saturday at noon, that Mr. Wilkes was then in the custody of the messengers, and therefore they ought to have returned and certified to the court in what manner, when and by what authority he was taken out of their custody, and what was become of his body.

Some of the king's serjeants replied, that all the precedents of returns of writs of habeas corpus in the Crown-Office, where the party therein named was not in the custody of the messengers (to whom the writ was directed) at the time of the coming of the writ, were like the return in the present case; which assertion, at first, seemed to have weight with the lord chief justice and two others of the judges, who thereupon thought the return well enough; but Mr. Justice Gould was pleased to say he much doubted, whether the precedents in the Crown-Office of returns to writs of habeas corpus were like the present return, as had been asserted by the king's serjeants; and said if the precedents were not so, he should be of opinion, that this was an insufficient return, because he thought, from what appears in evidence in the case, the court has a right to know what is become of the king's subject Mr. Wilkes, since he was in the messengers custody last Saturday at noon; whereupon (hæsitante curia) the writ and return were not permitted to be affiled of record upon this motion; and precedents were ordered to be looked into, and the matter of the return was ordered to be debated at another day; but I never heard that it was.

Afterwards the same Monday, May 2, a motion was made to the court grounded upon a copy of the aforesaid warrant of commitment of Mr. Wilkes to the Tower, and an affidavit of the truth thereof, for another habeas corpus to be directed to the constable, &c. of the Tower of London, which was granted returnable without delay.

Tuesday, May 3. At the sitting of the court (which was crowded to such a degree as I never saw it before) in the morning Mr. Wilkes was brought to the bar, and sat among the serjeants (next to the reporter on his left hand,) when the lieutenant of the Tower returned upon this second writ of habeas corpus the warrant of commitment of Mr. Wilkes to the Tower by the two secretaries of state (before set forth); which being read, serjeant Glynn moved the court that Mr. Wilkes might be discharged out of custody without bail, and grounded his motion on three points, two whereof were objections to the legality of the warrant of commitment (the reader will observe that the general warrant of arrest and seizure was not now before the court, and therefore the legality of that could not now be debated); the third point was, that Mr. Wilkes was a member of parliament, and therefore was privileged from being arrested for any crime except treason, felony, and breach of the peace; and that supposing him the author of the present supposed libel (which he absolutely denies) it is only a misdemeanor, and none of the three above-mentioned crimes and misdemeanors.

The first objection taken to the warrant of commitment was, that it doth not appear to the court that Mr. Wilkes was charged by any evidence or information upon oath before the secretaries of state, that he was the author or publisher of the North-Briton, number XLV. that, for any thing that appeared to the court to the contrary, the secretaries of state committed Mr. Wilkes to the Tower, upon their own mere imagination or suspicion that he was the author and publisher of this supposed libel.

The second objection taken to the warrant of commitment was, that it was too general, and doth not set forth sufficient, substantial matter whereupon the court can judge whether the North-Briton, number XLV. (supposing Mr. Wilkes the author and publisher thereof) is a most infamous and seditious libel, tending to inflame the minds and alienate the affections of the people from his majesty, and to excite them to traitorous insurrections against the government; that the warrant not having set forth the North-Briton, number XLV. or such parts thereof as the secretaries of state deemed infamous, seditious, &c. the court cannot judge whether any such paper ever existed, it not being before them; or if it does exist, whether it be an infamous libel or not.

In the third place, supposing the warrant of commitment to be good, yet that Mr. Wilkes being a member of parliament (which was admitted by the king's counsel) is privileged from arrests in all cases except treason, felony, and actual breach of the peace, therefore ought to be discharged without bail. That libels may, and often do tend to the breach of the peace was admitted, and therefore the court of King's Bench frequently grants informations against the authors, printers and publishers thereof; but this is never done but upon affidavits laid before the court ascertaining the said authors, printers or publishers: for surely that matter which only tends to a breach of the peace, cannot with any propriety be said to be an actual breach of the peace; and it was said that it is universally agreed, a libel is not an actual breach of the peace; therefore it was insisted for Mr. Wilkes, that upon this point alone (although the others should be over-ruled) he ought to be discharged from his imprisonment in the Tower, without bail.

Mr. Serjeant Hewitt for the crown, in answer to the first objection said, that it was not necessary to set forth the evidence or information upon which the warrant of commitment was made, in the warrant; but as to the second objection, he admitted that it must appear upon the face of such warrant for what particular species of a crime or misdemeanor the party was committed, according to the case of the King v. Roe and Kendall, 1 Salk. 345. 5 Mod. 78. and that in the present case, if the commitment had been for writing and publishing a libel generally, without specifying the nature and tendency thereof, it would have been ill; but here it is said to be "for being the author and publisher of a most infamous and seditious libel, tending to inflame the minds and alienate the affections of the people from his majesty, and to excite them to traitorous insurrections against the government." This he thought was a sufficient specification of the nature of the libel, and of the misdemeanor supposed to be committed by Mr. Wilkes against the government; but he said he would not be understood to affirm that the paper called the North-Briton, number XLV. (which was not before the court) was a libel; that he had found no case upon a libel like this, and therefore could not say what was a sufficient and precise certainty in a warrant of commitment for a libel; but he thought it not necessary to set forth the whole, or any part thereof, in the warrant.

As to the third objection of privilege, serjeant Hewitt admitted that Mr. Wilkes was a member of parliament, and could not legally be arrested but for treason, felony, or breach of the peace. He cited Hob. 215. Hick's case, to shew that a libel tends to the breach of the peace; but whether the presumed libel in the present case was a breach of the peace or not, he would not take upon himself to say; nor would he say that the arresting Mr. Wilkes in the present case was not a breach of privilege of the house of commons.

Serjeants Whitaker, Nares and Davy, for the king, spoke to the like effect; but none of them affirmed, that the writing or publishing a libel was an actual breach of the peace (as I understood), or that the arrest of Mr. Wilkes in the present case, was not a breach of privilege of parliament; and (I think) they all declined saying any thing more about the privilege of parliament, than what serjeant Hewitt had said before. When the king's serjeants had concluded, Mr. Wilkes made the following speech to the court.

"My Lord! I am happy to appear before your lordship and this court, where liberty is so sure of finding protection and support, and where the law (the principle and end of which is the preservation of liberty) is so perfectly understood. Liberty, my lord, hath been the governing principle of every action of my life; and actuated by it, I always have endeavoured to serve my gracious sovereign and his family, knowing his government to be founded upon it; but as it has been his misfortune to have employed ministers who have endeavoured to cast the odium and contempt arising from their own terrible and corrupt measures on the sacred person of their sovereign and benefactor, so mine has been the daring task to rescue the royal person from ill-placed imputations, and fix them on the ministers, who alone ought to bear the blame and the punishment due to their unconstitutional proceedings. For the proof of my zeal and affection to my sovereign I have been imprisoned, sent to the Tower, and treated with a rigour yet unpractised even on Scottish rebels. But however these may strive to destroy me, whatever persecution they are now meditating against me, yet to the world I shall proclaim, that offers of the most advantageous and lucrative kind have been made to seduce me to their party, and no means left untried to win me to their connections. Now, as their attempts to corrupt me have failed, they aim at intimidating me by persecution. But as it has pleased God to give me virtue to resist their bribes, so I doubt not but he will give me spirit to surmount their threats in a manner becoming an Englishman who would suffer the severest "severest trials rather than associate with men who are enemies to the liberty of this country. Their bribes I rejected, their menaces I defy; and I think this is the most fortunate event of my life, when I appear before your lordship and this court, where innocence is sure of protection, and liberty can never want friends and guardians."

Then the court took time to consider, and appointed Friday following to give their opinion, and ordered Mr. Wilkes to be remanded to the Tower, and to be brought up again to the bar on Friday the sixth of May; and upon that day, Mr. Wilkes being again at the bar, the lord chief justice delivered the opinion of the whole court.

LORD CHIEF JUSTICE PRATT, after stating the warrant of commitment, said, there are two objections taken to the legality of this warrant, and a third matter insisted on for the defendant, is privilege of parliament.

The first objection is, that it does not appear to the court that Mr. Wilkes was charged by any evidence before the secretaries of state, that he was the author or publisher of the North Briton, number XLV. In answer to this, we are all of opinion, that it is not necessary to state in the warrant that Mr. Wilkes was charged by any evidence before the secretaries of state, and that this objection has no weight. Whether a justice of peace can ex officio, without any evidence or information, issue a warrant for apprehending for a crime, is a different question. If a crime be done in his sight, he may commit the criminal upon the spot; but where he is not present, he ought not to commit upon discretion. Suppose a magistrate hath notice, or a particular knowledge that a person has been guilty of an offence, yet I do not think it is a sufficient ground for him to commit the criminal; but in that case he is rather a witness than a magistrate, and ought to make oath of the fact before some other magistrate, who should thereupon act the official part, by granting a warrant to apprehend the offender; it being more fit that the accuser should appear as a witness, than act as a magistrate. But that is not the question upon this warrant. The question here is, whether it is an essential part of the warrant, that the information, evidence or grounds of the charge before the secretaries of state should be set forth in the warrant? And we think it is not. Tho. Rudyard's case, 2 Vent. 22. cannot be applied to this case; for in the case of a conviction it is otherwise. It was said that a charge by witness was the ground of a warrant; but we think it not requisite to set out more than the offence, and the particular species of it. It may be objected, if this be good, every man's liberty will be in the power of a justice of peace. But Hale, Coke and Hawkins, take no notice that a charge is necessary to be set out in the warrant. In the case of the seven bishops, their counsel did not take this objection, which no doubt but they would have done, if they had thought there had been any weight in it. I do not rely upon the determination of the judges who then presided in the King's Bench. I have been attended with many precedents of warrants returned into the King's Bench; they are almost universally like this; and in William Wyndham's case, 1 Stra. 2, 3. this very point before us is determined. And Hawkins, in his 2 Pl. Coron. 120. sect. 17. says, "It is safe to set forth that the party is charged upon oath; but this is not necessary; for it hath been resolved, that a commitment for treason, or for suspicion of it, without setting forth any particular accusation, or ground of suspicion, is good;" and cites William Wyndham's case, Trin. 2 Geo. Dalt. cap. 121. Crompt. 2, 3. b.

The second objection is, that the libel ought to be set forth in the warrant in hac verba, or at least so much thereof as the secretaries of state deemed infamous, seditious, &c. that the court may judge whether any such paper ever existed; or if it does exist, whether it be an infamous and seditious libel, or not. But we are all of a contrary opinion: A warrant of commitment for felony must contain the species of felony briefly, "as for felony for the death of J. S. or for burglary in breaking the house of J. S. &c. and the reason is, because it may appear to the judges upon the return of an habeas corpus, whether it be felony or not." The magistrate forms his judgment upon the writing, whether it be an infamous and seditious libel or not at his peril; and perhaps the paper itself may not contain the whole of the libel; inuendo's may be necessary to make the whole out. There is no other word in the law but libel whereby to express the true idea of an infamous writing. We understand the nature of a libel as well as a species of felony. It is said the libel ought to be stated, because the court cannot judge whether it is a libel or not without it; but that is matter for the judge and jury to determine at the trial. If the paper was here, I should be afraid to read it. We might perhaps be able to determine that it was a libel, but we could not judge that it was not a libel, because of inuendo's; &c. It may be said, that without seeing the libel we are not able to fix the quantum of the bail; but in answer to this, the nature of the offence is known by us. It is said to be an infamous and seditious libel, &c. it is such a misdemeanor as we should require good bail for, (moderation to be observed) and such as the party may be able to procure.

The third matter insisted upon for Mr. Wilkes is, that he is a member of parliament, (which has been admitted by the king's serjeants) and intitled to privilege to be free from arrests in all cases except treason, felony, and actual breach of the peace, and therefore ought to be discharged from imprisonment without bail; and we are all of opinion that he is intitled to that privilege, and must be discharged without bail. In the case of the seven bishops, the court took notice of the privilege of parliament, and thought the bishops would have been intitled to it, if they had not judged them to have been guilty of a breach of the peace; for three of them, Wright, Holloway, and Allybone, deemed a seditious libel to be an actual breach of the peace, and therefore they were ousted of their privilege most unjustly. If Mr. Wilkes had been described as a member of parliament in the return, we must have taken notice of the law of privilege of parliament, otherwise the members would be without remedy, where they are wrongfully arrested against the law of parliament. We are bound to take notice of their privileges, as being part of the law of the land. 4 Inst. 25. says, the privilege of parliament holds unless it be in three cases, viz. treason, felony, and the peace: these are the words of Coke. In the trial of the seven bishops, the word peace in this case of privilege is explained to mean where surety of the peace is required. Privilege of parliament holds in informations for the king, unless in the cases before excepted. The case of an information against lord Tankerville for bribery, 4 Anne, (a) was within the privilege of parliament. See the resolution of lords and commons, anno 1675. We are all of opinion that a libel is not a breach of the peace. It tends to the breach of the peace, and that is the utmost, 1 Lev. 136. But that which only tends to the breach of the peace cannot be a breach of it. Suppose a libel be a breach of the peace, yet I think it cannot exclude privilege; because I cannot find that a libeller is bound to find surety of the peace, in any book whatever, nor ever was, in any case, except one, viz. the case of the seven bishops, where three judges said, that surety of the peace was required in the case of a libel. Judge Powell, the only honest man of the four judges, dissented; and I am bold to be of his opinion, and to say, that case is not law. But it shews the miserable condition of the state at that time. Upon the whole, it is absurd to require surety of the peace or bail in the case of a libeller, and therefore Mr. Wilkes must be discharged from his imprisonment; whereupon there was a loud buzz in Westminster-hall. He was discharged accordingly.

(a) This must be a mistake of the reporter; for lord Tankerville's case was in 1758. See Journ. Dom. Proc. 6 June in that year.—EDITOR.

Lord chief justice Pratt's argument on delivering the judgment of the court, from the book intitled, 'A Digest of the Law of Libels.'

WHEN this return was read, my brother Glynn, counsel for Mr. Wilkes, made two objections to it; and though those should fail him, he insisted that Mr. Wilkes, from the nature of his particular station and character, as being a member of the house of commons, was intitled to privilege of parliament, and ought for that reason alone to be discharged from his present imprisonment. To begin with the objections. The first was, that it did not appear by the warrant that Mr. Wilkes stood charged upon any evidence with being the author of the libel described in the warrant. The true question arising upon this objection is, whether stating the evidence be essential to the validity of the warrant. And upon this point we are all clearly of opinion that the warrant is good. We consider the secretaries in the light of common justices of the peace: they no more than any common justices can issue warrants merely ex officio, or for offences within their private knowledge, being in those cases rather witnesses than magistrates. But though this be admitted, it will not affect the present question. The present question is, whether the stating the evidence be essential to the validity of the warrant? No authority has been cited by the defendant's counsel to shew it. Rudyard's case in 2 Vent. 22. was indeed referred to; but upon examining that case, it does not apply. The commitment there was a commitment in execution, and therefore it was necessary in that case to state the evidence. It was urged farther, that the ground of the justices jurisdiction rested in the charge by witnesses; and if it was otherwise, every man's liberty would be in the power of the justices. The objection deserves an answer; and if it had not been determined before, I should have thought it very weighty and alarming; but it has been settled. Before I mention the case where it was solemnly adjudged, I would take notice, that neither my lord Coke, lord Hale, or Mr. Hawkins, all of them very able writers upon the crown law, have considered such a charge as is contended for to be essential. In the trial of the seven bishops, though they were committed upon a similar warrant, their counsel did not take the same objection. In referring to that great case, I am not to be understood as intending to give any weight to the determination of the judges who sat upon the bench, in that cause. I rely only on the silence of the defendants counsel, who were all of them lovers of liberty, and the greatest lawyers of that age. We have seen precedents of commitments returned upon habeas corpus's into the King's Bench, where the warrants have been all in the same form, and no such objection taken; but the very point was determined in the case of William Wyndham, 3 Vin. Abr. 530, 535. Stra. 2. who was committed for high treason generally, and not on the charge of any body stated in the commitment. 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 120. chap. 17. sect. 17. refers to the case of William Wyndham, and says it is safer to set forth that the party is charged upon oath, but that is not necessary. Thus stands this point on authorities.—The other objection was, that the libel itself ought to have been set forth in hac verba; but upon that point too, we are all of opinion that the warrant is good. It was urged, that the specific cause of detention ought to be stated with certainty; and therefore if a man be committed for felony, the warrant must briefly mention the species of the felony. Now the species of every offence must be collected by the magistrate out of the evidence; but he is not bound to set forth the evidence: he is answerable only for the inference he deduces from it. As to a libel, the evidence is partly internal and partly external. The paper itself may not be compleat and conclusive evidence; for it may be dark and unintelligible without the inuendo's, which are the external evidence. There is no other name but that of libel applicable to the offence of libelling; and we know the offence specifically by that name, as we know the the offences of horse-stealing, forgery, &c. by the names which the law has annexed to them. But two reasons were urged why the law ought to be stated. First, it was said, that without it the court cannot judge whether it be a libel or not. The answer is, that the court ought not in this proceeding to give any judgment of that sort, as it would tend to pre-judication, to take away the office of a jury, and to create an improper influence. The other reason was, that unless the libel be stated, the court cannot be able to determine on the quantity of bail. I answer, that regard to the nature of the offence is the only necessary rule in bailing. As to the offence of a libel, it is an high misdemeanor, and good bail (having regard to the quality of the offender) should be required. But if the libel itself was stated, we could have no other measure of bailing than this. Besides, there has been no case shewn to warrant this reason, and it was not urged in the case of the seven bishops. But then it remains to be considered, whether Mr. Wilkes ought not to be discharged. The king's counsel have thought fit to admit, that he was a member of the house of commons, and we are bound to take notice of it. In the case of the seven bishops, the court took notice of their privilege from their description in the warrant. In the present case, there is no suit depending. Here no writ of privilege can therefore issue, no plea of privilege can be received. It rests, and must rest on the admission of the counsel for the crown: it is fairly before us upon that admission, and we are bound to determine it. In lord Coke 4 Inst. 24, 25. after shewing that privilege of parliament is consuable at common law, he says, that privilege generally holds, unless it be in three cases, viz. treason, felony, and the peace. We have not been able to have recourse to the original record, but in Cotton's Abridgement, fol. 596. you will find my lord Coke was right. The case I would refer to is that of William Lake, 9th of Hen. 6. who being a member's servant, and taken in execution for debt, was delivered by the privilege of the house of Commons; the book adds, (and for that purpose I refer to it) wherein is to be noted, that there is no cause to arrest any such man, but for treason, felony, and the peace. In the trial of the seven bishops, the words 'the peace' are explained to mean 'surety of the peace.' In the case of the King v. sir Thomas Culpepper, reported in 12 Mod. 108. Lord Holt says, that whereas it is said in our books, that privilege of parliament was not allowable in treason, felony, or breach of the peace, it must be intended where surety of the peace is desired, that it shall not protect a man against a supplicavit, but it holds as well in case of indictment, information for breach of the peace, as in case of actions. In the case of lord Tankerville a few years ago, which though not reported in any law book, is upon record in parliament, it was held, that bribery, being only a constructive, and not an actual breach of the peace, should not oust him of his privilege. There is no difference between the two houses of parliament in respect of privilege. The statutes of 12 & 13 Wil. 3. c. 3. and 2 & 3 An. c. 18. speak of the privilege of parliament in reference not to one house in particular, but to both houses. What then is the present case? Mr. Wilkes, a member of the house of commons, is committed for being the author and publisher of an infamous and seditious libel. Is a libel ipso facto in itself an actual breach of the peace? Mr. Dalton in his Justice of the Peace, fol. 289. defines a libel as a thing tending to the breach of the peace. In sir Baptist Hicks's case, Hob. 224. it is called a provocation to a breach of the peace. In Lev. 139. The King v. Summers, it was held to be an offence consuable before justices, because it tended to a breach of the peace. In Hawk. Pl. Cor. 193. chap. 73. sect. 3. it is called a thing directly tending to a breach of the public peace. Now, that that which tends only to the breach of the peace, is not an actual breach of it, is too plain a proposition to admit of argument. But if it was admitted that a libel was a breach of the peace, still privilege cannot be excluded, unless it requires surety of the peace; and there has been no precedent but that of the seven bishops cited to shew that sureties of the peace are requirable from a libeller; and as to the opinion of the three judges in that case, it only serves to shew the miserable state of justice in those days. Allybone, one of the three, was a rigid and professed (a) Papist; Wright and Holloway, I am much afraid, were placed there for doing jobs; and Powell, the only honest man upon the bench, gave no opinion at all. Perhaps it implies an absurdity to demand sureties of the peace from a libeller. However, what was done in the case of the seven bishops, I am bold to deny was law.

Upon the whole, though it should be admitted, that sureties of the peace are requirable from Mr. Wilkes, still his privilege of parliament will not be taken away till sureties have been demanded and refused. Let him be discharged.

(a) Burn. Hist. O. T. 745. 3 Mod. 239.

[This judgment for privilege of parliament in the case of libel, was taken into consideration by both houses at their first meeting afterwards. The discussion ended in a joint vote, by which it was resolved, "that the privilege of parliament doth not extend to the case of writing and publishing seditious libels, nor ought to be allowed to obstruct the ordinary course of the laws in the speedy and effectual prosecution of so heinous and dangerous an offence." Almon's Deb. Comm. for 1763. This resolution was not carried without a very strong contest. Of the debates on this occasion, no regular account has been yet published. But the Annual Register for 1763, gives a general view of the chief topics on each side; and the protest made against the resolution in the house of lords, contains a masterly and spirited argument against thus narrowing the privilege of parliament. This protest will appear by the following extract from the journal of the lords.]

Extract from the Journal of the Lords.

Die Martis, 29 Novembris, 1763.

THE order of the day for resuming the adjourned consideration of the report of the conference with the commons of Friday last being read; The third resolution of the commons was read, as follows:

Resolved, by the commons in parliament assembled, That privilege of parliament does not extend to the case of writing and publishing seditious libels, nor ought to be allowed to obstruct the ordinary course of the laws, in the speedy and effectual prosecution of so heinous and dangerous an offence.

And it being moved to agree with the commons in the said resolution; The same was objected to. After long debate thereupon,

The question was put, whether to agree with the commons in the said resolution?

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Dissentient,

Because we cannot hear without the utmost concern and astonishment, a doctrine advanced now, for the first time, in this house, which we apprehend to be new, dangerous, and unwarrantable, viz. that the personal privilege of both houses of parliament has never held, and ought not to hold, in the case of any criminal prosecution whatsoever; by which, all the records of parliament, all history, all the authorities of the gravest and soberest judges, are entirely rescinded; and the fundamental principles of the constitution, with regard to the independence of parliament, torn up and buried under the ruins of our most established rights.

We are at a loss to conceive, with what view such a sacrifice should be proposed, unless to amplify, in effect, the jurisdiction of the inferior, by annihilating the ancient immunities of this superior court.

The very question itself, proposed to us from the commons, and now agreed to by the lords, from the letter and spirit of it, contradicts this assertion; for, whilst it only narrows privilege in criminal matters, it establishes the principle. The law of privilege, touching imprisonment of the persons of lords of parliament, as stated by the two standing orders, declares generally, that no lord of parliament, sitting the parliament, or within the usual times of privilege of parliament, is to be imprisoned or restrained, without sentence or order of the house, unless it be for treason or felony, or for refusing to give security for the peace, and refusal to pay obedience to a writ of habeas corpus.

The first of these orders was made after long consideration, upon a dispute with the king, when the precedents of both houses had been fully inspected, commented upon, reported, and entered in the journals, and after the king's counsel had been heard. It was made in sober times, and by a house of peers, not only loyal, but devoted to the crown; and it was made by the unanimous consent of all, not one dissenting. These circumstances of solemnity, deliberation, and unanimity, are so singular and extraordinary, that the like are scarce to be found in any instance among the records of parliament.

When the two cases of surety for the peace, and habeas corpus, come to be well considered, it will be found that they both breathe the same spirit, and grow out of the same principle.

The offences, that call for surety and habeas corpus, are both cases of present continuing violence; the proceedings in both have the same end, viz. to repress the force, and to disarm the offender. The proceeding stops in both when that end is attained; the offence is not prosecuted or punished in either; the necessity is equal in both, and, if privilege was allowed in either, so long as the necessity lasts, a lord of parliament would enjoy a mightier prerogative than the crown itself is intitled to. Lastly, they both leave the prosecution of all misdemeanours still under privilege, and do not derogate from that great fundamental, that none shall be arrested in the course of prosecution for any crime under treason and felony.

These two orders comprise the whole law of privilege, and are both of them standing orders, and consequently the fixed laws of the house, by which we are all bound until they are duly repealed.

The resolution of the other house, now agreed to, is a direct contradiction to the rule of parliamentary privilege, laid down in the aforesaid standing orders, both in letter and spirit. Before the reasons are stated, it will be proper to premise two observations.

First, that in all cases where security of the peace may be required, the lord cannot be committed till that security is refused, and consequently the magistrate will be guilty of a breach of privilege, if he commits the offender without demanding that security.

Secondly, although the security should be refused, yet, if the party is committed generally, the magistrate is guilty of a breach of privilege, because the party refusing ought only to be committed till he has found sureties; whereas, by general commitment, he is held fast, even though he should give sureties, and can only be discharged by giving bail for his appearance.

This being premised, the first objection is to the generality of this resolution, which, as it is penned, denies the privilege to the supposed libeller, not only where he refuses to give sureties, but likewise throughout the whole prosecution, from the beginning to the end; so that, although he should submit to be bound, he may, notwithstanding, be afterwards arrested, tried, convicted, and punished, sitting the parliament, and without leave of the house, wherein the law of privilege is fundamentally misunderstood, by which no commitment whatsoever is tolerated, but that only which is made upon the refusal of the sureties, or in the other excepted cases of treason or felony, and the habeas corpus.

If privilege will not hold throughout in the case of a seditious libel, it must must be because that offence is such a breach of the peace, for which sureties may be demanded; and if it be so, it will readily be admitted, that the case comes within the exception, provided always, that sureties have been refused, and that the party is committed only till he shall give sureties.

But first, this offence is not a breach of the peace; it does not fall within any definition of a breach of the peace, given by any of the good writers upon that subject; all which breaches, from menace to actual wounding, either alone or with a multitude, are described to be acts of violence against the persons, goods, or possessions, putting the subject in fear by blows, threats or gestures. Nor is this case of the libeller ever enumerated in any of these writers among the breaches of peace; on the contrary, it is always described as an act tending to excite, provoke, or produce, breaches of the peace; and although a secretary of state may be pleased to add the enflaming epithets of treasonable, traitorous, or seditious, to a particular paper, yet no words are strong enough to alter the nature of things. To say then, that a libel, possibly productive of such a consequence, is the very consequence so produced, is, in other words, to declare, that the cause and the effect are the same thing.

But, secondly, if a libel could possibly, by any abuse of language, or has any where been called, inadvertently, a breach of the peace, there is not the least colour to say, that the libeller can be bound to give sureties for the peace, for the following reasons:

Because none can be so bound, unless he be taken in the actual commitment of a breach of the peace; striking, or putting some one or more of his majesty's subjects in fear:

Because there is no authority, or even ambiguous hint, in any law-book, that he may be so bound:

Because no libeller, in fact, was ever so bound:

Because no crown lawyer, in the most despotic times, ever insisted he should be so bound, even in days when the press swarmed with the most inveterate and virulent libels, and when the prosecutions raged with such uncommon fury against this species of offenders; when the law of libels was ransacked every term; when loss of ears, perpetual imprisonment, banishment, and fines of ten and twenty thousand pounds, were the common judgments in the Star-chamber; and when the crown had assumed an uncontrollable authority over the press.

Thirdly, this resolution does not only infringe the privilege of parliament, but points to the restraint of the personal liberty of every common subject in these realms, seeing that it does, in effect, affirm, that all men, without exception, may be bound to the peace for this offence.

By this doctrine every man's liberty, privileged as well as unprivileged, is surrendered into the hands of a secretary of state. He is by this means empowered, in the first instance, to pronounce the paper to be a seditious libel; a matter of such difficulty, that some have pretended, it is too high to be intrusted to a special jury of the first rank and condition: he is to understand, and decide by himself, the meaning of every innuendo: he is to determine the tendency thereof, and brand it with his own epithets: he is to adjudge the party guilty, and make him author or publisher, as he sees good: and lastly, he is to give sentence by committing the party. All these authorities are given to one single magistrate, unassisted by counsel, evidence, or jury, in a case where the law says, no action will lie against him, because he acts in the capacity of a judge.

From what has been observed, it appears to us, that the exception of a seditious libel from privilege is neither founded on usage or written precedents, and therefore this resolution is of the first impression; nay, it is not only a new law, narrowing the known and ancient rule, but it is likewise a law ex post facto, pendente lite, et ex parte, now first declared to meet with the circumstances of a particular case; and it must be further considered, that this house is thus called upon to give a sanction to the determinations of the other, who have not condescended to confer with us upon this point till they had prejudged it themselves.

This method of relaxing the rule of privilege, case by case, is pregnant with this farther inconvenience, that it renders the rule precarious and uncertain. Who can foretell where the house will stop, when they have, by one infringement of their own standing orders, made a precedent, whereon future infringements may, with equal reason, be founded? How shall the subject be able to proceed with safety in this perilous business? How can the judges decide on these or the like questions, if privilege is no longer to be found in records and journals, and standing orders? Upon any occasion privilege may be enlarged, and no court will venture for the future, without trembling, either to recognize or to deny it.

We manifestly see this effect of excluding, by a general resolution, one bailable offence from privilege to-day, that it will be a precedent for doing so by another, upon some future occasion, till, instead of privilege holding in every case not excepted, it will, at last, come to hold in none but such as are expressly saved.

When the case of the habeas corpus is relied upon, as a precedent to enforce the declaration, the argument only shews, that the mischief aforementioned has taken place already, since one alteration, though a very just one, not at all applicable to the present question, is produced to justify another that is unwarrantable.

But it is strongly objected, that if privilege be allowed in this case, a lord of parliament might endanger the constitution by a continual attack of successive libels; and if such a person should be suffered to escape, under the shelter of privilege, with perpetual impunity, all government would be overturned; and therefore it is inexpedient to allow the privilege now, when the time of privilege, by prorogations, is continued for ever, without an interval.

This objection shall be answered in two ways. First, if inexpediency is to destroy personal privilege in this case of a seditious libel, it is at least as inexpedient, that other great misdemeanors should stand under the like protection of privilege; neither is it expedient, that the smaller offences should be exempt from a prosecution in the person of a lord of parliament; so that if this argument of inexpediency is to prevail, it must prevail throughout, and subvert the whole law of privilege in criminal matters; in which method of reasoning there is this fault, that the argument proves too much.

If this inconvenience be indeed grievous, the fault is not in the law of privilege; but in the change of times, and in the management of prerogations by the servants of the crown, which are so contrived, as not to leave an hour open for justice. Let the objection nevertheless be allowed in its utmost extent, and then compare the inexpediency of not immediately prosecuting on one side, with the inexpediency of stripping the parliament of all protection from privilege on the other. Unhappy as the option is, the public would rather wish to see the prosecution for crimes suspended, than the parliament totally unprivileged; although, notwithstanding this pretended inconvenience is so warmly magnified on the present occasion, we are not apprised that any such inconvenience has been felt, though the privilege has been enjoyed time immemorial.

But the second and best answer, because it removes all pretence of grievance, is this; that this house, upon complaint made, has the power (which it will exert in favour of justice) to deliver up the offender to prosecution.

It is a dishonourable and an undeserved imputation upon the lords, to suppose, even in argument, that they would nourish an impious criminal in their bosoms, against the call of offended justice, and the demand of their country.

It is true, however, and it is hoped, that this house will always see (as every magistrate ought that does not betray his trust) that their member is properly charged; but when that ground is once laid, they would be ashamed to protect the offender one moment. Surely this trust (which has never yet been abused) is not too great to be reposed in the high court of parliament! While it is lodged there, the public justice is in safe hands, and the privilege untouched; whereas, on the contrary, if for the sake of coming at the criminal at once, without this application to the house, personal privilege is taken away, not only the offender, but the whole parliament, at the same time, is delivered up to the crown.

It is not to be conceived, that our ancestors, when they framed the law of privilege, would have left the case of a seditious libel (as it is called) the only unprivileged misdemeanor. Whatever else they had given up to the crown, they would have guarded the case of supposed libels above all others with privilege, as being most likely to be abused by outrageous and vindictive prosecutions.

But this great privilege had a much deeper reach. It was wisely planned, and hath hitherto, through all times, been resolutely maintained.

It was not made to screen criminals, but to preserve the very being and life of parliament; for when our ancestors considered, that the law had lodged the great powers of arrest, indictment, and information, in the crown, they saw the parliament would be undone, if, during the time of privilege, the royal process should be admitted in any misdemeanor whatsoever. Therefore they excepted none. Where the abuse of power would be fatal, the power ought never to be given; because redress comes too late.

A parliament under perpetual terror of imprisonment can neither be free, nor bold, nor honest; and if this privilege was once removed, the most important question might be irrecoverably lost, or carried by a sudden irruption of messengers, let loose against the members half an hour before the debate.

Lastly, as it has already been observed, the case of supposed libels is, of all others, the most dangerous and alarming to be left open to prosecution during the time of privilege.

If the severity of the law touching libels, as it hath sometimes been laid down, be duly weighed, it must strike both houses of parliament with terror and dismay.

The repetition of a libel, the delivery of it unread to another, is said to be a publication; nay, the bare possession of it has been deemed criminal, unless it is immediately destroyed, or carried to a magistrate.

Every lord of parliament then, who hath done this, who is falsely accused, nay, who is, though without any information, named in the secretary of state's warrant, has lost his privilege by this resolution, and lies at the mercy of that great enemy to learning and liberty, the messenger of the press.

For these and many other forcible reasons, we hold it highly becoming the dignity, gravity, and wisdom of the house of peers, as well as their justice, thus judicially to explain away and diminish the privilege of their persons, founded in the wisdom of ages, declared with precision in our standing orders, so repeatedly confirmed, and hitherto preserved inviolable by the spirit of our ancestors, called to it only by the other house, on a particular occasion, and to serve a particular purpose, ex post facto, ex parte, et pendente lite in the courts below.

No. III. Proceedings on Error in an Action of false Imprisonment by Dryden Leach, against John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore, three King's Messengers, King's-Bench, Easter Term, 5 G. III. and Michaelmas Term, 6 Geo. III. 1765.

[These proceedings, though in the case of a civil action, fully come within the idea of a state trial. They grew out of the prosecutions for the printing and publishing No. 45. of the political paper called The North-Briton, and involve the discussion of several points relative to matters of the most public nature, namely, the magisterial powers claimed as incident to the office of secretary of state, the seizure of papers, and the legality of general warrants. The case is entirely taken from sir James Burrow's report. See 3 Burr. 1692 and 1742. Easter term, Friday 17 May, 1765.]

Easter Term, 5 Geo. III.

SOON after the court sat, the lord chief justice Pratt came personally into court; to confess (ore tenus) his seal put to a bill of exceptions in this case; pursuant to the requisition of the following writ, viz.

'George the third, &c.—To our trusty and well-beloved Charles Pratt, knight, our chief justice of the bench, greeting.—Whereas we have lately been informed that in the record and process, and also in giving of judgment in a plaint which was in our court before you and your associates, our justices of the said bench, by our writ, between Dryden Leach, and John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore, in a plea of trespass, assault, and imprisonment, manifest error hath intervened, to the great damage of the said John James and Robert; which said record and process, for the error aforesaid, we have caused to be brought into our court before us; and now, on the behalf of the said John James and Robert, we are informed, in our said court before us, that at the trial of the issue first joined between the said parties in the plea aforesaid, the counsel, learned in the law, of the said John James and Robert alleged on their behalf certain exceptions to the opinion then declared and given by you; and that the said exceptions were then and there written in a certain bill, to which you put your seal, at the request of the said John James and Robert, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided; and the said John James and Robert have brought into our court before us the said bill, with your seal put to the same, as it is said; whereupon the said John James and Robert have besought us to do what further should seem meet to be done in this behalf, according to the form of the said statute; and forasmuch as by the said statute it is ordained, that in such case the justice whose seal should be put to such exception be commanded to appear before us at a certain day, to confess or deny his seal; therefore we command you that you personally appear before us, on the morrow of the ascension of our Lord; wherefore we shall then be in England, to confess or deny the seal so put to the said bill of exceptions as aforesaid to be your seal, according to the form and effect of the said statute; and that you bring with you, at the same time, this writ. Witness William lord Mansfield, at Westminster, the 24th day of April, in the fifth year of our reign.'

N. B. The bill of exceptions, sealed by lord chief justice Pratt, had been previously brought into this court, and was now in the hands of Mr. Owen, as secondary of the office of pleas; and all the proceedings, down to and including the abovementioned writ, were entered upon the rolls of this court.

The lord chief justice Pratt being now come into this court, pursuant to the command contained in the said writ, delivered it to the lord chief justice of this court; Mr. Owen, at the same time, delivering the original bill of exceptions into lord Mansfield's hand. Whereupon lord Mansfield, shewing to lord chief justice Pratt the seal thereto affixed, asked him, 'Whether that was his lordship's seal, or not.' To which question his lordship answering in the affirmative, lord Mansfield redelivered the bill of exceptions to Mr. Owen; at the same time delivering to him the abovementioned writ, with orders 'that it should be filed.'

Note—There was no written return to this writ; but Mr. Owen proposes to indorse upon it—'Sir Charles Pratt, knight, the chief justice within named, personally appeared in the court of the lord the king, before the king himself, &c. on the day within written; and confesseth that the seal put to the bill of exceptions within mentioned is his seal.'

Mich. Term, 6 Geo. III. Roll 60.

ERRORS having been assigned upon the bill of exceptions mentioned above, they now came on to be argued.

This was an action of trespass brought in the court of Common Pleas by Dryden Leach, against three king's messengers, John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore, for breaking and entering the plaintiff's house, and imprisoning him, without any lawful or probable cause; to the plaintiff's damage of 2000l.

The defendants below pleaded two pleas. The first was the general issue, 'Not guilty,' on which issue was joined.

The other plea (pleaded by leave of the court) was a special justification, as to the breaking and entering of the plaintiff's dwelling-house, and staying and continuing therein for six hours, and making the assault upon him, and seizing, taking, and imprisoning him, and keeping and detaining him in prison for four days: as to all which, they say, That before the commitment of the supposed trespass, viz. on 19th April 1763, the king made a speech from the throne, &c. in which speech was contained the following declaration, &c. &c. That on the 23d April 1763, a certain seditious and scandalous libel or composition, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45,' was unlawfully and seditiously composed, printed and published, concerning the king and his said speech; in which libel were contained, &c. &c. That the earl of Halifax was then one of the privy council, and one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state; and that information was given to him of the said publication of the aforesaid libel; and the said libel was then shewn and produced to the said earl; and he thereupon in due manner issued his warrant in writing under his hand and seal, directed to Nathan Carrington and these three defendants, who were then four of his majesty's messengers in ordinary; by which warrant, the said earl did in his majesty's name authorize and require them, taking a constable to their assistance, to make strict and diligent search for the said authors, printers and publishers of the aforesaid seditious libel, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45, April the 23d, 1763; and them or any of them having found, to apprehend and seize, together with their papers, and to bring in safe custody before the said earl, to be examined concerning the premises, and to be further dealt with according to law: in the due execution whereof, all mayors, sheriffs, justices of the peace, constables, and all others his said majesty's messengers, officers civil and military, and loving subjects whom it might concern, were to be aiding and assisting to them the said Nathan Carrington, John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore, as there should be occasion. They further say, that for forty-four weeks and upwards before the issuing of the said warrant, certain weekly compositions, intitled, 'The North Briton,' and respectively numbered in a progressive order, had been printed and published on Saturday in every week; and that the said seditious libel, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45, Saturday April the 23d, 1763,' was one of the said weekly compositions. They say that the plaintiff followed and exercised the art and business of a printer; and did in fact print and cause to be printed one of the said weekly compositions, intitled, 'The North Briton,' to wit, the North Briton, No. 26. and that after the issuing of the aforesaid warrant, and before the committing of the said supposed trespass, to wit, on the 27th of April, 1763, information was given to them the defendants, that the said Dryden Leach and his servants were the printers of the aforesaid seditious libel, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45, Saturday, April the 23d, 1763.' Wherefore the defendants, being his majesty's messengers in ordinary as aforesaid, took to their assistance a certain constable, to wit, one Thomas Freeman, who was then a constable of the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, to aid them in the execution of the aforesaid warrant; and, together with the said constable, entered into the aforesaid dwelling-house of the said Dryden Leach, in which the said Dryden Leach carried on his aforesaid business of a printer, the door thereof being then open, to search for the printers of the said seditious libel, in order to carry them before the said earl of Halifax, to be examined concerning the same: and thereupon, the said defendants, together with the constable aforesaid, did then and there find, within the same house, a newly-printed copy of one of the said weekly compositions, intitled, 'The North Briton,' and also an unfinished copy of part of another of the said compositions then also newly printed, and which said newly-printed copies were part of a new edition, which the said Dryden Leach and his servants were then and there reprinting, of the aforesaid weekly compositions. Whereupon the defendants, together with the constable abovenamed, did gently lay their hands on the said Dryden Leach, and seized and took him into their custody, in order to bring him before the said earl of Halifax, to be examined concerning the said seditious libel; and in so searching for the printers of the seditious libel, and seizing and taking the said Dryden Leach as aforesaid, did then and there necessarily stay and continue in the said house of the said Dryden Leach for the space of six hours, part of the time in the declaration mentioned. And because the said earl of Halifax was, during all the said space of four days, part of the aforesaid five days in the said declaration mentioned, employed in other business belonging to his said office of secretary of state, so that the said Dryden Leach could not then, or during the

the said four days be brought before the said earl for the purpose aforesaid, they the said defendants, together with the constable aforesaid, did keep and detain the said Dryden Leach in their custody for the said space of four days, part of the said time in the declaration mentioned, in order to carry him before the said earl of Halifax for the purpose aforesaid. They further say, that at the end of the aforesaid four days, and not before, upon the examination of the said Dryden Leach and certain other persons who were then and there examined concerning the premises, it appeared to the said earl of Halifax, 'that the said Dryden Leach did not print the said seditious libel' intitled 'The North Briton, No. 45. Saturday April the 23d, 1763:' and thereupon, the said defendants, by the command of the said earl of Halifax, did then and there release the said Dryden Leach out of their custody, and discharged and set him free from that imprisonment. Which are the same breaking and entering of the aforesaid dwelling-house of the said Dryden Leach, in the declaration mentioned, in which, &c. and staying and continuing therein for the space of six hours, part of the time in the same declaration mentioned; and also as to the making of the aforesaid assault upon the said Dryden Leach, and seizing, taking and imprisoning of the said Dryden Leach, and detaining him in prison for the space of four days, part of the said time in the said declaration mentioned, above supposed to have been done by the defendants, whereof the said Dryden hath above complained against them. And this they are ready to verify. Wherefore they pray judgment, if the said Dryden ought to have or maintain his aforesaid action thereof against them, &c.

The plaintiff replied, as to the said plea in bar as to the breaking and entering the dwelling-house, and staying and continuing there six hours (part of the time in the declaration mentioned), and also as to the making of the assault upon him, and seizing, taking and imprisoning of him, and keeping and detaining him in prison for four days (part of the time in the declaration mentioned); that the defendants, of their own wrong and without the cause by them in their plea alleged, broke and entered his dwelling-house, and staid and continued therein for six hours, and made an assault upon him, and seized, took and imprisoned him, and kept and detained him in prison for the four days in the plea mentioned (part of the time in the declaration mentioned), in manner and form as he has above complained against them. And upon this issue was joined.

The cause came on to be tried before lord chief justice Pratt, on the 10th of December 1763, at Guildhall: and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff upon both issues; and gave him damages 400*l.* besides his costs and charges, &c. On the 16th of June 1764, judgment was signed for the plaintiff, for 400*l.* damages, and 51*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* costs.

At the trial, a bill of exceptions was tendered and received; which stated the issues, the coming on to trial, &c. and the evidence, and described a printed paper, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45.' and the information given thereof to the secretary of state, and his warrant to the defendants below, together with another king's messenger, Nathan Carrington; and what Mr. Carrington had been told of Mr. Leach's being the printer of it; and their thereupon entering his house, and finding some of the other numbers of the same paper newly printed by him; and their thereupon taking him into custody, in order to carry him before the earl of Halifax, one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state; and that he, appearing not to be either author, printer or publisher of the said paper, called, 'The North Briton, No. 45,' was discharged by them, by the earl's order, without being ever carried before him. They say, that their evidence intitled them to the benefit of the statute of 24 George 2. c. 44. Though it was denied by the counsel for the plaintiff Leach, that either they or the secretary of state himself were within that statute, or those of 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. or 21 Jac. 1. c. 12. (the former of which, being only temporary, was made perpetual by the latter, and by which liberty is given to justices of peace and all others acting under their command 'to plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence.')

That the chief justice of the Common Pleas was of opinion, 'that their evidence was not sufficient to bar the plaintiff of his action: whereas, the bill of exceptions insists 'that it was.'

This bill of exceptions being sealed, and the seal acknowledged, as is beforementioned, the defendants below assign errors: and a joinder in error was put in by the plaintiff Leach.

The assignment of errors was to the following effect: (It may be seen at large, in the 60th roll of Easter term, 5 Geo. 3. B. R.)

The defendants come, on Wednesday next after fifteen days of Easter, 4 Geo. 3. before our lord the king at Westminster, and say, That at the trial, their counsel proposed exceptions to the opinion of the lord chief justice Pratt; which exceptions were written in a bill, and sealed by the chief justice: which bill of exceptions the defendants now bring into this court, and pray a writ to the chief justice, to confess or deny his seal; which writ is granted to them, returnable on the morrow of the ascension. At which day, before our lord the king at Westminster, come the defendants in their proper person, and the said chief justice of the Common Pleas likewise in his proper person, and acknowledges his seal put to the said bill of exceptions. [The form and ceremony of his doing this may be seen in the preceding page] Then they set out the bill of exceptions, verbatim, 'Be it remembered, &c.' It recites all the proceedings particularly and minutely, from the very beginning to the end, concluding with the verdict of the jury: which it would be tedious to repeat, as they have been already sufficiently specified. (They are entered upon the rolls 549 and 550 of the court of Common Pleas, in Michaelmas term, 4 Geo. 3.) The defendants (now become plaintiffs in error) then allege, (in their said bill of exceptions) that upon the trial, the counsel for the plaintiff Leach, in order to prove the defendants guilty of the trespasss, gave in evidence, 'that on the 29th of April 1763, the defendants entered the plaintiff's dwelling-house, searched it, and continued in it four hours; seized and took Leach into their custody against his will and consent; and kept and detained him in their custody against his will and consent for four days: which was all the trespasss, assault and imprisonment, committed by the defendants, or any of them. Whereupon their counsel, in order to bar the said action, and to acquit them thereof under the general issue above pleaded, gave in evidence and proved, 'That before the committing of the trespasss, the king made a speech from the throne, &c. containing the several expressions stated in the second plea of the defendants; and that afterwards and before the supposed trespasss, a paper, intitled, The North Briton, No. 45. &c. was printed and published; and that the same contained the several matters set forth in their said second plea: and it was proved on their behalf, 'that the earl of Halifax was, all that time, one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, and one of the privy council; and that information was given to him of the said publication of the abovementioned paper; and the same was then shewn to him; and that thereupon the said earl issued his warrant in writing, under his hand and seal, directed to Nathan Carrington and the defendants, who were then four of his majesty's messengers in ordinary.' And their counsel then produced and gave in evidence the warrant aforesaid, which was in the words and figures following, that is to say, 'George Montagu Dunk, earl of Halifax, viscount Sunbury, and baron Halifax, one of the lords of his majesty's most honourable privy council, lieutenant-general of his majesty's forces, and principal secretary of state, &c.—These are in his majesty's name to authorize and require you, taking a constable to your assistance, to make strict and diligent search for the authors, printers and publishers of a seditious and treasonable paper, intitled, The North Briton, No. 45. Saturday April 23, 1763, printed for G. Kearsly in Ludgate Street, London; and them or any of them having found, to apprehend and seize, together with their papers, and to bring in safe custody before me, to be examined concerning the premises, and further dealt with according to law. In the due execution whereof, all mayors, sheriffs, justices of the peace, constables, and all others his majesty's officers civil and military, and loving subjects whom it may concern, are to be aiding and assisting to you, as there shall be occasion. And for your so doing, this shall be your warrant. Given at St. James's, the 26th day of April 1763, in the third year of his majesty's reign. Dunk Halifax. To Nathan Carrington, John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore, four of his majesty's messengers in ordinary.' And it was farther proved on behalf of the said defendants, 'that several of the like warrants had been granted, at different times, from the time of the Revolution to the present time, by the principal secretaries of state, and had been executed by the messengers in ordinary for the time being; and that the paper in the said warrant described was the said paper so printed and published as aforesaid; and that the warrant aforesaid, before the committing of the supposed trespasss, to wit, on the 26th day of April aforesaid, in the year of our Lord 1763, was delivered to the defendants, to be executed; and that they were then three of his majesty's messengers in ordinary, and still are so.' It was also proved, on their behalf, that for forty weeks and upwards next before the issuing of the aforesaid warrant, certain weekly compositions, intitled, 'The North Briton,' had been printed and published on Saturday on every week; and that the aforesaid paper, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45, Saturday April 23, 1763,' described in the said warrant, being one of the said weekly compositions, was printed and published before the issuing of the said warrant; to wit, on the 23d day of April 1763; and that after the issuing of the abovementioned warrant, and before the committing of the said supposed trespasss, to wit, on the 28th day of April, in the year aforesaid, the defendants were informed by Nathan Carrington, one other of the messengers in the said warrant named, and one of the persons to whom the said warrant was directed, that from the information he had received, he was of opinion, that the said Dryden Leach, who then and long before was, and still is a printer in the city of London aforesaid, was the printer of the said weekly compositions, intitled, 'The North Briton;' for that he the said Carrington had been informed that one Mr. Wilkes, a person supposed to be the author of the said weekly compositions, had been seen frequently to go into the said Mr. Leach's house; and that an old printer, whose name he the said Carrington did not mention to the defendants, had told him, that the said Mr. Leach was the printer of the said compositions; and that thereupon the defendants took to their assistance a constable, and with the constable entered Leach's dwelling-house (the door being open) to search for the said Leach and his books and papers; and to bring him, together with his books and papers, in safe custody, before the said earl of Halifax, to be examined concerning the premises, and to be further dealt with according to law; and upon that occasion did search the said house, and necessarily continued therein for the said space of four hours.' And it was further given in evidence and proved, on the part of the said defendants, 'That upon that search, the defendants did find Leach in the said house, and did also then find a newly-printed sheet, containing a copy of one of the said weekly compositions, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 1.' and part of a copy of another of the said weekly compositions, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 2.' which sheet was printed by the said Dryden Leach.' And it was further proved, 'that the said Dryden Leach did also print one of the said weekly compositions, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 26.' And the defendants, with the assistance of the constable, did seize and take into their custody the said Dryden Leach, in order to bring him in safe custody before the said earl of Halifax, to be examined concerning the premises; and on that occasion did keep and detain him in their custody for the space of four days; at the end of which time, it appearing by the examinations of divers persons then taken, touching the author, printer and publisher of the said paper, that the said Dryden Leach was not the author, printer or publisher thereof, the defendants, by the command of the said earl of Halifax, released and discharged him from that imprisonment; but the said Dryden Leach was never carried before or examined by the said earl of Halifax. And that the entering the house of the said Dryden Leach, and searching the same, and taking into and detaining in their custody him the said Dryden Leach in the manner and on the occasion herein before stated, were the whole of the trespasss, assault and imprisonment, committed by the said defendants, or any of them.' But it was proved on the part of the said Dryden Leach, that he was not the author, printer, or publisher of the said paper, intitled, 'The North Briton, No. 45.' in the said warrant mentioned, nor of any other numbers of the said weekly compositions, except as before stated. Whereupon the counsel for the defendants insisted before the said chief justice, that the said several matters so produced and given in evidence on their part as aforesaid, were sufficient, and ought to be admitted and allowed as decisive evidence to intitle them to the benefit of the statute of 24 Geo. 2. intitled, 'An act for rendering justices of the peace more safe in the execution of their office, and for indemnifying constables and others acting in obedience to their warrants;' and that therefore the said Dryden Leach ought to be barred of his aforesaid action, and the said defendants acquitted thereof. And thereupon the said defendants, by their counsel aforesaid, did then and there pray of the said chief justice to admit and allow the said matters and proof so produced and given in evidence for the said defendants as aforesaid, to be conclusive evidence to intitle the said defendants to the benefit of the statute aforesaid, and to bar the said Dryden Leach of his action aforesaid. But to this, the counsel for the plaintiff then and there insisted before the chief justice, that the matters and evidence aforesaid so produced and proved on the part of the defendants as aforesaid, were not sufficient, nor ought to be admitted or allowed to intitle the said defendants to the benefit of the statute aforesaid, or to bar the said Dryden Leach of his aforesaid action; and that neither the said defendants, or any of them, nor the said earl of Halifax, were or was within the words or meaning of the statute made in the seventh year of his late majesty king James the first, intitled, 'An act for ease in pleading against troublesome and contentious suits prosecuted against justices of the peace, mayors, constables, and certain other his majesty's officers, for the lawful execution of their office;' nor of the statute made in the twenty-first year of the reign of the same late king, intitled, 'An act to enlarge and make perpetual the act made for ease in pleading against troublesome and contentious suits, prosecuted against justices of the peace, mayors, constables, and certain other his majesty's officers, for the lawful execution of their office, made in the seventh year of his majesty's most happy reign;' nor of the said statute made in the twenty-fourth year of the reign of his late majesty king George the second; nor in any wise intitled to the benefit of any of those statutes. And the counsel for the said Dryden Leach further insisted, that the seizure and imprisonment of the said Dryden Leach were not made and done in obedience to the said warrant; nor had the said defendants, or any of them, in that behalf, any authority thereby. And the said chief justice did then and there declare and deliver his opinion to the jury aforesaid, 'That the said several matters so produced and proved on the part of the defendants were not, upon the whole case, sufficient to bar the said Dryden Leach of his aforesaid action against them;' and, with that opinion, left the same to the said jury. Whereupon the said counsel for the said defendants did then and there, on behalf of the said defendants, except to the aforesaid opinion of the said chief justice; and insisted on the said several matters and proofs as an absolute bar to the aforesaid action, by virtue of the last mentioned statute. And inasmuch as the said several matters so produced and given in evidence on the part of the said defendants, and by their counsel aforesaid objected and insisted on as a bar to the action aforesaid, do not appear by the record of the verdict aforesaid, the said counsel for the aforesaid defendants did then and there propose their aforesaid exception to the opinion of the said chief justice, and requested the said chief justice to put his seal to this bill of exception, containing the said several matters so produced and given in evidence on the part of the said defendants as aforesaid, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided: and thereupon the aforesaid chief justice, at the request of the said counsel for the abovenamed defendants, did put his seal to this bill of exception, pursuant to the aforesaid statute in such case made and provided, on the tenth day of December aforesaid, in the said fourth year of the reign of his said present majesty.

C. PRATT. l. s.

And hereupon the said John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore say, that in the record and proceedings aforesaid, and also in the matters recited and contained in the said bill of exceptions, and also in giving the verdict upon the said issue between the parties aforesaid first above joined, and also in giving the judgment aforesaid, there is manifest error, in this, that the said chief justice, before whom, &c. at and upon the trial of the said issue between the parties aforesaid first above joined, did declare and deliver his opinion to the jury aforesaid, 'That the said several matters mentioned in the said bill of exceptions, and so as aforesaid produced and proved on the part of the said John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore, were not, upon the whole of the case, sufficient to bar the said Dryden Leach of his action aforesaid against them;' and, with that opinion, left the same to the jury. There is also error in this, that by the record aforesaid it appears, that the verdict aforesaid was given upon the said issue first above joined, for the said Dryden Leach, against them the said John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore: whereas, by the law of the land, the verdict on that issue ought to have been given for the said John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore, against the said Dryden Leach. There is also error in this, that it appears by the record aforesaid, that judgment in form aforesaid was given for the said Dryden Leach, against them the said John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore: whereas, by the law of the land, the judgment aforesaid ought to have been given for them the said John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore, against the said Dryden Leach. And the said John Money, James Watson, and Robert Blackmore, pray that the judgment aforesaid, for the errors aforesaid, and others in the record and proceedings aforesaid, may be reversed, annulled, and altogether had for nothing; and that they may be restored to all which they have lost by reason of the judgment aforesaid, &c.

And hereupon, the said Dryden Leach, in his proper person, voluntarily comes here into court, and prays leave to rejoin to the errors aforesaid, before our lord the king, until on the morrow of the Holy Trinity, wherefore, &c. and he hath it, &c. The same day is given to the said J. M. J. W. and R. B. At which day come the parties aforesaid in their proper persons: and the said Dryden Leach says, 'that there is not, either in the record and proceedings aforesaid, or in the matters recited and contained in the said bill of exceptions, or in giving the verdict aforesaid, or in the judgment aforesaid, any error;' and prays that the court here may proceed to the examination as well of the record and proceedings, as of the matters aforesaid above assigned for error; and that the judgment aforesaid may be affirmed in all things.

This case was first argued on Tuesday the 18th of June last, by Mr. Solicitor General De Grey for the plaintiffs in error; and by Mr. Dunning for the defendant in error.

Mr. De Grey divided his argument into three points.

1st, The defendants had a right to plead the general issue, and to give the special matter in evidence, under 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. Or, in other words, lord Halifax, the secretary of state, was a justice of peace, within the intension of that act.

2dly, The evidence was sufficient to intitle the defendants to a verdict. Which will take in both the validity of the warrant itself, and the manner of executing it.

3dly, They were also intitled to a verdict within the meaning of 24 Geo. 2. c. 44. the plaintiff not having observed the terms required by it.

First point—Before the statute of 7 Jac. c. 5. a matter of special justification could not be given in evidence by a justice of peace, upon the general issue pleaded by him.

The question is—Who were meant, in that act of parliament, by justices of the peace.

Some persons were, from ancient times, so, by office; some are so by special commission; some, by corporation-charters; some, by tenure; some, by prescription.

In the time of Edward the third, other persons were authorized to act within particular districts.

But the great officers of state had the jurisdiction, as incident to their offices. So had, in some degree, coroners and other inferior officers.

The secretaries of state must have had it as incident to an office, so anciently as to be coeval with the crown itself.

A statute in Edward the first's reign says, * 'Desouth le Petit Seale, ne issira desormes nul briefe que touche le common ley.' And lord Coke, in his comment upon it, in his 2 Inst.
556. calls it the Signetum, the king's signet, which at the making of that statute the king had; and says—'This seale is ever in the custody of the principal secretary: and there be four clerks of the signet attending on him.'

This seal is as ancient as the crown; and the officer that keeps it, as ancient as the seal itself: and he is an officer well known, and recognized by many acts of parliament; and the king's warrants are countersigned by him.

In cases of treason, and of felony, the courts of law recognize his authority: and there is equal reason for it, in cases of misdemeanour; which equally affect government, and disturb the public peace.

A seditious libel is an offence against government and the public peace; and effectually undermines government.

A secretary of state is a centinel for the public peace: it is his duty to prevent the violation of it, and to bring the offenders to justice; and it is necessary that he should be invested with this power, in order to enable him to execute this his duty.

The case of Rex v. Kendal and Roe, 1 Salk. 347+. has settled this point, as to treason: for it was there holden, 'that secretaries of state might commit for suspicion of treason, as conservators of the peace did at common law; and that it was incident to the office, as it is to the office of justices of peace, who do it ratione officij.' And the commitment to a messenger was there holden good.

In the case of the Queen v. Derby B. R. 1709, 10 Ann. † for publishing a scandalous and seditious libel called The Observer—the two points abovementioned were admitted by Mr. Lechmere, who was counsel for the defendant. He agreed, the power of a secretary of state to commit for treason or felony; and that a messenger was a proper officer. And in that case, the court held the warrant good and legal.

In the case of Rex v. Earbury, M. 7 G. 2. 1733, who was arrested and committed by warrant from a secretary of state; and his papers seized, which he applied to have restored; lord Hardwicke held, that they could not be restored, in a summary way, on motion. The warrant there was, 'to search for the papers, and to bring the author before the secretary of state.'

The statute of 1 E. 3. enacts, 'for the better keeping, and maintenance of the peace, good men and lawful shall in every county be assigned to keep the peace.' So, 4 E. 3. c. 2.

The 18 E. 3. stat. 2. c. 2. is the first statute that gives the judicature of hearing and determining: 34 E. 3. c. 5. enlarges their powers. The 2 H. 5. c. 4. † calls them by the express name of 'Justices of the peace.' Their commission impowers them to keep the peace; and also contains a distinct clause 'to hear and determine.'

Therefore, the old conservators of the peace still remain. They have also power to hear and determine as justices. They are wardens of the peace too, by their commission, as well as by common law: and they may likewise by the common law, without any special commission or warrant, use force to suppress rebels. For which last assertion, he cited Kelyng 76.

‡ V. Stat. 1.
c. 4. § 2. and
Stat. 2. c. 2.

The statute of 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. (about pleading the general issue), means to protect all that act as conservators, or wardens, or justices of the peace, as well as those that act under special commissions.

The act of 2 Ph. and M. c. 18. (relating to corporation-justices) calls them 'Commissioners for the conservation of the peace.' Justice of peace is not a strict technical name: they may be called Custodes pacis. In 2 Rol. Abr. 95. Title, Justices de Peace, it is said, 'That an indictment taken before them, naming them Custodes pacis, and not Justices of the peace (as the statute names them) is a good indictment: for it is all one.' It is not material how the appointment is made. The statutes mean to include all conservators of the peace: they may all now plead the general issue, and give the special matter in evidence. The act of 7 Jac. 1. c. 5. does not indeed extend to any justices sitting in sessions: it only extends to them in their single jurisdiction.

The statute of 11 H. 6. c. 6. 'that suits and processes before justices of the peace shall not be discontinued by new commissioners,' is no exception to this rule: neither is 2 H. 5. Stat. 1. c. 4. § 2. 'that justices of the peace of the quorum shall be resident in their shire; (except lords named in the commission, &c. &c.)'

Acts of parliament shall be taken with latitude, and extended to cases within the same reason, and calling for the same remedy. Plowd. 366. lord Zouch's case. Co. Litt. 24. b. 10 Co. 101. b. Bousage's case. Plowd. 147. Jhon v. Studd. Plowd. 36. Platt v. The sheriffs of London. Bro. Parliament 20. Wentworth's office of executors 67. Sir T. Jones 62. Plummer v. Whitbeor.

The rule about 'several particulars of an inferior nature being enumerated, excluding those that are of a higher nature and not enumerated,' will not hold here. This act is not done as a higher officer; but only as a justice of peace. The bishop of Norwich being named, extended to all bishops: so the warden of the Fleet being named, extends to all gaolers. In Moore 845. Phelps v. Winchcombe, it was resolved, 'that a deputy constable may, by the equity of the statute of 7 J. 1. c. 5. plead the general issue.'

Persons acting for preservation of the public peace ought to be protected: and these old conservators of it are more reasonably intitled to protection, than other persons are.

Second point---If the special matter may be given in evidence, then the question will be, 'Whether this matter given in evidence would, if it had been pleaded, amount to a justification.'

It is objected, 'that the warrant is not legal; and that it was ill executed.'

1st, As to the warrant itself---No such action has ever been brought upon these warrants, by persons apprehended by virtue of them: or, at least, there is none upon record.

It is said, 'that this warrant is too extensive in the description of the person: and that it has been abused.'

Answer---The power is not illegal: and the abuse of it is no objection to the warrant itself. Such warrants are agreeable to long practice and usage.

Whatever the present determination may be, in point of law, it will be in the breast of the legislature to set it right.

In the Bewdley case, reported 1 Peere Williams 207. (Regina v. Balliwos, &c. of Bewdley) a construction of an act of parliament contrary to the words of it was allowed, founded upon only seven years practice. In Comberb. 342. The India Company v. Skinner---where the warrant was granted before any default; Holt said, 'that the practice having been, in case of taxes, to grant a conditional warrant to distrain, Communis error facit jus.'

The power of justices of peace 'to commit before indictment,' stands supported only by practice and usage. In 6 Mod. 178. Regina v. Tracy, Holt Ch. J. says, 'Formerly, none could be taken up for a misdemeanor, till indictment found; but now the practice all over England is otherwise.' And per Holt, 'That practice is become a law.' So likewise has usage and practice established Acciams, Quo minus, new trials, &c.

The greatest judges have bailed persons taken up upon these warrants; and they have not been objected to, by either courts, or counsel of the greatest eminence: whereas, if they were not legal, the persons apprehended upon them ought to have been discharged. For which he cited, 1 Hale's Hist. P. C. 578. The court will not make orders upon illegal warrants: consequently, they saw no objection to them. Even the greatest friends to the Revolution have not objected to these warrants. From whence it must be inferred, that no objection lies against them.

On 6 July, 1641, in the case of Sir John Elliott, &c. the house of commons resolved, that it was a breach of privilege: but they did not vote it illegal.

Lord Hardwicke, in Earbury's case, only said, 'He would not then determine it.'

In treason, it will scarce be objected to; nor in felony.

In Miss Blandy's case, her bureau was broken open: and her papers seized; and given in evidence.

Indecent prints or books may be seized by a magistrate: and they often have been so.

Evidence taken from felons or other criminals may be produced against them; though a criminal shall not be compelled to produce such evidence against himself.

It is said, 'that this warrant is illegal, because it is general, to take up the author, printer, or publisher.' But it is legal to issue and execute a warrant against a person unknown, but only described. Indeed the magistrate issues it, and the officer must execute it, at their peril. And though the warrant includes seizing the papers, yet that part of it has not been executed: and the bare insertion of it shall not affect the officer who executed the other part of the warrant.

The facts are these---A warrant was directed to four messengers: Car-rington, one of them, is informed, 'that Leach was the printer: and that the reputed author was frequently at Leach's house.' The other three act on this information. And this information was not groundless: for they found a sheet of another number, wet and just printed. They take him up, and carry him to lord Halifax's office; who was not then at leisure to examine him: but when he did examine him (four days after), he discharged him. Here was probable cause for taking him up.

A justice of peace having jurisdiction, may grant a proper warrant on probable cause: and ministerial officers (constables, &c.) are not to be affected by the illegality of the warrant, in other parts of it. This warrant was executed honestly, and upon a probable cause.

Third point---The plaintiff's action is sufficiently barred by 24 G. 2. c. 44. for want of observing the terms required by it. They neither proved notice, as the third section requires; nor made the demand required by the sixth section.

The defendants have acted in obedience to the warrant of a magistrate who is a justice of peace within the meaning of this act; and by his order, and in his aid.

The only doubt is, 'Whether the action is brought for any thing done in obedience to the warrant; or not.'

The defendants have obeyed it, to the best of their power.

However, as they have acted under colour of the warrant, meaning to obey it, they are not answerable, although they may have erred in the execution of it. They are protected by this act, if they have acted bona fide; even though the warrant and the execution be illegal. They are not to judge of arduous points of law: the statute means to protect them from it.

2dly, The previous step to bringing this action was not taken; viz. the demanding a perusal and copy of the warrant, and shewing a refusal of it.

If there was a fault, or negligence, or mistake in this proceeding, the fault was in the magistrate: there was none in the officer who executed it. And the requisite steps have not been taken, in order to maintain the suit.

Therefore the plaintiff is barred of this action.

Mr. Dunning, contra---for Mr. Leach, the plaintiff below.

The first question is, 'Whether this be a case within 24 G. 2. c. 44.' Which question will involve the question, 'Whether it be within the acts of 7 J. 1. c. 5. or 21 J. 1. c. 12.'

All these statutes, being in pari materia, must receive the same construction: and they are all unapplicable to the present case.

He then made three sub-divisions of his first question: viz.

1st, Whether lord Halifax, being secretary of state, is a conservator or justice of peace, within the true intent and meaning of the act of 24 G. 2. c. 44.

2dly, Whether the defendants are constables, headboroughs, or officers, &c. within the intent and meaning of that act.

3dly, Whether this action is brought and properly pursued, within the true intent and meaning of it; and for a matter done in obedience to the warrant.

First point---Lord Halifax is not a justice of peace within 24 G. 2. c. 44. He is not so by commission: he is not so, as incident to his offices, either of secretary of state, or of privy counsellor.

But it has been said, 'He is a conservator of the peace; and therefore within the meaning of the act.'

I deny the principle, and also the conclusion. I admit the case of Rex v. Kendal and Roe; though the reasons of it do not appear: but I submit to the authority of it, 'That a secretary of state has a power to commit for high treason.'

Serjeant Hawkins's reasons do not support his assertion: and I deny that a secretary of state is a conservator of the peace. He has only a power of committing for high treason, as conservators of the peace had in other cases: and Kendal and Roe's case carries it no farther. The court never meant to resolve any thing further.

All the crown-writers are silent on this subject of a secretary of state's having this jurisdiction. None of them even hint that a secretary of state is a conservator of the peace. Staundford, Fitz-Herbert, Lambard, &c. say no such thing.

* Lambard gives the list of those officers who are conservators of the peace: but there is no mention therein, of secretaries of state. Serjeant + Hawkins copies the same list, without adding secretaries of state.

There is no proof or pretence that the conservatorship of the peace is incident to their office: nor is there any usage, to support such a notion. Their claim of a power to grant such warrants as the present one, is not pretended to be older than the Revolution.

If they were justices of the peace, or conservators of the peace, they would be bound to execute the powers given to justices, or residing in constables; and they would be subject to the control of this court.

The offices are different in creation, constitution, and execution.

The very language of the warrant shews that the secretary of state did not consider himself as a justice, conservator, or constable.

This statute is not to be extended beyond the letter of it: it is not within the maxims or reasons of extension of acts of parliament.

It is necessary to consider the former statutes of 7 J. 1. c. 5. and 21 J. 1. c. 12. (Both of which he rehearsed and observed upon).

In these, there is no mention of secretaries of state: nor is there any reason to add others not there enumerated; the rather, as the enumeration begins with persons inferior to secretaries of state. Neither is there any ground to imagine that the legislature intended to include secretaries of state within their provision. The preamble shews rather the contrary. The line drawn between those enumerated and those omitted, shews the same thing. The persons intended to be protected, are persons bound to act, and acting for the public good, without reward; not great officers with great salaries, who are not lawyers and are not bound to act.

The

The persons introduced by the second act (church-wardens, sworn-men, overseers, &c.) are persons within the mischief of the former: yet even they were not virtually included in the former, and are therefore particularly named in the latter.

This latter explanatory act omits, nevertheless, to name secretaries of state. But constables are within the letter: and it extends to no others. And he referred to 4 Inst. 175, and the two marginal notes there; one on 7 J. c. 5. and the other, on 2 J. c. 12.

From all which premises he argued, that these acts of Jac. 1. are not to be extended beyond the letter: and if they were, yet there is no reason to extend them to secretaries of state, as not being within the same inconvenience.

No more reason is there to extend that of 24 G. 2. c. 44. If the legislature had so intended, they would not have confined it to justices of the peace, a species of magistrates well known and understood in our law.

So much for the noble lord.

As to the messengers---They do not fall within the words or meaning of the act of 7 J. 1. c. 5. which is confined to officers, who are persons known in our law, and bound to execute the warrant of a justice of peace; an office of burthen, not of profit; and incapable to distinguish the precise limits of a jurisdiction.

There is no respect in the case of the king's messengers in ordinary; who are persons unknown in our law, and mere volunteers in executing warrants of justices.

The words, 'other officers, &c.' mean boroughers, &c. officers of the same sort as constables and tithingmen; not king's messengers. These persons cannot be considered as aiding and assisting the constables. The warrant and the fact are quite the reverse: the constables are directed to assist them. They do not act under the command of a justice of peace, or in his assistance.

This warrant is not under the hand and seal of a justice of peace. Therefore the act does not protect the defendants.

Nor is the act done in obedience to this warrant. The warrant was 'to apprehend the author, printer, or publisher:' but they have executed it upon a person who was not the author, printer, or publisher. Consequently, as they have not acted under it, they can't be protected by it.

It is said, 'that a description is equivalent to naming the persons; and that here is a sufficient description.'

But the description of an offence is no description of the person offending; and this is only a description of the offence.

The obedience to the warrant is the condition of the protection which the act gives to the officer. Therefore, the condition failing, the protection does not take place.

Here is no probable cause, nor any reason for justifying the officer under a probable cause. It is not like the cases of apprehending traitors or felons. Here is only information from one of their own body, 'that the author of the paper had been seen going into Leach's house; and that Leach was the printer of the composition in general;' not of this particular paper.

But though neither this hearsay-information was in itself true; nor would the consequence follow, if it had been true; yet they thereupon arrest and imprison an innocent man. Therefore these men themselves are to answer for doing this: not the person who issued the warrant. The warrant did not command nor authorize them to do what they have done. It is necessary for them to shew an acting in obedience to the warrant; otherwise they are not within the protection of the act. In proof of which, he cited two cases; one by the name of * Lawson v. Clark; and the other a Norwich case, where a bailiff had executed the warrant out of the proper jurisdiction.

Upon these authorities, upon the reason of the thing, and upon the words of the act, the officer is not intitled to the protection of the act; nor needs the justice be made a party, but where the officer acts in obedience to the warrant: acting under colour of it only, is not sufficient.

Besides, the party apprehended was not carried before lord Halifax, or dealt with according to law. Surely, this was the act of the officer; not of the person who signed the warrant. And no reason is given, stated, pretended, or even existed, why this matter was so transacted. Therefore there was no probable cause or reason whereupon to ground a justification of this their conduct.

So that, even allowing the secretary of state to be a justice of peace, and the officers to be constables; yet the action lies against the plaintiffs in error, who have acted in this unjustifiable manner.

It appears therefore, that even if they had a defence upon the merits, they have not properly pleaded it. However, in fact they had no defence upon the merits: the plaintiff Leach was neither author, printer, nor publisher of the paper; nor at all within the description of the warrant.

But the warrant itself is illegal. It is against the author, printer, and publisher of the paper, generally, without naming or describing them; and not founded on any charge upon oath: it is also, 'to seize his papers;' that is, all his papers.

No justice of peace has power to issue such a warrant. Therefore lord Halifax could not do it as a justice of peace. Nor is there any pretence of usage to support such a claim of doing it as secretary of state, further back than the Revolution.

It lies upon them, to prove their claim, and to shew their authority.

The practice of a particular magistrate cannot control the law. Common error is not, in this case, sufficient to make law. It is the duty, and it is therefore, doubtless, the inclination of the court, to stop the mischief, as soon as it is complained of to them.

If 'author, printer, and publisher,' without naming any particular person, be sufficient in such a warrant as this is; it would be equally so, to issue a warrant generally, 'to take up the robber or murderer of such a one.' This is no description of the person; but only of the offence: it is making the officer to be judge of the matter, in the place of the person who issues the warrant. Such a power would be extremely mischievous, and might be productive of great oppression.

To ransack private studies in order to search for evidence, and even without a previous charge on oath, is contrary to natural justice, as well as to the liberty of the subject: and it is as useless as it is cruel, in the case of libels; because it is the publication only that makes the crime of a libel.

To search a man's private papers ad libitum, and even without accusation, is an infringement of the natural rights of mankind. And this is a warrant, to 'seize all a man's papers,' without any particular relation even to the crime they would suppose him chargeable with.

No case of this sort has ever undergone judicial discussion and determination. And as the court does not interpose in cases not objected to, no arguments can be drawn from such as passed sub silentio, or were never objected to.

All the writers upon the crown-law say, 'that there must be an accusation; that the person to be apprehended must be named; and that the officer is not to be left to arrest whom he thinks fit.' For which, he vouched Hale's Hist. P. C. 1st part, p. 580 and 586. and Hawkins's P. C. Book 2. c. 13. § 10. p. 81 and 82.

Here, it is left to the officer, to take up any person whom he himself suspects.

Lord chief justice Scroggs was impeached for issuing such warrants as this is.

Therefore he prayed judgment for the defendant in error.

Mr. Solicitor General De Grey, in reply, on behalf of the plaintiffs in error.

A secretary of state is an officer by prescription; and his office must be as ancient as the office of the person to whom he is secretary: for he is and always has been an officer necessary to the crown; and the constitution always required the support of this office. And as this power to commit for treason depends upon prescriptive right and the nature of his office; so likewise it does, in all cases of preserving the public peace.

In the case of Kendal and Roe, the power, in treason, was acknowledged. In Darby's case, it was recognized, in felony. In Earbury's case, (where the warrant was general, as this is,) he was continued on his recognizance. A secretary of state has these powers, upon the foundation of prescription; not on our law-books: and he has, equally, the power in him; whether he does or does not exert it in low and common instances. I suppose he is as compellable to act, as a conservator of the peace formerly was, before the acts of parliament which give power to justices of peace.

Charter-justices can scarce be called commission-justices: and yet these statutes extend to them.

A 'justice of the peace' means a conservator, a warden of the peace. Therefore there was no need to name secretaries of state, in the acts of parliament: they were included, without naming them particularly.

The marginal note in lord Coke is no authority. However, these officers are named in the text, 'and certain others his majesty's officers.'

This action is brought for what was done in obedience to the warrant; which the officer was obliged to execute, in the best manner he could.

If there is any fault, it is in the magistrate: he should have described the offender with greater certainty. If the executing officer acts to the best of his ability; he is justified, and acts in obedience to his warrant.

Here the officers did so: they were reasonably satisfied, 'that Leach was the printer.' And on search, this probable cause was increased to a higher degree: for, they found another fresh sheet of the same work, just printed off, and wet. They detained him on occasion of his being to be carried before lord Halifax, to be examined. The officers have nothing to do with his examination: that was the affair of lord Halifax; and if he discharged the persons apprehended and brought before him, without examination; it was the better for them.

In Vaughan 111. Stiles v. Sir Richard Cox and others,—it was determined, that the defendants should have the benefit of the act; because they acted by colour of the warrant.

As to the warrant itself—it is objected, 'that there is no charge upon oath.' But there was no occasion, he said, for it: and to that purpose, he cited the Queen v. Darby [v. Fortescue 141.] Rex v. Earbury, Mich. 7 G. 2. and 1 Hale H. P. C. 582. where it is laid down, that 'tis convenient, though not always necessary, to take an information upon oath of the person that desires the warrant.'

It is objected, 'that this warrant is not authorized by any length of usage.'

But the usage, as here stated, is sufficient: and it must be taken to be coeval with the office. The bill of exceptions indeed only takes it up from the Revolution; asserting that it has been so ever since that time: but the facts go up to the Restoration; and none of a different form were produced, prior to the Revolution.

As to seizing papers—it is difficult indeed to draw the exact line. But it is certainly necessary, in some degree: and no instance is produced, of such warrants having ever been abused as instruments of oppression.

He concluded, upon the whole, that the plaintiff had no right to bring his action.

Lord Mansfield—I suppose, this is intended to be argued again. However, I will say something, at present, upon it.

A bill of exceptions supposes the evidence true; and questions the competency or propriety of it.

'Whether there was a probable cause or ground of suspicion,' was a matter for the jury to determine: that is not now before the court. So—

'Whether the defendants detained the plaintiff an unreasonable time.'

But if it had been found to have been a reasonable time; yet it would be no justification to the defendants; because it is stated, 'that this man was neither author, printer, or publisher:' and if he was not, then they have taken up a man who was not the subject of the warrant.

The

Question. The three material questions are—1st. 'Whether a secretary of state acting as a conservator of the peace by the common law, is to be construed within the statutes of James the first, and of the late king.'

The protection of the officers, if they have acted in obedience to the warrant, is consequential, in case a secretary of state is within these statutes.

As to the arrest being made in obedience to the warrant, or 2d Question. only under colour of it and without authority from it—this question depends upon the construction of the warrant; whether it must not be construed to mean 'such persons as are under a violent suspicion of being guilty of the charge;' (for they cannot be conclusively considered as guilty, till after trial and conviction.) The warrant itself imports only suspicion; for, it says,—'to be brought before me, and examined, and dealt with according to law;' and this suspicion must eventually depend upon future trial. Therefore the warrant does not seem to me, to mean conclusive guilt; but only violent suspicion. If the person apprehended should be tried and acquitted, it would shew 'that he was not guilty;' yet there might be sufficient cause of suspicion.

Mr. Dunning says, very rightly, that 'to bring a person within 24 G. 2. the act must be done in obedience to the warrant.'

The last point is, 'whether this general warrant be 3d Question. good.'—

One part of it may be laid out of the case: for, as to what relates to the seizing his papers, that part of it was never executed; and therefore it is out of the case.

It is not material to determine, 'whether the warrant be good or bad;' except in the event of the case being within 7 J. 1. but not within 24 G. 2.

At present—as to the validity of the warrant, upon the single objection of the uncertainty of the person, being neither named nor described—the common law, in many cases, gives authority to arrest without warrant; more especially, where taken in the very act: and there are many cases where particular acts of parliament have given authority to apprehend, under general warrants; as in the case of writs of assistance, or warrants to take up loose, idle, and disorderly people. But here, it is not contended, that the common law gave the officer authority to apprehend; nor that there is any act of parliament which warrants this case.

Therefore it must stand upon principles of common law.

It is not fit, that the receiving or judging of the information should be left to the discretion of the officer. The magistrate ought to judge; and should give certain directions to the officer. This is so, upon reason and convenience.

Then as to authorities—Hale and all others hold such an uncertain warrant void: and there is no case or book to the contrary.

It is said, 'that the usage has been so; and that many such have been issued, since the Revolution, down to this time.'

But a usage, to grow into law, ought to be a general usage, communitary usitata et approbata; and which, after a long continuance, it would be mischievous to overturn.

This is only the usage of a particular office, and contrary to the usage of all other justices and conservators of the peace.

There is the less reason for regarding this usage; because the form of the warrant probably took its rise from a positive statute; and the former precedents were inadvertently followed, after that law was expired.

Mr. Justice Wilmot declared, that he had no doubt, nor ever had, upon these warrants: he thought them illegal and void.

Neither had the two other judges, Mr. Justice Yates, and Mr. Justice Aston, any doubt (upon this first argument) of the illegality of them: for no degree of antiquity can give sanction to a usage bad in itself. And they esteemed this usage to be so. They were clear and unanimous in opinion, that this warrant was illegal and bad.

Lord Mansfield—Let it stand over for further argument.

The case standing in the paper, on Friday the 8th of November, 1765, for farther argument—

Mr. Yorke, attorney-general, was now to have argued on behalf of the plaintiffs in error; and begun to enter into his argument: but when he came to mention the two cases cited by Mr. Dunning, both of which were determined before lord Mansfield, upon 24 G. 2. c. 44. one of them at Norwich, summer assizes, 1761; (where damages were given); the other * of them, on a warrant under the vagrant act of 17 G. 2. (where his lordship held, 'that the defendant ought to shew that the officer had acted in obedience to the warrant;'

† Dawson or Lawson, v.
Clarke,
V. ante.

and he did so;) he seemed to intimate that this objection 'of their not having done so, in the present case,' was too great a difficulty for him to encounter; and therefore rested the matter where it was, without proceeding any further in his argument.

Lord Mansfield remembered both these cases; and said, He still continued of the same opinion.

Where the justice cannot be liable, the officer is not within the protection of the act. The case in Middlesex concludes exactly to the present case. For, here the warrant is to take up the author, printer, or publisher; but they took up a person who was neither author, printer, nor publisher: so, that case was a warrant 'to take up a disorderly woman;' and the defendant took up a woman who was not so.

And he held the same opinion now, he said, as he did before, in the case at Norwich.

This makes an end of the case: for, this is a previous question; and the foundation of the defence fails.

The consequence is, that the judgment must be affirmed.

The other judges assenting, the rule of the court was, 'that the judgment be affirmed.'

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

[Thus this case went off, without any judicial decision on any of the chief points which were raised in it. The only point professed to be regularly adjudged was, that the warrant in question had not been pursued. Whether a secretary of state is a conservator of the peace ex officio, and as such within the equity of the statutes in favour of justices of the peace; whether he has power to commit for any offence under high treason; whether a single privy counsellor has a right to commit in any case; whether a warrant for the seizure of papers could not be justified in the case of a seditious libel; and whether a general warrant, neither naming the offender, nor otherwise describing him, except by relation to the offence committed, could be maintained at common law; all these important questions were left unadjudged. However, enough was said by the court on the last of them to evince, that all the four judges thought general warrants to seize the person universally illegal, except where the granting of them was specially authorized by act of parliament; and from the attorney-general's readiness in yielding another point to avoid a decision of that concerning the legality of general warrants, it may be conjectured, that he despaired of being able to support them. How such warrants and the seizure of papers in the case of seditious libels were both finally condemned by a declaratory resolution of the house of commons, will be explained in a note at the end of the case on the seizure of papers, which is the next in this collection.]

No. IV. The Case of Seizure of Papers, being an Action of Trespass by John Entick, Clerk, against Nathan Carrington and three others Messengers in ordinary to the King, Court of Common-Pleas, Michaelmas Term, 6 Geo. III. 1765.

[This case is given with the above-mentioned title; because the chief point adjudged was, that a warrant to search for and seize the papers of the accused, in the case of a seditious libel, is contrary to law. But this was not the only question in the case. All the other interesting subjects, which were discussed in the immediately preceding case, except the question of general warrants, were also argued in the following one; and most of them seem to have received a judicial opinion from the court.]

The state of the case, with the arguments of the counsel, is taken from Mr. Serjeant Wilson's Reports, 2 Wils. 275. But instead of his short note of the judgment of the court, the editor has the pleasing satisfaction to present to the reader the judgment itself at length, as delivered by the lord chief justice of the Common-Pleas from written notes. It was not without some difficulty, that the copy of this judgment was obtained by the editor. He has reason to believe, that the original, most excellent and most valuable as its contents are, was not deemed worthy of preservation by its author, but was actually committed to the flames. Fortunately, the editor remembered to have formerly seen a copy of the judgment in the hands of a friend; and upon application to him, it was immediately obtained, with liberty to the editor to make use of it at his discretion. Before, however, he presumed to consult his own wishes in the use, the editor took care to convince himself, both that the copy was authentick, and that the introduction of it into this collection would not give offence. Indeed, as to the authenticity of the judgment, except in some trifling inaccuracies, the probable effect of careless transcribing, a first reading left the editor's mind without a doubt on the subject. But it was a respectful delicacy due to the noble lord, by whom the judgment was delivered, not to publish it, without first endeavouring to know, whether such a step was likely to be displeasing to his lordship; and though from the want of any authority from him, the editor exposes himself to some risque of disapprobation, yet his precautions to guard against it, with the disinterestedness of his motives, will, he is confident, if ever it should become necessary to explain the circumstances to his lordship, be received as a very adequate apology for the liberty thus hazarded.]

Trespass for breaking and entering plaintiff's house, &c.

IN trespass; the plaintiff declares that the defendants on the 11th day of November in the year of our lord 1762, at Westminster in Middlesex, with force and arms broke and entered the dwelling-house of the plaintiff in the parish of St. Dunstan Stepney, and continued there four hours without his consent and against his will, and all that time disturbed him in the peaceable possession thereof, and broke open the doors to the rooms, the locks, iron bars, &c. thereto affixed, and broke open the boxes, chests, drawers, &c. of the plaintiff in his house, and broke the locks thereto affixed, and searched and examined all the rooms, &c. in his dwelling-house, and all the boxes, &c. so broke open, and read over, pried into and examined all the private papers, books, &c. of the plaintiff there found, whereby the secret affairs, &c. of the plaintiff became wrongfully discovered and made public; and took and carried away 100 printed charts, 100 printed pamphlets, &c. &c. of the plaintiff there found, and other 100 charts, &c. &c. took and carried away, to the damage of the plaintiff 2000*l*.

Special justification under a warrant of the secretary of state.

The defendants plead ist, not guilty to the whole declaration, whereupon issue is joined. 2dly, as to the breaking and entering the dwelling-house, and continuing four hours, and all that time disturbing him in the possession thereof, and breaking open the doors to the rooms, and breaking open the boxes, chests, drawers, &c. of the plaintiff in his house, and the searching and examining all the rooms, &c. in his dwelling-house, and all the boxes, &c. so broke open, and reading over, prying into, and examining the private papers, books, &c. of the plaintiff there found, and taking and carrying away the goods and chattels in the declaration first mentioned there found, and also as to taking and carrying away the goods and chattels in the declaration last mentioned, the defendants say, the plaintiff ought not to have his action against them, because they say, that before the supposed trespass, on the 6th of November 1762, and before, until, and all the time of the supposed trespass, the earl of Halifax was, and yet is one of the lords of the king's privy council, and one of his principal secretaries of state, and that the earl before the trespass on the 6th of November 1762, made his warrant under his hand and seal directed to the defendants, by which the earl did in the king's name authorize and require the defendants, taking a constable to their assistance, to make strict and diligent search for the plaintiff, mentioned in the said warrant to be the author, or one concerned in the writing of several weekly very seditious papers, intitled, "The Monitor or British Freeholder, number 357, 358, 360, 373, 376, 378 and 380, London, printed for J. Wilson and J. Fell in Peter Noster Row," containing gross and scandalous reflections and invectives upon his majesty's government, and upon both houses of parliament, and him the plaintiff having found, to seize and apprehend and bring together with his books and papers in safe custody before the earl of Halifax to be examined concerning the premises, and further dealt with according to law; in the due execution whereof all mayors, sheriffs, justices of the peace, constables, and all other his majesty's officers civil and military, and loving subjects, whom it might concern, were to be aiding and assisting to them the defendants, as there should be occasion. And the defendants further say, that afterwards and before the trespass on the same day and year, the warrant was delivered to them to be executed, and thereupon they on the same day and year in the declaration, in the day time about 11 o'clock, being the said time when, &c. by virtue and for the execution of the said warrant entered the plaintiff's dwelling-house, the outer door thereof being then open, to search for and seize the plaintiff and his books and papers in order to bring him and them before the earl of Halifax, according to the warrant; and the defendants did then and there find the plaintiff, and seized and apprehended him, and did search for his books and papers in his house, and did necessarily search and examine the rooms therein, and also his boxes, chests, &c. there, in order to find and seize his books and papers, and to bring them along with the plaintiff before the said earl, according to the warrant; and upon the said search did then in the said house find and seize the goods and chattels of the plaintiff in the declaration, and on the same day did carry the said books and papers to a house at Westminster, where the said earl then and long before transacted the business of his office, and delivered the same to Lovel Stanhope, esq; who then was and yet is an assistant to the earl in his office of secretary of state, to be examined, and who was then authorized to receive the same from them for that purpose, as it was lawful for them to do; and the plaintiff afterwards (to wit) on the 17th of November in the said year was discharged out of their custody; and in searching for the books and papers of the plaintiff the defendants did necessarily read over, pry into, and examine the said private papers, books, &c. of the plaintiff in the declaration mentioned then found in his house; and because at the said time when, &c. the said doors in the said house leading to the rooms therein, and the said boxes, chests, &c. were shut and fastened so that the defendants could not search and examine the said rooms, boxes, chests, &c. they, for the necessary searching and examining the same, did then necessarily break and force open the said doors, boxes, chests, &c. as it was lawful for them to do; and on the said occasion the defendants necessarily stayed in the house of the plaintiff for the said four hours, and unavoidably during that time disturbed him in the possession thereof, they the defendants doing as little damage to the plaintiff as they possibly could, which are the same breaking and entering the house of the plaintiff, &c. (and so repeat the trespass covered by this plea) whereof the plaintiff above complains; and this, &c. wherefore they pray judgment, &c.

The plaintiff replies to the plea of justification above, that (as to the trespass thereby covered) he by any thing alleged by the defendants therein ought not to be barred from having his action against them, because he says, that the defendants at the parish of Stepney, of their own wrong, and without the cause by them in that plea alleged, broke and entered the house of the plaintiff, &c. &c. in manner and form as the plaintiff hath complained above; and this he prays may be inquired of by the country; and the defendants do so likewise.—There is another plea of justification like the first, with this difference only; that in the last plea it is alleged, the plaintiff and his papers, &c. were carried before lord Halifax, but in the first, it is before Lovel Stanhope, his assistant or law clerk; and the like replication of de injuria sua propria absque tali causa, whereupon a third issue is joined.

Replication de injuria sua propria.

This cause was tried at Westminster-hall before the lord chief justice, when the jury found a special verdict to the following purport.

The jurors upon their oath say, as to the issue first joined (upon the plea not guilty to the whole trespass in the declaration) that as to the coming with force and arms, and also the trespass in declaration, except the breaking and entering the dwelling-house of the plaintiff, and continuing therein for the space of four hours, and all that time disturbing him in the possession thereof, and searching several rooms therein, and in one bureau, one writing desk, and several drawers of the plaintiff in his house, and reading over and examining several of his papers there, and seizing, taking and carrying away some of his books and papers there found, in the declaration complained of, the said defendants are not guilty. As to breaking and entering the dwelling-house, &c. (above excepted) the jurors on their oath say, that at the time of making the following information, and before and until and at the time of granting the warrant hereafter mentioned, and from thence hitherto, the earl of Halifax was, and still is one of the lords of the king's privy council, and one of his principal secretaries of state, and that before the time in the declaration, viz. on the 11th of October 1762, at St. James's Westminster, one Jonathan Scott of London, bookseller and publisher, came before Edward Weston, esq; an assistant to the said earl, and a justice of peace for the city and liberty of Westminster, and there made and gave information in writing to and before the said Edward Weston against the said John Entick and others, the tenor of which information now produced and given in evidence to the jurors followeth in these words and figures, to wit, 'The voluntary information of J. Scott. In the year 1755, I proposed setting up a paper, and mentioned it to Dr. Shebbeare, and in a few days one Arthur Beardmore an attorney at law sent for me, hearing of my intention, and desired I would mention it to Dr. Shebbeare, that he Beardmore and some others of his friends had an intention of setting up a paper in the city. Shebbeare met Beardmore, and myself and Entick (the plaintiff) at the Horn tavern, and agreed upon the setting up the paper by the name of the Monitor, and that Dr. Shebbeare and Mr. Entick should have 200l. a-year each. Dr. Shebbeare put into Beardmore's and Entick's hands some papers, but before the papers appeared Beardmore sent them back to me (Scott). Shebbeare insisted on having the proportion of his salary paid him; he had 50l. which I (Scott) fetched from Vere and Asgill's by their note, which Beardmore gave him; Dr. Shebbeare upon this was quite left out, and the monies have been continued to Beardmore and Entick ever since, by subscription, as I supposed, raised I know not by whom: it has been continued in these hands ever since. Shebbeare, Beardmore and Entick all told me that the late Alderman Beckford countenanced the paper: they agreed with me that the profits of the paper, paying all charges belonging to it, should be allowed me. In the paper of the 22 May, called Sejanus, I apprehend the character of Sejanus meant lord Bute: the original manuscript was in the hand-writing of David Meredith, Mr. Beardmore's clerk. I before received the manuscript for several years till very lately from the said hands, and do believe that they continue still to write it. Jona. Scott, S. James's 11th October 1762.'

The above information was given voluntarily before me, and signed in my presence by Jona. Scott. J. Weston.

And the jurors further say, that on the 6th of November 1762, the said information was shewn to the earl of H. and thereupon the earl did then make and issue his warrant directed to the defendants, then and still being the king's messengers, and duly sworn to that office, for apprehending the plaintiff, &c. the tenor of which warrant produced in evidence to the jurors, follows in these words and figures:

The secretary of state's warrant to seize plaintiff and his books and papers.

'George Montagu Dunk, earl of Halifax, viscount Sunbury, and baron Halifax, one of the lords of his majesty's honourable privy council, lieutenant general of his majesty's forces, lord lieutenant general and general governor of the kingdom of Ireland, and principal secretary of state, &c. these are in his majesty's name to authorize and require you, taking a constable to your assistance, to make strict and diligent search for John Entick, the author, or one concerned in writing of several weekly very seditious papers, intitled the Monitor, or British Freeholder, No. 357, 358, 360, 373, 376, 378, 379, and 380, London, printed for J. Wilson and J. Fell in Pater Noster Row, which contain gross and scandalous reflections and invectives upon his majesty's government, and upon both houses of parliament; and him, having found, you are to seize and apprehend, and to bring, together with his books and papers, in safe custody before me to be examined concerning the premises, and further dealt with according to law; in the due execution whereof all mayors, sheriffs, justices of the peace, constables, and other his majesty's officers civil and military, and loving subjects whom it may concern, are to be aiding and assisting to you as there shall be occasion; and for so doing this shall be your warrant. Given at St. James's the 6th day of November 1762, in the third year of his majesty's reign, Dunk Halifax. To Nathan Carrington, James Watson, Thomas Ardran and Robert Blackmore, four of his majesty's messengers in ordinary.' And delivered to the defendants to be executed, who on 11th of Nov. 1762, did execute the same without a constable.

the jurors further say, the earl caused this warrant to be delivered to the defendants to be executed. And that the defendants afterwards on the 11th of November 1762, at 11 o'clock in the day time, by virtue and for execution of the warrant, but without any constable taken by them to their assistance, entered the house of the plaintiff, the outer door thereof being open, and the plaintiff being therein, to search for and seize the plaintiff and his books and papers, in order to bring him and them before the earl, according to the warrant; and the defendants did then find the plaintiff there, and did seize and apprehend him, and did there search for his books and papers in several rooms and in the house, and in one bureau, one writing desk, and several drawers of the plaintiff there in order to find and seize the same, and bring them along with the plaintiff before the earl according to the warrant, and did then find and seize there some of the books and papers of the plaintiff, and perused and read over several other of his papers which they found in the house, and chose to read, and that they necessarily continued there in the execution of the warrant four hours, and disturbed the plaintiff in his house, and then took him and his said books and papers from thence, and forthwith gave notice at the office of the said secretary of state in Westminster unto Lovel Stanhope, esq; then before, and still being an assistant to the earl in the examinations of persons, books and papers seized by virtue of warrants issued by secretaries of state, and also then and still and carried the books, &c. to Lovel being a justice of peace for the city and liberty of Westminster and county of Middlesex, of their having seized the plaintiff, his books and papers, and of their having them ready to be examined, and they then and there at the instance of the said Lovel Stanhope delivered the said books and papers to him. And the jurors further say, that, on the 13th of April in the first year of the king, his majesty, by his letters patent under the great seal, gave and granted to the said Lovel Stanhope the office of law-clerk to the secretaries of state. And the king did thereby ordain, constitute and appoint the law-clerk to attend the offices of his secretaries of state, in order to take the depositions of all such persons whom it may be necessary to examine upon affairs which might concern the public, &c. (and then the verdict sets out the letters patent to the law-clerk in hæc verba) as by the letters patent produced in evidence to the jurors appears. And the jurors further say, that Lovel Stanhope, by virtue of the said letters patent long before the time when, &c. on the 13th of April in the first year of the king was, and ever since hath been and still is law-clerk to the secretaries of state, and hath executed that office all the time.

That the like warrants have issued since the Revolution.

usual oath,

That no demand was made by plaintiff of a copy of the warrant, nor did plaintiff bring his action within six months after the facts done by defendants.

And the jurors further say, that at different times from the time of the Revolution to this present time, the like warrants with that issued against the plaintiff, have been frequently granted by the secretaries of state, and executed by the messengers in ordinary for the time being, and that each of the defendants did respectively take at the time of being appointed messengers, the usual oath, that he would be a true servant to the king, &c. in the place of a messenger in ordinary, &c. And the jurors further say, that no demand was ever made or left at the usual place of abode of the defendants, or any of them, by the plaintiff, or his attorney or agent in writing of the perusal and copy of the said warrant, so issued against the plaintiff as aforesaid; neither did the plaintiff commence or bring his said action against the defendants, or any of them, within six calendar months next after the several acts aforesaid, and each of them were and was done and committed by them as aforesaid; but whether, upon the whole matter as aforesaid by the jurors found, the said defendants are guilty of the trespasses herein before particularly specified in breaking and entering the house of the plaintiff in the declaration mentioned, and continuing there for four hours, and all that time disturbing the plaintiff in the possession thereof, and searching several rooms therein, and one bureau, one writing desk, and several drawers of the plaintiff in his house, and reading over and examining several of his papers there, and seizing, taking and carrying away some of his books and papers there found; or the said plaintiff ought to maintain his said action against them; the jurors are altogether ignorant, and pray the advice of the court thereupon. And if upon the whole matter aforesaid by the jurors found, it shall seem to the court that the defendants are guilty of the said trespasses, and that the plaintiff ought to maintain his action against them, the jurors say upon their said oath, that the defendants are guilty of the said trespasses in manner and form as the plaintiff hath thereof complained against them; and they assess the damages of the plaintiff by occasion thereof, besides his costs and charges by him about his suit in this behalf laid out to 300l. and for those costs and charges, to 40s. But if upon the whole matter by the jurors found, it shall seem to the court that the said defendants are not guilty of the said trespasses; or that the plaintiff ought not maintain his action against them; then the jurors do say upon their oath that the defendants are not guilty of the said trespasses in manner and form as the plaintiff hath thereof complained against them.

And as to the last issue on the second special justification, the jury found for the plaintiff, that the defendants in their own wrong broke and entred, and did the trespasses, as the plaintiff in his replication has alledged.

The last issue found for plaintiff.

This special verdict was twice solemnly argued at the bar; in Easter Term last by serjeant Leigh for the plaintiff, and Burland, one of the king's serjeants, for the defendants; and in this present term by serjeant Glynn for the plaintiff, and Nares, one of the king's serjeants, for the defendants.

Counsel for the plaintiff. At the trial of this cause, the defendants relied upon two defences; 1st, That a secretary of state as a justice or conservator of the peace, and these messengers acting under his warrant, are within the statute of the 24th of Geo. II. c. 44. which enacts, (among other things) that 'no action shall be brought against any constable or other officer, or any person acting by his order and in his aid, for any thing done in obedience to the warrant of a justice, until demand hath been made or left at the usual place of his abode by the party, or by his attorney in writing signed by the party, demanding the same, of the perusal and copy of such warrant, and the same hath been refused or neglected for six days after such demand,' and that no demand was ever made by the plaintiff of a perusal or copy of the warrant in this case, according to that statute, and therefore he shall not have this action against the defendants, who are merely ministerial officers acting under the secretary of state, who is a justice and conservator of the peace. 2dly, That the warrant under which the defendants acted, is a legal warrant, and that they well can justify what they have done by virtue thereof, for that at many different times from the time of the Revolution till this time, the like warrants with that issued against the plaintiff in this case have been granted by secretaries of state, and executed by the messengers in ordinary for the time being.

Easter term, 5 Geo. 3.

1. It is most clear and manifest upon this verdict, that the earl of Halifax acted as secretary of state when he granted the warrant, and not merely as a justice of the peace, and therefore cannot be within the statute 24 Geo. II. c. 44. neither would he be within the statute if he was a conservator of the peace, such person not being once named therein; and there is no book in the law whatever, that ranks a secretary of state quasi secretary, among the conservators of the peace. Lambert, Coke, Hawkins, lord Hale, &c. &c. none of them take

As to the first.

take any notice of a secretary of state being a conservator of the peace, and until of late days he was no more indeed than a mere clerk. A conservator of the peace had no more power than a constable has now, who is a conservator of the peace at common law. At the time of making this statute, a justice of peace, constable, headborough and other officers of the peace, borougholders and tithingmen, as well as secretary of state, conservator of the peace, and messenger in ordinary, were all very well known; and if it had been the intent of the statute, that a secretary of state, conservator of the peace, and messenger in ordinary, should have been within the statute, it would have mentioned all or some of them; and it not having done so, they cannot be within it. A messenger certainly cannot be within it, who is nothing more than a mere porter, and lord Halifax's footmen might as well be said to be officers within the statute as these defendants. Besides, the verdict finds that these defendants executed the warrant without taking a constable to their assistance. This disobedience will not only take them out of the protection of the statute, (if they had been within it), but will also disable them to justify what they have done, by any plea whatever. The office of these defendants is a place of considerable profit, and as unlike that of a constable or tithingman as can be, which is an office of burthen and expence, and which he is bound to execute in person, and cannot substitute another in his room, though he may call persons to assist him. 1 Hale's P. C. 581. This warrant is more like a warrant to search for stolen goods and to seize them, than any other kind of warrant, which ought to be directed to constables and other publick officers, which the law takes notice of. 2 Hale's P. C. 149, 150. How much more necessary in the present case was it to take a constable to the defendants assistance. The defendants have also disobeyed the warrant in another matter: being commanded to bring the plaintiff, and his books and papers before lord Halifax, they carried him and them before Lovel Stanhope, the law-clerk; and though he is a justice of the peace, that avails nothing; for no single justice of peace ever claimed a right to issue such a warrant as this, nor did he act therein as a justice of peace, but as the law-clerk to lord Halifax. The information was made before justice Weston. The secretary of state in this case never saw the accuser nor accused. It seems to have been below his dignity. The names of the officers introduced here are not to be found in the law-books, from the first Year-book to the present time.

As to the second. 2. A power to issue such a warrant as this is contrary to the genius of the law of England; and even if they had found what they searched for, they could not have justified under it. But they did not find what they searched for, nor does it appear that the plaintiff was the author of any of the supposed seditious papers mentioned in the warrant; so that it now appears that this enormous trespass and violent proceeding has been done upon meer surmise. But the verdict says, such warrants have been granted by secretaries of state ever since the Revolution. If they have, it is high time to put an end to them; for if they are held to be legal, the liberty of this country is at an end. It is the publishing of a libel which is the crime, and not the having it locked up in a private drawer in a man's study. But if having it in one's custody was the crime, no power can lawfully break into a man's house and study to search for evidence against him. This would be worse than the Spanish inquisition; for ransacking a man's secret drawers and boxes, to come at evidence against him, is like racking his body to come at his secret thoughts. The warrant is to seize all the plaintiff's books and papers without exception, and carry them before lord Halifax. What? Has a secretary of state a right to see all a man's private letters of correspondence, family concerns, trade and business? This would be monstrous indeed! And if it were lawful, no man could endure to live in this country. In the case of a search-warrant for stolen goods, it is never granted, but upon the strongest evidence that a felony has been committed, and that the goods are secreted in such a house; and it is to seize such goods as were stolen, not all the goods in the house; but if stolen goods are not found there, all who entered with the warrant are trespassers. However frequently these warrants have been granted since the Revolution, that will not make them lawful; for if they were unreasonable or unlawful when first granted, no usage or continuance can make them good. Even customs, which have been used time out of mind, have been often adjudged void, as being unreasonable, contrary to common right, or purely against law, if upon considering their nature and quality they shall be found injurious to a multitude, and prejudicial to the commonwealth, and to have their commencement (for the most part) through the oppression and extortion of lords and great men. Davis 32. b. These warrants are not by custom; they go no farther back than eighty years; and most amazing it is they have never before this time been opposed or controverted, considering the great men that have presided in the King's Bench since that time. But it was reserved for the honour of this court, which has ever been the protector of the liberty and property of the subject, to demolish this monster of oppression, and to tear into rags this remnant of Star-Chamber tyranny.

Counsel for the defendants. I am not at all alarmed, if this power is established to be in the secretaries of state. It has been used in the best of times, often since the Revolution. I shall argue, first, That the secretary of state has power to grant these warrants; and if I cannot maintain this, I must, secondly, shew that by the statute 24 Geo. II. c. 24. this action does not lie against the defendants the messengers. 1. A secretary of state has the same power to commit for treason as a justice of peace. Kendall and Roe, Skin. 596. 1 Salk. 346. S. C. 1 lord Raym. 65. 5 Mod. 78. S. C. sir William Wyndham was committed by James Stanhope, secretary of state, to the Tower for high treason the 7th of October 1715. See the case 1 Str. 2. And serjeant Hawkins says, it is certain that the privy council, or any one or two of them, or a secretary of state, may lawfully commit persons for treason, and for other offences against the state, as in all ages they have done. 2 Hawk. P. C. 117. sect. 4. 1 Leon. 70, 71. Garth, 291. 2 Leon. 175. If it is clear that a secretary of state may commit for treason and other offences against the state, he certainly may commit for a seditious libel against the government; for there can hardly be a greater offence against the state, except actual treason. A secretary of state is within the habeas corpus act. But a power to commit without a power to issue his warrant to seize the offender and the libel would be nothing; so it must be concluded that he has the same power upon information to issue a warrant to search for and seize a seditious libel, and its author and publisher, as a justice of peace has for granting a warrant to search for stolen goods, upon an information that a theft has been committed, and that the goods are concealed in such a place; in which case the constables and officers assisting him in the search, may break open doors, boxes, &c. to come at such stolen goods. Supposing the practice of granting warrants to search for libels against the state be admitted to be an evil in particular cases, yet to let such libellers escape, who endeavour to raise rebellion, is a greater evil, and may be compared to the reasoning of Mr. Justice Foster in the case of pressing, 159, where he says, 'that war is a great evil, but it is chosen to avoid a greater.' 'The practice of pressing is one of the mischiefs war brings with it; but it is a maxim in law and good policy too, that all private mischiefs must be born with patience, for preventing a national calamity, &c.'

2. Supposing there is a defect of jurisdiction in the secretary of state, yet the defendants are within the Stat. 24 Geo. II. c. 44. and though not within the words, yet they are within the reason of it. That it is not unusual in acts of parliament to comprehend by construction a generality, where express mention is made only of a particular. The statute of Circumspelle agatis concerning the bishop of Norwich extends to all bishops. Fitz. Prohibition 3. and 2 Inst. on this statute. 25 Ed. III. c. enables the incumbent to plead in quare impedit, to the king's suit. This also extends to the suits of all persons. 38 E. III. 31. The act 1 Ric. II. ordains that the warden of the Fleet shall not permit prisoners in execution to go out of prison by bail or bafton, yet it is adjudged that this act extends to all gaolers. Plowd. Com. case of Platt 35. b. The stat. de donis conditionalibus extends to all other limitations in tail not there particularly mentioned, and the like construction has been put upon several other statutes. Tbo. Jones 62. The stat. 7 Jac. I. c. 5. the word constable therein extends to a deputy constable. Moor 845. These messengers in ordinary have always been considered as officers of the secretary of state, and a commitment may be to their custody, as in sir W. Wyndham's case. A justice of peace may make a constable pro hac vice to execute a warrant, who would be within the stat. 24 Geo. II. So if these defendants are not constables, yet as officers they have power to execute a warrant of a justice of peace. A constable may, but cannot be compelled to execute a warrant out of his jurisdiction. Officers acting under colour of office, though doing an illegal act, are within this statute. Vaugh. 113. So that no demand having ever been made of the warrant, nor any action commenced within six months, the plaintiff has no right of action. It was said, that a conservator of the peace had no more power than a constable has now. I answer, they had power to bind over at common law, but a constable has not. Dalton, cap. 1.

Counsel for the plaintiff, in reply. It is said, this has been done in the best of times ever since the Revolution. The conclusion from thence is, that it is the more inexcusable, because done in the best of times, in an æra when the common law (which had been trampled under the foot of arbitrary power) was revived. We do not deny but the secretary of state hath power to commit for treason and other offences against the state; but that is not the present case, which is breaking into the house of a subject, breaking into his drawers and boxes, ransacking all the rooms in his house, and prying into all his private affairs. But it is said, if the secretary of state has power to commit, he has power to search, &c. as in the case of stolen goods. This is a false consequence, and it might as well be said he has a power to torture. As to stolen goods, if the officers find none, have they a right to take away a man's goods which were not stolen? Pressing is said to be a dangerous power, and yet it has been allowed for the benefit of the state. But that is only the argument and opinion of a single judge, from ancient history and records, in times when the lower part of the subjects were little better than slaves to their lords and great men, and has not been allowed to be lawful without an act of parliament since the time of the Revolution. The stat. 24 Geo. II. has been compared to ancient statutes, naming particular persons and districts, which have been construed to extend to many others not named therein; and so the defendants, though no such officers are mentioned, by like reason, are within the statute of 24 Geo. II. But the law knows no such officers as messengers in ordinary to the king. It is said the habeas corpus act extends to commitments by secretaries of state, though they are not mentioned therein. True, but that statute was made to protect the innocent against illegal and arbitrary power. It is said, the secretary of state is a justice of peace, and the messengers are his officers. Why then did the warrant direct them to take a constable to their assistance, if they were themselves the proper officers? It seems to admit they were not the proper officers. If a man be made an officer for a special purpose to arrest another, he must shew his authority; and if he refuses, it is not murder to kill him. But a constable or other known officer in the law need not shew his warrant.

Lord chief justice. I shall not give any opinion at present, because this case, which is of the utmost consequence to the public, is to be argued again. I shall only just mention a matter which has slipped the sagacity of the counsel on both sides, that it may be taken notice of upon the next argument. Suppose a warrant which is against law be granted, such as no justice of peace, or other magistrate high or low whomsoever, has power to issue, whether that magistrate or justice who grants such warrant, or the officer who executes it, are within the stat. 24 Geo. II. c. 44. To put one case (among an hundred that might happen): suppose a justice of peace issues a warrant to search a house for stolen goods, and directs it to four of his servants, who search and and find no stolen goods, but seize all the books and papers of the owners of the house, whether in such a case would the justice of peace, his officers or servants, be within the stat. 24 Geo. II. I desire that every point of this case may be argued to the bottom, for I shall think myself bound, when I come to give judgment, to give my opinion upon every point in the case.

Counsel for the plaintiff on the second argument. If the secretary of state, or a privy councillor, justice of peace, or other magistrate whatever, have no legal power to grant the warrant in the present case, it will follow, that the magistrate usurping such an illegal power, can never be construed to be within the meaning or reason of the statute of 24 Geo. II. c. 44. which was made to protect justices of the peace, &c. where they made blunders, or erred in judgment in cases within their jurisdiction, and not to give them arbitrary power to issue warrants totally illegal from beginning to end, and in cases wherein they had no jurisdiction at all. If any such power in a secretary of state, or a privy councillor, had ever existed, it would appear from our law-books. All the ancient books are silent on this head. Lambert never once mentions a secretary of state. Neither he nor a privy councillor, were ever considered as magistrates. In all the arguments touching the Star-Chamber, and petition of right, nothing of this power was ever dreamt of. State-commitments anciently were either per mandatum regis in person, or by warrant of several of the privy councillors in the plural number. The king has this power in a particular mode, viz. by the advice of his privy council, who are to be answerable to the people if wrong is done. He has no other way but in council to signify his mandate. In the case of the seven bishops, this matter was insisted upon at the bar, when the court presumed the commitment of them was by the advice of the privy council; but that a single privy councillor had this power, was not contended for by the crown-lawyers then. This court will require it to be shewn that there have been ancient commitments of this sort. Neither the secretary of state, or a privy councillor, ever claimed a right to administer an oath, but they employ a person as a law-clerk, who is a justice of peace, to administer oaths, and take recognizances. Sir Barth. Shower, in Kendall and Roe's case, insisted they never had such power. It would be a solecism in our law to say, there is a person who has power to commit, and has not power to examine on oath, and bail the party. Therefore whoever has power to commit, has power to bail. It was a question formerly, whether a constable as an ancient conservator of the peace should take a recognizance or bond. In the time of queen Elizabeth there was a case wherein some of the judges were of one opinion and some of another. A secretary of state was so inconsiderable formerly, that he is not mentioned in the statute of scandalum magnatum. His office was thought of no great importance. He takes no oath of office as secretary of state, gives no kind of security for the exercise of such judicial power as he now usurps. If this was an ancient power, it must have been annexed to his office anciently; it cannot be now given to him by the king. The king cannot make two chief justices of the Common-Pleas; nor could the king put the great seal in commission before an act of parliament was made for that purpose. There was only one secretary of state formerly: there are now two appointed by the king. If they have this power of magistracy, it should seem to require some law to be made to give that power to two secretaries of state which was formerly in one only. As to commitments per mandatum regis, see Staunf. Pl. Coron. 72. 4 Inst. c. 5. court of Star-Chamber. Admitting they have power to commit in high treason, it will not follow they have power to commit for a misdemeanor. It is of necessity that they can commit in high treason, which requires immediate interposition for the benefit of the public. In the case of commitment by Walsingham secretary of state, 1 Leon. 71. it was returned on the habeas corpus at last, that the party was committed ex sententia & mandato totius concilii privati domine regine. Because he found he had not that power of himself, he had recourse to the whole privy council's power, so that this case is rather for the plaintiff. Commitment by the high commission court of York was declared by parliament illegal from the beginning; so in the case of ship-money the parliament declared it illegal.

Counsel for the defendants on the second argument. The most able judges and advocates, ever since the Revolution, seem to have agreed, that the secretaries of state have this power to commit for a misdemeanor. Secretaries of state have been looked upon in a very high light for two hundred years past. 27 H. VIII. c. 11. Their rank and place is settled by 31 H. VIII. c. 10. 4 Inst. 362. c. 77. of precedency. 4 Inst. 56. Selden's Titles of Honour, &c. officers of state. So that a secretary of state is something more than a mere clerk, as was said. Minsheu verb. Secretary. He is secretarius consilii domini regis. Serjeant Pengelly moved, that sir William Wyndham might be bailed. If he could not be committed by the secretary of state for something less than treason, why did he move to have him bailed? This seems a concession that he might be committed in that case for something less than treason. Lord Holt seems to agree that a commitment by a secretary of state is good. Skin. 598. 1 Lord Raym. 65. There is no case in the books that says in what cases a secretary of state can or can not commit; by what power is it that he can commit in the case of treason, and in no other case? The resolution of the house of commons touching the petition of right, Selden last volume, Parliamentary History, vol. 8. fol. 95, 96. Secretary Coke told the lords, it was his duty to commit by the king's command. Yoxley's case, Carth. 291. he was committed by the secretary of state on the statute of Elizabeth for refusing to answer whether he was a Romish priest. The Queen and Derby, Fortescue's Reports, 140. the commitment was by a secretary of state, Mich. 10 Annæ, for a libel, and held good. (N. Bathurst J. said he had seen the habeas corpus and the return, and that this was a commitment by a secretary of state). The King and Earbury, Mich. 7 Geo. II. 2 Bernard. 346. was a motion to discharge a recognizance entered into for writing a paper called The Royal Oak. Lord Hardwicke said it was settled in Kendall and Roe's case, that a secretary of state might apprehend persons suspected of treasonable practices; and there are a great number of precedents in the Crown-Office of commitments by secretaries of state for libels against the government.

After time taken to consider, lord CAMDEN, lord chief justice, delivered the judgment of the court for the plaintiff, in the following words.

This record hath set up two defences to the action, on both of which the defendants have relied.

The first arises from the facts disclosed in the special verdict; whereby the defendants put their case upon the statute of 24 Geo. II. insisting, that they have nothing to do with the legality of the warrants, but that they ought to have been acquitted as officers within the meaning of that act.

The second defence stands upon the legality of the warrants; for, this being a justification at common law, the officer is answerable, if the magistrate has no jurisdiction.

These two defences have drawn several points into question, upon which the public, as well as the parties, have a right to our opinion.

Under the first, it is incumbent upon the officers to shew, that they are officers within the meaning of the act of parliament, and likewise that they have acted in obedience to the warrant.

The question, whether officers or not, involves another; whether the secretary of state, whose ministers they are, can be deemed a justice of the peace, or taken within the equity of the description; for officers and justices are here co-relative terms: therefore either both must be comprized, or both excluded.

This question leads me to an inquiry into the authority of that minister, as he stands described upon the record in two capacities, viz. secretary of state and privy councillor. And since no statute has conferred any such jurisdiction as this before us, it must be given, if it does really exist, by the common law; and upon this ground he has been treated as a conservator of the peace.

The matter thus opened, the questions that naturally arise upon the special verdict, are;

First, whether in either of these characters, or upon any other foundation, he is a conservator of the peace.

Secondly, admitting him to be so, whether he is within the equity of the 24th Geo. II.

These points being disposed of, the next in order is, whether the defendants have acted in obedience to the warrant.

In the last place, the great question upon the justification will be, whether the warrant to seize and carry away the plaintiff's papers is lawful.

FIRST QUESTION.

The power of this minister, in the way wherein it has been usually exercised, is pretty singular.

If he is considered in the light of a privy councillor, although every member of that board is equally intitled to it with himself, yet he is the only one of that body who exerts it. His power is so extensive in place, that it spreads throughout the whole realm; yet in the object it is so confined, that except in libels and some few state crimes, as they are called, the secretary of state does not pretend to the authority of a constable.

To consider him as a conservator. He never binds to the peace, or good behaviour, which seems to have been the principal duty of a conservator; at least he never does it in those cases, where the law requires those sureties. But he commits in certain other cases, where it is very doubtful, whether the conservator had any jurisdiction whatever.

His warrants are chiefly exerted against libellers, whom he binds in the first instance to their good behaviour, which no other conservator ever attempted, from the best intelligence that we can learn from our books.

And though he doth all these things, yet it seems agreed, that he hath no power whatsoever to administer an oath or take bail.

This jurisdiction, as extraordinary as I have described it, is so dark and obscure in its origin, that the counsel have not been able to form any certain opinion from whence it sprang.

Sometimes they annex it to the office of secretary of state, sometimes to the quality of privy councillor; and in the last argument it has been derived from the king's royal prerogative to commit by his own personal command.

Whatever may have been the true source of this authority, it must be admitted, that at this day he is in the full legal exercise of it; because there has been not only a clear practice of it, at least since the Revolution, confirmed by a variety of precedents; but the authority has been recognized and confirmed by two cases in the very point since that period: and therefore we have not a power to unsettle or contradict it now, even though we are persuaded that the commencement of it was erroneous.

And yet, though the inquiry I am now upon cannot be attended with any consequence to the public, it is nevertheless indispensable; for I shall trace the power to its origin, in order to determine, whether the person is within the equity of the 24th Geo. II.

Before I argue upon that point, or even state the question, whether the secretary of state be within that act, we must know what he is. This is no very agreeable task, since it may possibly tend to create, in some minds, a doubt upon a practice that has been quietly submitted to, and which is of no moment to the liberty of the subject; for so long as the proceedings under these warrants are properly regulated by law, the public is very little concerned in the choice of that person by whom they are issued.

To

To proceed then upon the first question, and to consider this person in the capacity of a secretary of state.

This officer is in truth the king's private secretary. He is keeper of the signet and seal used for the king's private letters, and backs the sign manual in transmitting grants to the privy seal. This seal is taken notice of in the Articuli super Chartas, cap. 6. and my lord Coke in his comment upon that chapter, p. 556. describes the secretary as I have mentioned. He says he has four clerks, that sit at his board; and that the law in some cases takes notice of the signet; for a ne exeat regno may be by commandment under the privy seal, or under the signet; and in this case the subject ought to take notice of it; for it is but a signification of the king's commandment. If at the time my lord Coke wrote his third Institute he had been acquainted with the authority that is now ascribed to the secretary, he would certainly have mentioned it in this place. It was too important a branch of the office to be omitted; and his silence therefore is a strong argument, to a man's belief at least, that no such power existed at that time. He has likewise taken notice of this officer in the Prince's case in the eighth Report. He is mentioned in the statute of the 27th H. VIII. chap. 11. and in the statute of the same king touching precedency; and it is observable, that he is called in these two statutes by the single name of secretary, without the addition, which modern times has given him, of the dignity of a state-officer. I see nothing in Parliaments ch. 13 p. 36.

I do not know, nor do I believe, that he was anciently a member of the privy council; but if he was, he was not even in the times of James and Charles the first, according to my lord Clarendon, an officer of such magnitude as he grew up to after the Restoration, being only employed, by this account, to make up dispatches at the conclusion of councils, and not to govern or preside in those councils.

It is not difficult to account for the growth of this minister's importance. He became naturally significant from the time that all the courts in Europe began to admit resident ambassadors; for upon the establishment of this new policy, that whole foreign correspondence passed through the secretary's hands, who by this means grew to be an instructed and confidential minister.

This being the true description of his employment, I see no part of it that requires the authority of a magistrate. The custody of a signet can imply no such thing; nay, the contrary would rather be inferred from this circumstance; because if his power to commit was inherent in his office, his warrants would naturally be stamped with that seal; and in this light the privy seal, one should think, would have had the preference, as being highest in dignity and of more consideration in law. Besides all this, it is not in my opinion consonant to the wisdom or analogy of our law, to give a power to commit, without a power to examine upon oath, which to this day the secretary of state doth not presume to exercise. Mr. Justice Rokeby, in the case of Kendall and

Rowe, says, that the one is incident to the other; and I am strongly of that opinion: for how can he commit, who is not able to examine upon oath? What magistrate can be found, in our law, so defectively constituted? The only instance of this kind, that can be produced, is the practice of the house of commons. But this instance is no precedent for other cases. The rights of that assembly are original and self-created; they are paramount to our jurisdiction, and above the reach of injunction, prohibition, or error. So that I still say, notwithstanding that particular case, there is no magistrate in our law so framed, unless the secretary of state be an exception. Now Mr. Justice Rokeby and myself, though we agree in the principle, form our conclusions in a very different manner. He from the assumed power of committing, which ought first to have been proved, infers the incidental powers of administering an oath. I on the contrary, from the admitted incapacity to do the latter, am strongly inclined to deny the former.

Again, if the secretary of state is a common law magistrate, one should naturally expect to find some account of this in our books, whereas his very name is unknown; and there cannot be a stronger argument against his authority in that light, than the unsuccessful attempts that have been made at the bar to transform him into a conservator. These attempts have given us the trouble of looking into those books that have preserved the memory of these magistrates, who have been long since deceased and forgotten. Fitzherbert, Crompton, Lombard, Dalton, Pulton, and Bacon, have all been searched to see, if any such person could be found amongst the old conservators. It is not material to repeat the whole number, and to range them in their several classes; but it will be sufficient to enumerate the principal ones; because they may be referred to in some other part of the argument.

The king is mentioned as the first. Then come the chancellor, the treasurer, the high steward, the master of the rolls, the chief justice and the justices of the King's Bench, all the judges in their several courts, sheriffs, coroners, constables; and some are said to be conservators by tenure, some by prescription, and others by commission. But no secretary of state is to be found in the catalogue; and I do affirm, that no treatise, case, record, or statute, has ever called him a conservator, from the beginning of time down to the case of the king against Kendall and Rowe.

The first time, he appears in our books to be a granter of our warrants, is in 1 Leonard 70 and 71. 29 and 30 Elizabeth, where the return to a habeas corpus was a commitment by sir Francis Walsingham, principal secretary, and one of the privy council. The court takes this distinction. Where a person is committed by one of the privy council, in such case the cause of the commitment should be set down in the return; but on the contrary, where the party is committed by the whole council, there no cause need be alledged. The court upon this ordered the return to be amended, and then the return is a commitment by the whole council.

There is a like case in the 2 Leonard p. 175. a little prior in point of time, where the commitment is by sir Francis Walsingham, one of the principal secretaries, &c. Because the warden of the Flint did not return for what cause Helliard was committed, the court gives him day to mend his return, or otherwise the prisoner should be delivered. Nobody who reads this case can doubt, but that the Ec. must be supplied by the addition of privy councillor, as in the other case.

These authorities shew, that the judges of those days knew of no such committing magistrate as a secretary of state. They pay no regard to that office, but treat the commitment as the act of the privy councillor only; and to shew farther that the privy councillor as such was the only acting magistrate in state matters, all the twelve judges two years afterwards were obliged to remonstrate against the irregularities of their commitments, but take no notice of any such authorities practised by the secretaries of state.

In the third year of king Charles the first, when the house of commons started that famous dispute, upon the right claimed by the king and the privy council to commit without shewing cause, it is natural to expect, that the secretary's warrant should have been handled, or at least named among the state commitments. But there is not throughout that long and learned discussion one word said about him, or his name so much as mentioned; and the petition of right, as well as all the proceedings that produced it, is equally silent upon the subject.

Again, when in the sixteenth year in the same king's reign the habeas corpus was granted by act of parliament upon all the state commitments, and where the omission of one mode of committing would have been fatal to the subject, and frustrated all the remedy of that act, and where they have enumerated not only every method of committing that had been exercised, but every other that might probably exist in after times; yet the commitment by a secretary of state is not found amongst the number. If then he had power of his own to commit, this famous act of parliament was waste paper, and the subject still at the mercy of the crown, without the benefit of the habeas corpus; a supposition altogether incredible: for who can believe, that this parliament, so jealous, so learned, so industrious, so enthusiastic of the liberty of the subject, when they were making a law to relieve prisoners against the power of the crown, should bind the king, and leave his secretary of state at large?

Whoever attends to all these observations will see clearly, that the secretary of state in those days never exercised the power of committing in his own right; I say, in his own right, because that he did in fact commit, and that frequently even at the time when the matter of the habeas corpus was agitated in the third of king Charles the first, will appear from a passage in the Ephemeris Parliamentaria, page 162. This passage, when it comes to be attended to, will throw great light upon the present enquiry. It is sufficient of itself to convince me, from what source this practice first arose. It was from a delegation of the king's royal prerogative to commit by his own power, and from the king devolved in point of execution upon the secretary of state. The passage I allude to is a speech of secretary Cook.

Whilst the parliament were disputing the king's authority to commit, either by himself or by his council, without shewing the cause, the king, who was desirous to pacify those discontents, and yet unwilling to part with his prerogative, sent a message to the house of commons to assure them, that if they would drop the business, he would promise them, upon his royal word, not to use this prerogative contrary to law. Secretary Cook delivers this message, and then the book proceeds in these words. After speaking of himself and the nature of his place, he says, 'Give me leave freely to tell you, that I know by experience, that by the place I hold under his majesty, if I will discharge the duty of my place and the oath I have taken to his majesty, I must commit, and neither express the cause to the gaoler, nor to the judges, nor to any councillor in England, but to the king himself. Yet do not think, I go without ground of reason, or take this power committed to me to be unlimited. Yea rather to me it is charge, burthen, and danger; for if I by this power commit the poorest porter, if I do not upon a just cause, if it may appear, the burthen will fall upon me heavier than the law can inflict; for I shall lose my credit with his majesty and my place: and I beseech you consider, whether those that have been in the same place, have not committed freely, and not any doubt made of it, or any complaint made by the subject.'

To understand the meaning of this speech, I must briefly remind you of the nature of that famous struggle for the liberty of the subject between the crown and the parliament, which was then in agitation.

The points in controversy were these: whether a subject committing by the king's personal command, or by warrant of the privy council, ought to express the cause in the warrant, and whether the subject in that case was bailable.

The matter in dispute was confined to those two commitments. The crown claimed no such right for any other warrant; nor did the commons demand redress against any other. The statute of Westminster the first, which was admitted on all sides to be the only foundation upon which the pretensions of the crown were built, speaks of no other arrests in the text, but the king's arrest only; and the comment of law had never added any other arrest by construction, but that only of the privy council. No other commitment whatever was deemed by any man to be within the equity of that act. The case, cited upon that occasion, speaks of no other commitments but these. Nay the house of lords, who passed a resolution in the heat of this business in favour of the king's authority, resolves only, that the king or his council could commit, but meddle with no other commitment. Secretary Cook tells them in this public manner, that he made a daily practice of committing without shewing the cause; yet the house takes no notice of any secretary's warrant as such, nor is the secretary's name mentioned in the course of all those proceedings. What then were those commitments mentioned by the secretary? They were certainly such only, as were per specialem mandatum domini regis. They could be no other. They were the commitments then under debate. They, and they only, were referred to by the king's message, and were consequently the subject matter of the secretary's apology; for no other warrant claimed that extraordinary privilege of concealing the cause.

This observation explains him, when he calls it a power committed to him; which I construe, not as annexed to his office, but specially delegated. This accounts too for his notion, that the law could not touch him; but that if he abused his trust, he should lose his credit with the king and his place, which he describes as a heavier punishment than the law could inflict upon him. Upon this ground it will be easy to explain the notable singularities of this minister's proceeding, which are not to be reconciled to any idea of a common-law magistrate. Such are his meddling only with a few state-offences, his reach over the whole kingdom, his committing without the power of administering an oath, his employment of none but the messenger of the king's chamber, and his command to mayors, justices, sheriffs, &c. to assist him; all which particularities are congruous enough to the idea of the king's personal warrant, but utterly inconsistent with all the principles of magistracy in a subject.

If on the other hand it can be understood, that he could and did commit without shewing the cause in his own right and by virtue of his office, then was his warrant admitted to be legal by the whole house, and without censure or animadversion. It was neither condemned by the petition of right, nor subject to the habeas corpus act of 16 of

c. 10.

Charles the first.

The truth of the case was no more than this. The council-board were too numerous to be acquainted with every secret transaction that required immediate confinement; and the delay by summoning was inconvenient in cases that required dispatch. The secretary of state, as most entrusted, was the fittest hand to issue sudden warrants; and therefore we find him so employed by queen Elizabeth under the quality of a privy councillor. But when the attempt failed, the judges declaring, that he must shew the cause, and that they would remand none of his prisoners in any case but that of high treason, those warrants ceased, and then a new method was taken by making him the instrument of the king's speciale mandatum; for that is the form in which all warrants and returns were drawn, that were produced upon that famous argument.

Having thus shewn, not only negatively that this power of committing was not annexed to the secretary's office, but affirmatively likewise that he was notifier or countersigner of the king's personal warrant acting in alio jure down to the times of the 16 of Charles the first, and consequently to the Restoration, for there was no secretary in that interval; I have but little to add upon this head, but observing what passed between that time and the case of Kendall and Rowe.

The licensing act, that took place in the 13th and 14th of Charles the second, gave him his first right to issue a warrant in his own name; not indeed to commit persons, but a warrant to search for papers. Whether upon this new power he grafted any authority to commit persons in his own right, as it should seem he did by the precedent produced the other day, is not very material. But it is remarkable, that during that interval he adhered in some cases to the old form, by specifying the express command of the king in this warrant.

With respect to the cases that have passed since the Revolution, such as the king against Kendall and Rowe, the queen against Darby, and the king and Earbery, I shall take no other notice of them in this place, than to say, they afford no light in the present inquiry by shewing the ground of the officer's authority, though they are strong cases to confirm it.

But before I can fairly conclude, that the secretary of state's power was derived from the king's personal prerogative and from no other origin, I must examine, what has passed relative to the power of a separate privy councillor in this respect. This is, the more necessary to be done, because my lord chief justice Holt has built all his authority upon this ground; and the subsequent cases, instead of striking out any new light upon the subject, do all lean upon and support themselves by my lord chief justice Holt's opinion in the case of Kendall and Rowe.

I will therefore fairly state all that I have been able to discover touching the matter; and then, after I have declared my own opinion, shall leave others to judge for themselves.

In the first place it is proper to observe, that a privy councillor cannot derive his authority from the statute of Westminster the first; which recites an arrest by the command of the king to be one of those cases that were irrepleviable by the common law. The principal commentator upon these words is Stauford, who says,

“as to the commandment of the king, this is to be understood of the commandment of his own mouth, or of his council, which is incorporate to him; and speaks with the mouth of the king himself; for otherwise, if you will take these words of commandment generally, you may say that every capias in a personal action is the command of the king.” Lambard in his chapter of bailment, where he cites this act of parliament, gives it the same construction, by allowing a commitment by the council to be within the equity of these words, “commandment of the king.” Thus far, and no further, did the crown lawyers in the third of king Charles the first endeavour to extend the text of the law; and it is plain from the cases before cited, that the judges in queen Elizabeth's time were of the same opinion, that the argument could not be extended in favour of the single councillor; because they held, that he is bound to shew the cause upon his warrant, as distinguished from the other warrants, where they admit the cause need not be shewn.

If he is not then entitled by this statute, is he empowered by the common law? They, who contend he is, would do well to shew some authority in proof of their opinion. It is clear, he is not numbered among the conservators. It is as clear, that he is not mentioned by any book as one of the ordinary magistrates of justice with any such general authority.

The first place, in which any thing of this kind is to be found, is in the year-book of Henry the sixth, where the sheriff returns a detainer under the warrant of duos de concilio pro rebus regem tangentibus. This proof has an unlucky defect in it; because the reading is doubtful, the word duos as it is written standing as well for dominos, as for duos; so that till the reading is settled, which is beyond my skill, the authority must be suspended.

The next time you meet with a privy councillor in the light of a magistrate is in the first of Edward the sixth, chap. 12. where one of the privy council is empowered to take the accusation in some new treasons therein mentioned; and he is for this purpose joined with the justice of assize and justice of the peace. The like power is given to him by the fifth and sixth of the same king, c. 11. in a like case; and I find in Kelyng, p. 19, that when the judges met to resolve certain points before the trial of the regicides, they resolved, that a confession upon examination before a privy councillor, though he be not a justice of the peace, is a confession within the meaning of the statute of the fifth and sixth of Edward the sixth. That act of parliament in the twelfth section had provided, that no person should be attainted of treason, but upon the testimony of two lawful accusers, unless the said party arraigned should willingly without violence confess the same.

It seems to me, that the ground upon which the judges proceeded in this resolution, was the express power given to the privy council in the clause next but one before that just mentioned, where the act enables them to take the accusation in the new treasons there mentioned.

Whether they reasoned in that way, or whether they conceived that the power there given was a proof of some like power which they enjoyed to take accusation in the case of treasons at the common law, the book has not explained; so that hitherto this authority in the case of high treason stands upon a very poor foundation, being in truth no more than a conjecture of law without authority to support it.

The next authorities are the cases already recited in Leonard, which to the present point prove nothing more than this; that the judges do admit a power in a privy councillor to commit, without specifying in what cases. They demand the cause, and a better return; whereupon fr Francis Walsingham, instead of relying upon his power as privy councillor, returns a new warrant signed by the whole board.

Two years after this came forth that famous resolution of all the judges, which is reported in 1 Anderson 297. 34th of Elizabeth. There is no occasion to observe, how arbitrary the prerogative grew, and how fast it increased towards the end of this queen's reign. It seems to me, as if the privilege claimed by the king's personal warrant, and from him derived to the council-board, by construction, had some-how or other been adopted by every individual of that board; for in fact these warrants became so frequent and oppressive, that the courts of justice were obliged at last to interpose.

However they might be overborne by the terror of the king's special command either in or out of council, they had courage enough to resist the novel encroachments of the separate members; and therefore they did in the courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas set at large many persons so committed: upon which occasion a question being put to the judges, to specify in what cases the prisoner was to be remanded, they answer the question with a remonstrance of their own against the illegal warrants granted by the privy councillors. The preamble relates entirely to these commitments, wherein they desire, that some good order may be taken, that her highness's subjects may not be committed or detained in prison by commandment of any nobleman, against the laws of the realm.

The question is this: in what cases prisoners sent to custody by her majesty, her council, or any one or more of her council, are to be detained in prison, and not to be delivered by her majesty's courts or judges.

The answer is, “We think, that if any person be committed by her majesty's command from her person, or by order from the council-board, or if any one or two of her council commit one for high treason, such persons so in the case before committed may not be delivered by any of her courts without due trial by the law and judgment of acquittal had. Nevertheless the judges may award the queen's writs to bring the bodies of such persons before them; and if upon return thereof of the causes of their commitment be certified to the judges, as it ought to be, then the judges in the cases before ought not to deliver him, but to remand the prisoner to the place from whence he came; which cannot conveniently be done, unless notice of the causes in generality, or else specially, be given to the keeper or goaler that shall have the custody of such prisoner.”

There is a studied obscurity in this opinion, which shews, how cautious the judges were obliged to be in those dangerous times; for whether they meant to acknowledge a general power in the king or his council to commit, as distinguished from a special power in one or more of his council to commit, only in the case of high treason; or whether this case of high treason is to be referred to all the commitments as the only unailable case; or again, whether in the superior commitment by the royal person or his council, they would deliver the prisoner though no cause was specified; or if one of the council committed for offences below high treason where they declare they would not remand, yet whether they would absolutely discharge or only upon bail; is altogether either ambiguous or uncertain.

It is evident to me, that the judges did not intend to be understood touching these matters; and the only propositions, that are clearly laid down in this resolution, are these.

First, that they would never remand upon the councillor's commitment but in high treason.

Secondly, that the cause ought to be shewed in all cases.

This resolution grew to be much agitated afterwards in the third of Charles the first, and had the honour, like other dark oracles, to be cited on both sides.

Thus much it was necessary to observe upon this famous opinion; because it was upon this opinion, that lord chief justice Holt principally relied. At this time it is apparent, that all the privy councillors exercised this right in common. Whatever it was, the complaint shews, it was a general practice, and a privilege enjoyed by all the members of that board; from whence it is natural to suppose, that if the power was well founded, the same practice would have continued to this time in the same way, seeing ing how tenacious all men are of those things that are called rights and privileges. Instead of this it doth not appear, that the council from that time have ever asserted their rights; and now at last, when the secretary of state has revived the claim, for the common benefit, as it should seem, of the whole body, no other person has followed this example, or knows to this moment that he is entitled to such right. Any body who considers what the consequence must have been from these determinations of the judges, might venture to affirm, that the privy councillor's warrant from this period ceased and grew out of use; for as the cause in this case was necessary to be specified, and the prisoner was never to be remanded but in the case of high treason, that warrant became at once unserviceable, and the crown was forced to resort to the royal mandate or the board-warrant, which, notwithstanding the case in Anderson, was still insisted to be unbailable and good without a cause.

Hence it happened, that in the great debate in the third of king Charles the first, no privy councillor's warrants do once occur; but instead thereof you find the secretary of state dealing forth the king's royal mandate, and the privy councillor's authority at rest.

The only reason, why I touch upon these proceedings, is for the sake of observing, that no notice is taken in those arguments of the privy councillor's right to commit; and yet the power of the king himself, and of his council, by the statute of Westminster the first, is largely discussed, and so fully handled, that if the warrant of one privy councillor had then been in use, it must have been brought forth in the argument; for if it could have served no other purpose, it would have been material, in order to mark the distinction between that and the warrant of the whole board.

From these observations I conclude, that these warrants were then deceased and gone, and would probably have never made their appearance again even in description, if the bill in the 16th of Charles the first, had not recalled them to memory, not as things either then in use or admitted to be legal, but as one of the modes of commitment which might be again revived, because it had been formerly practised. Therefore when this form of warrant appears, as it does in the catalogue of other forms, both legal and illegal, no argument can be raised from a pretended recognition of this particular warrant; since it was necessary to name every mode, that ever had been used by the king, the council, or the star-chamber, in order to make the remedy by habeas corpus universal.

But if there can be a doubt, whether this act of parliament is to be deemed a recognition of this authority, there is a passage in Journ. Com. the journal of the house of commons, that proves the contrary in direct terms.

Whilst this bill was passing, the house makes an amendment, which appears by the question put to be this, whether the house should assent to the putting the word liberties out of the bill.

But as the passage in the bill is not mentioned in the journals, it must be collected by inferences. By the phrase left out of the bill, I presume it was permitted to stand in the preamble. Now when you look into the preamble, the word liberties is there to be found in that part of the preamble which recites this usurpation of the privy council upon the liberties, as well as the properties of the subject; whereas the enacting clause condemns only the jurisdiction of that board, so far as it assumed a jurisdiction over the property of the subject; from whence I collect that the word liberties stood in that clause; and the passage that follows in the journal does strongly confirm it.

The words are these: 'Resolved upon the question, that this house does assent to the putting the word liberties out of the bill concerning the Star-Chamber and council pleadings; because the house has a bill to be drawn to provide for the liberty of the subject in a large manner. Mr. serjeant Wild and Mr. Whitelock are appointed to draw a bill to that purpose upon the several points that have been here this day debated.'

'Resolved upon the question, that the body of the lords of the council, nor any one of them in particular as a privy councillor, has any power to imprison any free-born subject, except in such cases as they are warranted by the statutes of the realm.'

It is pretty plain from this passage, that the debate turned upon the meaning of the statute of Westminster the first, and the resolution of the judges in Anderson, about which it is not fit to give any opinion; my design by citing this passage being only to shew, that this act of parliament does not even prove the actual practice of such warrants at that time, much less does recognize their legality.

What follows is still more remarkable touching this business, upon a doubt started in the trial of the seven bishops. They were committed by a warrant signed by no less than thirteen privy councillors; but the warrant did not appear to be signed by them in council. The objection taken was, that the warrant was void, being signed only by the privy councillors separately, and not in a body. If any man in Westminster-Hall at that time had understood, that one or more privy councillors had a right to commit for a misdemeanor, that would have been a flat answer to the objection; but they are so far from insisting upon this, that all the king's councillors, as well as the court, do admit the warrant would have been void, if it could be taken to be executed by them out of council.

The solicitor-general upon that occasion cites the 16th of Charles the first, which statute is produced and read, and yet no argument is taken from thence to prove the authority of the separate lords, though the act is before them. Mr. Pollaxfen in the course of the debate says, 'We do all pretty well agree, for aught I can perceive, in two things. We do not deny, but that the council-board has power to commit. They on the other side do not affirm, that the lords of the council can commit out of the council.'

'Attorney-General. Yes, they may as justices of the peace.'

'Pollaxfen. This is not pretended to be so here.'

'Lord Chief Justice. No, no, that is not the case.'

The court at last got rid of the objection, by presuming the warrant to have been executed in council.

There cannot be a stronger authority than this I have now cited for the present purpose. The whole body of the law, if I may use the phrase, were as ignorant at that time of a privy councillor's right to commit in the case of a libel, as the whole body of privy councillors are at this day.

The counsel on both sides in that cause were the ablest of their time, and few times have produced abler. They had been concerned in all the state-cases during the whole reign of king Charles the second, on one side or the other; and to suppose that all these persons could be utterly ignorant of this extraordinary power, if it had been either legal or even practised, is a supposition not to be maintained.

This is the whole that I have been able to find, touching the power of one or more privy councillors to commit; and to sum up the whole of this business in a word it stands thus.

The two cases in Leonard do presuppose some power in a privy councillor to commit, without saying what; and the case in Anderson does plainly recognize such a power in high treason: but with respect to his jurisdiction in other offences, I do not find it was either claimed or exercised.

In consequence of all this reasoning, I am forced to deny the opinion of my lord chief justice Holt to be law, if it shall be taken to extend beyond the case of high treason. But there is no necessity to understand the book in a more general sense; nor is it fair indeed to give the words a more large construction: for as the conclusion ought always to be grounded on the premises, and the premises are confined to the case of high treason only, the opinion should naturally conform to the cases cited, more especially as the case there before the court was a case of high treason, and they were under no necessity to lay down the doctrine larger than the case required.—Now whereas it has been argued, that if you admit a power of committing in high treason, the power of committing in lesser offences follows a fortiori; I beg leave to deny that consequence, for I take the rule with respect to all special authorities to be directly the reverse. They are always strictly confined to the letter; and when I see therefore, that a special power in any single case only has been permitted to a person, who in no other instance is known or recorded by the common law as a magistrate, I have no right to enlarge his authority one step beyond that case. Consider how strange it would sound, if I should declare at once, that every privy councillor without exception is invested with a power to commit in all offences without exception from high treason down to trespass, when it is clear that he is not a conservator. It might be said of me, 'he should have explained himself a little more clearly, and told us where he had found the description of so singular a magistrate, who being no conservator was yet in the nature of a conservator.'

I have now finished all I have to say upon this head; and am satisfied, that the secretary of state hath assumed this power as a transfer, I know not how, of the royal authority to himself; and that the common law of England knows no such magistrate. At the same time I declare, wherein my brothers do all agree with me, that we are bound to adhere to the determination of the queen against Derby, and the king against Earbury; and I have no right to overturn those decisions, even though it should be admitted, that the practice, which has subsisted since the Revolution, had been erroneous in its commencement.

The secretary of state having now been considered in the two lights of secretary and privy councillor, and likewise as the substitute of the royal mandate; in the two first he is clearly no conservator; in the last, if he can be supposed to have borrowed the right of conservatorship from the sovereign himself, yet no one will argue or pretend, that so great a person, one so high in authority, can be deemed a justice of the peace within the equity of the 24th of Geo. II.

However, I will for a time admit the secretary of state to be a conservator, in order to examine, whether in that character he can be within the equity of this act.

SECOND QUESTION.

Upon this question, I shall take into consideration the 7th of James I. c. 5. because, though it is not material upon this record to determine, whether the special evidence can be admitted under the general issue of not guilty, the defendant having in this instance justified; yet as that act is made in eadem materia, and for the benefit of the same persons, the rule of construction observed in that will in great measure be an authority for this.

The 24th of Geo. II. is entitled, 'An act for the rendering justices of the peace more safe in the execution of their offices, and for indemnifying constables and others acting in obedience to their warrants.' The preamble runs thus: 'Whereas justices of the peace are discouraged in the execution of their offices, by vexatious actions brought against them, for or by reason of small and involuntary errors in their proceedings; and whereas it is necessary, that they should be, as far as is consistent with justice and the safety and liberty of the subjects over whom their authority extends, rendered safe in the execution of the said office and trust; and whereas it is also necessary, that the subject should be protected from all wilful and oppressive abuse of the several laws committed to the care and execution of the said justices of peace.' Then comes the enacting part.

The only granter of the warrant in the enacting part, as well as the preamble, is the justice of the peace. The officers, as they are described, are constables, headboroughs, and other officers or persons acting by their order, or in their aid. If any person acting in obedience to such warrant, and producing the said warrant upon demand, is afterwards prosecuted for such act, the statute says, he shall be acquitted, upon the production of such warrant. The counsel for the defendants say, the secretary and the messengers are both within the equity of this act. The first is a justice of the peace, because he is a conservator. If so the latter is his officer, which I will admit. The proposition then is, that conservators are within the equity of this act. They are clearly not within the letter; for justice and conservator are not convertible terms; and though it should be admitted, that a justice of the peace is still a conservator, yet a conservator is not a justice. The X see what is above in the habeas corpus case of the case of the seven bishops in state trials 3. 311.

The defendants have argued upon two rules of construction, which in truth are but one.

First, where in a general act a particular is put as an example, all other persons of like description shall be comprized.

Secondly, where the words of a statute enact a thing, it enacts all other things in like degree.

In Plowden 37, and 167, and 467, several cases are cited as authorities under these rules of construction; as, that the bishop of Norwich in one act shall mean all bishops; that the warden of the Fleet shall mean all gaolers; that justices of a division mean all justices of the county at large; that guardian in socage after the heir's attaining fourteen, shall be a bailiff in account; that executors shall include administrators, and tenant for years a tenant for one year or any less time; with several other instances to the like purpose.

In the first place, though the general rule be true enough, that where it is clear the person or thing expressed is put by way of example, the judges must fill up the catalogue; yet we ought to be sure, from the words and meaning of the act itself, that the thing or person is really inserted as an example.

This is a very inaccurate way of penning a law; and the instances of this sort are scarce ever to be found, except in some of the old acts of parliament. And wherever this rule is to take place, the act must be general, and the thing expressed must be particular; such as those cases of the warden of the Fleet and the bishop of Norwich: whereas the act before us is equally general in all its parts, and requires no addition or supply to give it the full effect. Therefore if this way of arguing can be maintained by either of the rules, it must fall under the second, which is, that where the words of a statute enact a thing, it enacts all other things in like degree.

In all cases that fall within this rule, there must be a perfect resemblance between the persons or things expressed and those implied. Thus for instance, administrators are the same thing with executors; tenant for half a year and tenant for years have both terms for a chattel interest, differing only in the duration of the term; and so of the rest, which I need not repeat one by one: and in all these cases, the persons or things to be implied are in all respects the objects of the law as much as those expressed. Does not every body see from hence, that you must first examine the law before you can apply the rule of construction? For the law must not be bent by the construction, but that must be adapted to the spirit and sense of the law. The fundamental rule then, by which all others are to be tried, is laid down in Wimbish and Tailbois, Plowden 57, 58. according to which the best guide is to follow the intent of the statutes. Again, according to Plowden, p. 205 and 231. the construction is to be collected out of the words according to the true intent and meaning of the act, and the intent of the makers may be collected from the cause or necessity of making the act, or by foreign circumstances.

Let us try the present case by these rules; and let the justice of the peace stand for a moment in this act as a magistrate at large; and then compare him as he is here described with the conservator.

The justice here is a magistrate intrusted with the execution of many laws, liable to actions for involuntary errors, and actually discouraged by vexatious suits; in respect of which perilous situation he is intended to be rendered more safe in the execution of his office.—He is besides a magistrate, who acts by warrant directed to constables and other officers, namely, known officers who are bound to execute his warrants.

Now take the conservator.—He is intrusted with the execution of no laws, if the word law is understood to mean statutes, as I apprehend it is.—He is liable to no actions, because he never acts; the keeping of the peace being so completely transferred to and so engrossed by the justice, that the name of conservator is almost forgot. He is far from being discouraged by actions. No man ever heard of an action brought against a conservator as such; unless you will call a constable a conservator, which will not serve the present purpose, because these persons can hardly be deemed justices within the act.—Again, how does it appear, that the conservator could either grant a warrant like the present, or command a constable to execute it? These powers are at least very doubtful; but I think I may take it for granted, that the conservator could not command a messenger of the king's chamber.

Did then this act of parliament refer to magistrates of known authority and daily employment, or to antiquated powers and persons known to have existed by historical tradition only? Did it mean to redress real grievances, or those that were never felt? Ad ea, quæ frequenter accidunt, jura adaptantur.

From this comparison it may appear, how little there is to drag the conservator into the law, who hardly corresponds with the justice of the peace in any one point of the description. But further, it is unfortunate for the conservators upon this question, that one half of them are the objects of the statute by name, as constable, &c. and yet not one of their acts as conservators is within the provision.

And now give me leave to ask one question. Will the secretary of state be classed with the higher or the lower conservator? If with the higher, such as the king, the chancellor, &c. he is too much above the justice to be within the equity. If with the lower, he is too much below him. And as to the sheriff and the coroner, they cannot be within the law; because they never grant such warrants as these. So that at last, upon considering all the conservators, there is not one that does not stand most evidently excluded, unless the secretary of state himself shall be excepted.

But if there wanted arguments to confute this pretension, the construction that has prevailed upon the seventh of James the first, would decide the point. That is an act of like kind to relieve justices of the peace, mayors, constables, and certain other officers, in troublesome actions brought against them for the legal execution of their offices; who are enabled by that act to plead the general issue. Now that law has been taken so strictly, that neither church-wardens, nor overseers, were held to be within the equity of the word constables, although they were clearly officers, and acted under the justice's warrants. Why? Because that act, being made to change the course of the common law, could not be extended beyond the letter. If then that privilege of giving the special matter in evidence upon the general issue is contrary to the common law, how much more substantially is this act an innovation of the common law, which indemnifies the officer upon the production of the warrant, and deprives the subject of his right of action?

It is impossible, that two acts of parliament can be more nearly allied or connected with one another, than that of 24 George II. and the 7th of James I. The objects in both are the same, and the remedies are similar in both, each of them changing the common law for the benefit of the parties concerned. The one, in truth, is the sequel or second part of the other. The first not being an adequate remedy in case of the several persons therein mentioned, the second is added to complete the work, and to make them as secure as they ought to be made from the nature of the case. If by a contrary construction any person should be admitted into the last that are not included in that first, the person, whoever he is, will be without the privilege of pleading the general issue, and giving the special matter in evidence, which the latter would have certainly given by express words, if the parliament could have imagined he was not comprized in the first.

Upon the whole, we are all of opinion, that neither secretary of state, nor the messenger, are within the meaning of this act of parliament.

THIRD QUESTION.

But if they were within the general equity, yet it behoved the messenger to shew, that they have acted in obedience to the warrant; for it is upon that condition, that they are intitled to the exemption of the act. When the legislature excused the officer from the perilous task of judging, they compelled him to an implicit obedience; which was but reasonable: so that now he must follow the dictates of his warrant, being no longer obliged to inquire, whether his superior had or had not any jurisdiction. The late decision of the court of King's Bench in the case of general (a) warrants was ruled upon this ground, and rightly determined.

This part of the case is clear, and shall be dispatched in very few words.

First, the defendants did not take with them a constable, which is a flat objection. They had no business to dispute either the propriety or the legality of this direction in the execution of the warrant; nor have their counsel any right to dispute it here in their behalf. They can have no other plea under this act of parliament, than ignorance and obedience.

Secondly, they did not bring the papers to the earl of Halifax, to be examined according to the tenor of the warrant, but to Mr. Lovell Stanhope. This command ought to have been literally pursued; nor is it any excuse to say now, as they do in their plea, that Mr. L. Stanhope was an assistant to the earl of Halifax. If he is a magistrate, he can have no assistant, nor deputy, to execute any part of that employment. The right is personal to himself, and a trust that he can no more delegate to another, than a justice of the peace can transfer his commission to his clerk.

I shall say no more upon this head. But I cannot help observing, that the secretary of state, who has not been many years intrusted with this authority, has already eased himself of every part of it, except the signing and sealing the warrant. The law clerk, as he is called, examines both persons and papers. He backs or discharges. This is not right. I could wish for the future, that the secretary would discharge this part of his office in his own person.

FOURTH AND LAST QUESTION.

The question that arises upon the special verdict being now dispatched, I come in my last place to the point, which is made by the justification; for the defendants, having failed in the attempt made to protect themselves by the stat. of the 24th of Geo. II. are under a necessity to maintain the legality of the warrants, under which they have acted, and to shew that the secretary of state in the instance now before us, had a jurisdiction to seize the defendants papers. If he had no such jurisdiction, the law is clear, that the officers are as much responsible for the trespass as their superior.

This, though it is not the most difficult, is the most interesting question in the cause; because if this point should be determined in favour of the jurisdiction, the secret cabinets and bureaux of every subject in this kingdom will be thrown open to the search and inspection of a messenger, whenever the secretary of state shall think fit to charge, or even to suspect, a person to be the author, printer, or publisher of a seditious libel.

The messenger, under this warrant, is commanded to seize the person described, and to bring him with his papers to be examined before the secretary of state. In consequence of this, the house must be searched; the locks and doors of every room, box, or trunk must be broken open; all the papers and books without exception, if the warrant be executed according to its tenor, must be seized and carried away; for it is observable, that nothing is left either to the discretion or to the humanity of the officer.

This power so assumed by the secretary of state is an execution upon all the party's papers, in the first instance. His house is rifled; his most valuable secrets are taken out of his possession, before the paper for which he is charged is found to be criminal by any competent jurisdiction, and before he is convicted either of writing, publishing, or being concerned in the paper.

This power, so claimed by the secretary of state, is not supported by one single citation from any law book extant. It is claimed by no other magistrate in this kingdom but himself: the great executive hand of criminal iminal justice, the lord chief justice of the court of King's-Bench, chief justice Scroggs excepted, never having assumed this authority.

The arguments, which the defendants counsel have thought fit to urge in support of this practice, are of this kind.

That such warrants have issued frequently since the Revolution, which practice has been found by the special verdict; though I must observe, that the defendants have no right to avail themselves of that finding, because no such practice is averred in their justification.

That the case of the warrants bears a resemblance to the case of search for stolen goods.

They say too, that they have been executed without resistance upon many printers, bookellers, and authors, who have quietly submitted to the authority; that no action hath hitherto been brought to try the right; and that although they have been often read upon the returns of habeas corpus, yet no court of justice has ever declared them illegal.

And it is further insisted, that this power is essential to government, and the only means of quieting clamours and sedition.

These arguments, if they can be called arguments, shall be all taken notice of; because upon this question I am desirous of removing every colour or plausibility.

Before I state the question, it will be necessary to describe the power claimed by this warrant in its full extent.

If honestly exerted, it is a power to seize that man's papers, who is charged upon oath to be the author or publisher of a seditious libel; if oppressively, it acts against every man, who is so described in the warrant, though he be innocent.

It is executed against the party, before he is heard or even summoned; and the information, as well as the informers, is unknown.

It is executed by messengers with or without a constable (for it can never be pretended, that such is necessary in point of law) in the presence or the absence of the party, as the messengers shall think fit, and without a witness to testify what passes at the time of the transaction; so that when the papers are gone, as the only witnesses are the trespassers, the party injured is left without proof.

If this injury falls upon an innocent person, he is as destitute of remedy as the guilty: and the whole transaction is so guarded against discovery, that if the officer should be disposed to carry off a bank-bill, he may do it with impunity, since there is no man capable of proving either the taker or the thing taken.

It must not be here forgot, that no subject whatsoever is privileged from this search; because both houses of parliament have resolved, that there is no privilege in the case of a seditious libel.

Nor is there pretence to say, that the word 'papers' here mentioned ought in point of law to be restrained to the libellous papers only. The word is general, and there is nothing in the warrant to confine it; nay, I am able to affirm, that it has been upon a late occasion executed in its utmost latitude: for in the case of Wilkes against Wood, when the messengers hesitated about taking all the manuscripts, and sent to the secretary of state for more express orders for that purpose, the answer was, that all must be taken, manuscripts and all. Accordingly, all was taken, and Mr. Wilkes's private pocket-book filled up the mouth of the sack.

I was likewise told in the same cause by one of the most experienced messengers, that he held himself bound by his oath to pay an implicit obedience to the commands of the secretary of state: that in common cases he was content to seize the printed impressions of the papers mentioned in the warrant; but when he received directions to search further, or to make a more general seizure, his rule was to sweep all. The practice has been correspondent to the warrant.

Such is the power, and therefore one should naturally expect that the law to warrant it should be clear in proportion as the power is exorbitant.

If it is law, it will be found in our books. If it is not to be found there, it is not law.

The great end, for which men entered into society, was to secure their property. That right is preserved sacred and incommunicable in all instances, where it has not been taken away or abridged by some public law for the good of the whole. The cases where this right of property is set aside by positive law, are various. Distresses, executions, forfeitures, taxes, &c. are all of this description; wherein every man by common consent gives up that right, for the sake of justice and the general good. By the laws of England, every invasion of private property, be it ever so minute, is a trespass. No man can set his foot upon my ground without my licence, but he is liable to an action, though the damage be nothing; which is proved by every declaration in trespass, where the defendant is called upon to answer for bruising the grass and even treading upon the soil. If he admits the fact, he is bound to shew by way of justification, that some positive law has empowered or excused him. The justification is submitted to the judges, who are to look into the books; and if such a justification can be maintained by the text of the statute law, or by the principles of common law. If no such excuse can be found or produced, the silence of the books is an authority against the defendant, and the plaintiff must have judgment.

According to this reasoning, it is now incumbent upon the defendants to shew the law, by which this seizure is warranted. If that cannot be done, it is a trespass.

Papers are the owner's goods and chattels: they are his dearest property; and are so far from enduring a seizure, that they will hardly bear an inspection; and though the eye cannot by the laws of England be guilty of a trespass, yet where private papers are removed and carried away, the secret nature of those goods will be an aggravation of the trespass, and demand more considerable damages in that respect. Where is the written law that gives any magistrate such a power? I can lately answer, there is none; and therefore it is too much for us without such authority to pronounce a practice legal, which would be subversive of all the comforts of society.

Yet though it cannot be maintained by any direct law, yet it bears a resemblance, as was urged, to the known case of search and seizure for stolen goods.

I answer, that the difference is apparent. In the one, I am permitted to seize my own goods, which are placed in the hands of a public officer, till the felon's conviction shall intitle me to restitution. In the other, the party's own property is seized before and without conviction, and he has no power to reclaim his goods, even after his innocence is cleared by acquittal.

The case of searching for stolen goods crept into the law by imperceptible practice. It is the only case of the kind that is to be met with. No less a person than my lord Coke denied its legality; and therefore if the two cases resembled each other more than 4 Inst. 176. they do, we have no right, without an act of parliament, to adopt a new practice in the criminal law, which was never yet allowed from all antiquity.

Observe too the caution with which the law proceeds in this singular case.—There must be a full charge upon oath of a theft committed.—The owner must swear that the goods are lodged in such a place.—He must attend at the execution of the warrant to shew them to the officer, who must see that they answer the description.—And, lastly, the owner must abide the event at his peril: for if the goods are not found, he is a trespasser; and the officer, being an innocent person, will be always a ready and convenient witness against him.

On the contrary, in the case before us nothing is described, nor distinguished: no charge is requisite to prove, that the party has any criminal papers in his custody: no person present to separate or select: no person to prove in the owner's behalf the officer's misbehaviour.—To say the truth, he cannot easily misbehave, unless he pilfers; for he cannot take more than all.

If it should be said, that the same law which has with so much circumspection guarded the case of stolen goods from mischief, would likewise in this case protect the subject, by adding proper checks; would require proofs before-hand; would call up the servant to stand by and overlook; would require him to take an exact inventory, and deliver a copy: my answer is, that all these precautions would have been long since established by law, if the power itself had been legal; and that the want of them is an undeniable argument against the legality of the thing.

What would the parliament say, if the judges should take upon themselves to mould an unlawful power into a convenient authority, by new restrictions? That would be, not judgment, but legislation.

I come now to the practice since the Revolution, which has been strongly urged, with this emphatical addition, that an usage tolerated from the era of liberty, and continued downwards to this time through the best ages of the constitution, must necessarily have a legal commencement. Now, though that pretence can have no place in the question made by this plea, because no such practice is there alledged; yet I will permit the defendant for the present to borrow a fact from the special verdict, for the sake of giving it an answer.

If the practice began then, it began too late to be law now. If it was more ancient, the Revolution is not to answer for it; and I could have wished, that upon this occasion the Revolution had not been considered as the only basis of our liberty.

The Revolution restored this constitution to its first principles. It did no more. It did not enlarge the liberty of the subject; but gave it a better security. It neither widened nor contracted the foundation, but repaired, and perhaps added a buttress or two to the fabric; and if any minister of state has since deviated from the principles at that time recognized, all that I can say is, that, so far from being sanctified, they are condemned by the Revolution.

With respect to the practice itself, if it goes no higher, every lawyer will tell you, it is much too modern to be evidence of the common law: and if it should be added, that these warrants ought to acquire some strength by the silence of those courts, which have heard them read so often upon returns without censure or animadversion, I am able to borrow my answer to that pretence from the court of King's-Bench, which lately declared with great unanimity in the case of general warrants, that as no objection was taken to them upon the returns, and the matter passed sub silentio, the precedents were of no weight. I most heartily concur in that opinion: and the reason is more pertinent here, because the court had no authority in the present case to determine against the seizure of papers, which was not before them; whereas in the other they might, if they had thought fit, have declared the warrant void, and discharged the prisoner ex officio.

This is the first instance I have met with, where the ancient immemorable law of the land, in a public matter, was attempted to be proved by the practice of a private office.

The names and rights of public magistrates, their power and forms of proceedings as they are settled by law, have been long since written, and are to be found in books and records. Private customs indeed are still to be sought from private tradition. But whoever conceived a notion, that any part of the public law could be buried in the obscure practice of a particular person?

To search seize and carry away all the papers of the subject upon the first warrant: that such a right should have existed from the time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and never yet have found a place in any book of law; is incredible. But if so strange a thing could be supposed, I do not see, how we could declare the law upon such evidence.

But still it is insisted, that there has been a general submission, and no action brought to try the right.

I answer, there has been a submission of guilt and poverty to power and the terror of punishment. But it would be strange doctrine to assert that all the people of this land are bound to acknowledge that, to be universal law, which a few criminal bookellers have been afraid to dispute.

The defendants upon this occasion have stopped short at the Revolution. But I think it would be material to go further back, in order to see, how far the search and seizure of papers have been countenanced in the antecedent reigns.

First, I find no trace of such a warrant as the present before that period, except a very few that were produced the other day in the reign of king Charles II.

But there did exist a search-warrant, which took its rise from a decree of the Star-Chamber. The decree is found at the end of the 3d volume of Rushworth's Collections. It was made in the year 1636, and recites an older decree upon the subject in the 28th of Elizabeth, by which probably the same power of search was given.

By this decree the messenger of the preſs was empowered to search in all places, where books were printing, in order to see if the printer had a licence; and if upon such search he found any books which he suspected to be libellous against the church or state, he was to seize them, and carry them before the proper magistrate.

It was very evident, that the Star-Chamber, how soon after the invention of printing I know not, took to itself the jurisdiction over public libels, which soon grew to be the peculiar business of that court. Not that the courts of Westminster-Hall wanted the power of holding pleas in those cases; but the attorney-general for good reasons chose rather to proceed there; which is the reason, why we have no cases of libels in the King's-Bench before the Restoration.

The Star-Chamber from this jurisdiction presently usurped a general superintendence over the preſs, and exercised a legislative power in all matters relating to the subject. They appointed licensors; they prohibited books; they inflicted penalties; and they dignified one of their officers with the name of the messenger of the preſs, and among other things enacted this warrant of search.

After that court was abolished, the preſs became free, but enjoyed its liberty not above two or three years; for the long parliament thought fit to restrain it again by ordinance. Whilst the preſs is free, I am afraid it will always be licentious, and all governments have an aversion to libels. This parliament, therefore, did by ordinance restore the Star-Chamber practice; they recalled the licences, and sent forth again the messenger. It was against the ordinance, that Milton wrote that famous pamphlet called Areopagitica. Upon the Restoration, the preſs was free once more, till the 13th and 14th of Charles II. when the licensing act passed, which for the first time gave the secretary of state a power to issue search warrants: but these warrants were neither so oppressive, nor so inconvenient as the present. The right to enquire into the licence was the pretence of making the searches; and if during the search any suspected libels were found, they and they only could be seized.

This act expired the 32d year of that reign, or thereabouts. It was revived again in the 1st year of king James II. and remained in force till the 5th of king William, after one of his parliaments had continued it for a year beyond its expiration.

I do very much suspect, that the present warrant took its rise from these search-warrants, that I have been describing; nothing being easier to account for than this engraftment; the difference between them being no more than this, that the apprehension of the person in the first was to follow the seizure of papers, but the seizure of papers in the latter was to follow the apprehension of the person. The same evidence would serve equally for both purposes. If it was charged for printing or publishing, that was sufficient for either of the warrants. Only this material difference must always be observed between them, that the search-warrant only carried off the criminal papers, whereas this seizes all.

When the licensing act expired at the close of king Charles II.'s reign, the twelve judges were assembled at the king's command, to discover whether the preſs might not be as effectually restrained by the common law, as it had been by that statute.

I cannot help observing in this place, that if the secretary of state was still invested with a power of issuing this warrant, there was no occasion for the application to the judges: for though he could not issue the general search-warrant, yet upon the least rumour of a libel he might have done more, and seized every thing. But that was not thought of, and therefore the judges met and resolved:

First, that it was criminal at common law, not only to write public seditious papers and false news; but likewise to publish any news without a licence from the king, though it was true and innocent.

Secondly, that libels were seizable. This is to be found in the State Trials; and because it is a curiosity, I will recite the passages at large.

Vol. II. p. 1038. The trial of Harris for a libel. Scroggs ch. justice.

'Because my brethren shall be satisfied with the opinion of all the judges of England what this offence is, which they would insinuate, as if the mere selling of books was no offence; 'tis not long since that all the judges met by the king's commandment, as they did some time before: and they both times declared unanimously, that all persons, that do write, or print, or sell any pamphlet that is either scandalous to public or private persons, such books may be seized, and the persons punished by law; that all books which are scandalous to the government may be seized, and all persons so expounding may be punished: and further, that all writers of news, though not scandalous, seditious, nor reflective upon the government or state; yet if they are writers, as they are few others of false news, they are indictable and punishable upon that account.'

It seems the chief justice was a little incorrect in his report; for it should seem as if he meant to punish only the writer of false news. But he is more accurate afterwards in the trial of Carr for a libel. State Trials, vol. III. p. 37, 58.

Sir G. Jeffries recorder.

'All the judges of England having met together to know, whether any person whatsoever may expose to the public knowledge any matter of intelligence, or any matter whatsoever that concerns the public, they give it in as their resolution, that no person whatsoever could expose to the public knowledge any thing that concerned the affairs of the public, without licence from the king, or from such persons as he thought fit to intrust with that power.'

Then Scroggs takes up the subject, and says,

'The words I remember are these. When by the king's command we were to give in our opinion, what was to be done in point of regulation of the preſs, we did all subscribe, that to print or publish any new books or pamphlets or any news whatsoever is illegal; that it is a manifest intent to the breach of the peace, and they may be proceeded against by law for an illegal thing. Suppose now that this thing is not scandalous, what then? If there had been no reflection in this book at all, yet it is illicite done, and the author ought to be convicted for it.'

These are the opinions of all the twelve judges of England; a great and reverend authority.

Can the twelve judges extrajudicially make a thing law to bind the kingdom by a declaration, that such is their opinion?—I say no.—It is a matter of impeachment for any judge to affirm it. There must be an antecedent principle or authority, from whence this opinion may be fairly collected; otherwise the opinion is null, and nothing but ignorance can excuse the judge that subscribed it. Out of this doctrine sprang the famous general search-warrant, that was condemned by the house of commons; and it was not unreasonable to suppose, that the form of it was settled by the twelve judges that subscribed the opinion.

The deduction from the opinion to the warrant is obvious. If you can seize a libel, you may search for it: if search is legal, a warrant to authorize that search is likewise legal: if any magistrate can issue such a warrant, the chief justice of the King's-Bench may clearly do it.

It falls here naturally in my way to ask, whether there be any authority besides this opinion of these twelve judges to say, that libels may be seized? If they may, I am afraid, that all the inconveniences of a general seizure will follow upon a right allowed to seize a part. The search in such cases will be general, and every house will fall under the power of a secretary of state to be rummaged before proper conviction.—Consider for a while how the law of libels now stands.

Lord chief justice Holt and the court of King's-Bench have resolved in the *King and Bear, that he who writes a libel, though he

In the 5th Report, 125. lord Coke cites it in the Star-Chamber, that if a libel concerns a public person, he that hath it in his custody ought immediately to deliver it to a magistrate, that the author may be found out.

In the case of Lake and Hutton, Hobart 252. it is observed, that a libel, though the contents are true, is not to be justified; but the right way is to discover it to some magistrate or other, that they may have cognizance of the cause.

In 1st Ventris 31. it is said, that the having a libel, and not discovering it to a magistrate, was only punishable in the Star-Chamber, unless the party maliciously publish it. But the court corrected this doctrine in the King and Bear, where it said, though he never published it, yet his having it in readiness for that purpose, if any occasion should happen, is highly criminal: and though he might design to keep it private, yet after his death it might fall into such hands as might be injurious to the government; and therefore men ought not to be allowed to have such evil instruments in their keeping. Carthw 409. In Salkeld's Report of the same case, Holt chief justice says, if a libel be publicly known, a written copy of it is evidence of a publication. Salk 418.

If all this be law, and I have no right at present to deny it, whenever a favourite libel is published (and these compositions are apt to be favourites) the whole kingdom in a month or two becomes criminal, and it would be difficult to find one innocent jury amongst so many millions of offenders.

I can find no other authority to justify the seizure of a libel, than that of Scroggs and his brethren.

If the power of search is to follow the right of seizure, every body sees the consequence. He that has it or has had it in his custody; he that has published, copied, or maliciously reported it, may fairly be under a reasonable suspicion of having the thing in his custody, and consequently become the object of the search-warrant. If libels may be seized, it ought to be laid down with precision, when, where, upon what charge, against whom, by what magistrate, and in what stage of the prosecution. All these particulars must be explained and proved to be law, before this general proposition can be established.

As therefore no authority in our books can be produced to support such a doctrine, and so many Star-Chamber decrees, ordinances, and acts have been thought necessary to establish a power of search, I cannot be persuaded, that such a power can be justified by the common law.

I have now done with the argument, which has endeavoured to support this warrant by the practice since the Revolution.

It is then said, that it is necessary for the ends of government to lodge such a power with a state officer; and that it is better to prevent the publication before than to punish the offender afterwards. I answer, if the legislation be of that opinion, they will revive the licensing act. But if they have not done that, I conceive they are not of that opinion. And with respect to the argument of state necessity, or a distinction that has been aimed at between state-offences and others, the common law does not understand that kind of reasoning, nor do our books take notice of any such distinctions.

Serjeant

Serjeant Ashley was committed to the Tower in the 3d of Charles I. by the house of lords only for asserting in argument, that there was a law of state different from the common law; and the ship-money judges were impeached for holding, first, that state-necessity would justify the raising money without consent of parliament; and secondly, that the king was judge of that necessity.

If the king himself has no power to declare when the law ought to be violated for reason of state, I am sure we his judges have no such prerogative.

Lastly, it is urged as an argument of utility, that such a search is a means of detecting offenders by discovering evidence. I wish some cases had been shewn, where the law forceth evidence out of the owner's custody by process. There is no process against papers in civil causes. It has been often tried, but never prevailed. Nay, where the adversary has by force or fraud got possession of your own proper evidence, there is no way to get it back but by action.

In the criminal law such a proceeding was never heard of; and yet there are some crimes, such for instance as murder, rape, robbery, and house-breaking, to say nothing of forgery and perjury, that are more atrocious than libelling. But our law has provided no paper-search in these cases to help forward the conviction.

Whether this proceedeth from the gentleness of the law towards criminals, or from a consideration that such a power would be more pernicious to the innocent than useful to the public, I will not say.

It is very certain, that the law obligeth no man to accuse himself; because the necessary means of compelling self-accusation, falling upon the innocent as well as the guilty, would be both cruel and unjust; and it should seem, that search for evidence is disallowed upon the same principle. There too the innocent would be confounded with the guilty.

Observe the wisdom as well as mercy of the law. The strongest evidence before a trial, being only ex parte, is but suspicion; it is not proof. Weak evidence is a ground of suspicion, though in a lower degree; and if suspicion at large should be a ground of search, especially in the case of libels, whose house would be safe?

If, however, a right of search for the sake of discovering evidence ought in any case to be allowed, this crime above all others ought to be excepted, as wanting such a discovery less than any other. It is committed in open day-light, and in the face of the world; every act of publication makes new proof; and the solicitor of the Treasury, if he pleases, may be the witness himself.

The messenger of the press, by the very constitution of his office, is directed to purchase every libel that comes forth, in order to be a witness.

Nay, if the vengeance of government requires a production of the author, it is hardly possible for him to escape the impeachment of the printer, who is sure to seal his own pardon by his discovery. But suppose he should happen to be obstinate, yet the publication is stopped, and the offence punished. By this means the law is satisfied, and the public secured.

I have now taken notice of every thing that has been urged upon the present point; and upon the whole we are all of opinion, that the warrant to seize and carry away the party's papers in the case of a seditious libel, is illegal and void.

Before I conclude, I desire not to be understood as an advocate for libels. All civilized governments have punished calumny with severity; and with reason; for these compositions debauch the manners of the people; they excite a spirit of disobedience, and enervate the authority of government; they provoke and excite the passions of the people against their rulers, and the rulers oftentimes against the people.

After this description, I shall hardly be considered as a favourer of these pernicious productions. I will always set my face against them, when they come before me; and shall recommend it most warmly to the jury always to convict when the proof is clear. They will do well to consider, that unjust acquittals bring an odium upon the press itself, the consequence whereof may be fatal to liberty; for if kings and great men cannot obtain justice at their hands by the ordinary course of law, they may at last be provoked to restrain that press, which the juries of their country refuse to regulate. When licentiousness is tolerated, liberty is in the utmost danger; because tyranny, bad as it is, is better than anarchy; and the worst of governments is more tolerable than no government at all.

[A great change of the king's ministers happened in the July before the judgment in the preceding case; particularly the marquis of Rockingham was placed at the head of the Treasury. The judgment was soon followed with a resolution of the house of commons, declaring the seizure of papers in the case of a libel to be illegal. Journ. Com. 22 April, 1766. At the same time the commons passed a resolution condemning general warrants in the case of libels. The latter resolution was afterwards extended by a further vote, which included a declaration, that general warrants were universally illegal, except in cases provided for by act of parliament. Journ. Com. 25 April, 1766.—All these resolutions were in consequence of Mr. Wilkes's complaint of a breach of privilege above two years before. Journ. Com. 15 November 1763. Two prior attempts were made to obtain a vote in condemnation of general warrants and the seizure of papers, one in 1764, the other in 1765. Journ. Com. 14 and 17 February 1764. 29 January, 1765. and Almon's Deb. Com. But they both had miscarried, and one of the reasons assigned for so long resisting such interposition of the house was the pendency of suits in the courts of law. This objection was in part removed by the solemn judgment of the Common Pleas against the seizure of papers, and the acquiescence in it. Whether the question of general warrants ever received the same full and pointed decision in any of the courts, it is not in our power at present to inform the reader. The point arose on the trial of an action by Mr. Wilkes against Mr. Wood, which is the first case in Mr. Loft's Reports; and lord Camden in his charge to the jury appears to have explicitly avowed his own opinion of the illegality of general warrants; but what was done afterwards is not stated. How a regular judgment of the point was avoided, in the case of error in the King's Bench between Money and Leach, by conceding that the warrant was not pursued, we have observed in a former note. Ante 312. As to the action, in which Mr. Wilkes finally recovered large damages from the earl of Halifax, it was not tried till after the declaratory vote of the Commons, which most probably prevented all argument on the subject.]

No. V. Proceedings in the Case of John Wilkes, Esquire, on two Informations for Libels, King's Bench, Michaelmas Term 1764, to Hilary Term 1770, inclusive.

[This case is wholly extracted from Sir James Burrow's Reports. 4 Burr. 2527.]

Wednesday
7th February
1770.

AS this cause, in the several branches of it, came several times before the court, it seemed better to reserve a general account of it till a final conclusion of the whole, than to report the particular parts of it disjointedly, in order of time as they were respectively argued and determined.

In Michaelmas Term 1764, the fourth year of his present majesty king George the third, sir Fletcher Norton, then his majesty's solicitor-general, (the office of attorney-general being then vacant,) exhibited an information against Mr. Wilkes, for having published, and caused to be printed and published a seditious and scandalous libel (the North Briton, No. 45.).

And soon after, he exhibited another information against him, (the office of attorney-general still remaining vacant,) for having printed and published, and caused to be printed and published, an obscene and impious libel (an Essay on Woman, &c.).

Mr. Wilkes having pleaded 'not guilty' to both these informations, and the records being made up and sealed, and the causes ready for trial, the counsel for the crown thought it expedient to amend them, by striking out the word 'purport,' and in its place inserting the word 'tenor.' The proposed amendments were in all those parts of the information where the charge was that the libel printed and published by Mr. Wilkes contained matters 'to the purport and effect following, to wit:' which the counsel for the crown thought it advisable to alter into words importing that such libel contained matters 'to the tenor and effect following, to wit.'

Sir Fletcher Norton (then become himself attorney-general) directed Mr. Barlow, clerk in court for the crown, to apply to a judge for such an order; apprehending it (as he afterwards publicly declared) to be a matter of course.

Mr. Barlow, in pursuance of these directions, applied to lord Mansfield, for a summons to shew cause 'why such amendment should not be made.' And his lordship issued a summons in each cause, dated 18th of Feb. 1764, for the defendant's clerk in court, agent, attorney or solicitor, to attend him at his house in Bloomsbury-square on Monday the 20th of February at eight o'clock in the morning; to shew cause why the information should not be amended, by striking out the word 'purport,' in the several places where it is mentioned in the said information, and inserting instead thereof the word 'tenor.' N. B. The summons in the cause relating to the seditious libel excepted the first place—except in the first place.

On notice of this summons, Mr. Philips, agent and solicitor for Mr. Wilkes, and Mr. Hughes his clerk in court, and attorney for him upon the record, both attended his lordship, at his own house, upon the said 20th of February 1764, accordingly, (being now vacation-time, and no court sitting;) and did not object to the proposed amendment: on the contrary, Mr. Hughes, upon being asked as a fair practitioner, candidly acknowledged 'that it was amendable;' and Mr. Philips acquiesced in it, though he said he could not consent to it. Lord Mansfield having, in the presence of these gentlemen, consulted and produced many precedents, and being fully satisfied 'that the amendment might be made, and that it might be made by a single judge at his house or chambers,' told Mr. Philips 'that there was no need of his consent;' and immediately made the following order—'Upon hearing the clerks in court on both sides, I do order that the information in this cause be amended; by striking out the word purport in the several places where it is mentioned, in the said information, and by inserting instead thereof the word tenor.' Dated this 20th day of February 1764.

The orders in both causes were exactly alike; only that the words 'except in the first place' were added in that of the information for the seditious libel.

Mr. Wilkes was at this time in France; whither he had voluntarily retired some time before, and from whence he did not return till towards the election of members for the new parliament (into which he was afterwards chosen.)

The trial came on at the appointed time, and proceeded in the usual manner; Mr. Wilkes's counsel and agents making no objection thereto, nor declining to enter into his defence. Verdicts were found against him, upon both informations: after which, judgment was duly signed against him, in each cause; and writs of capias were awarded and issued against him, as in ordinary cases of convictions upon informations for misdemeanours. Upon his non-appearance, the proceedings were carried on to proclamation and exigents: and upon his not appearing on the fifth time of being exacted, he was, by the judgment of the coroners of the county of Middlesex, according to the law and custom of the realm, outlawed.

On Wednesday the 20th of April 1768, (being the first day of Easter Term 1768,) soon after the sitting of the court, and before any process had issued on this outlawry, Mr. Wilkes voluntarily made his personal appearance in it; accompanied by three or four friends, who probably meant to become his bail, in case of his being now admitted to bail.

He opened with a speech, which is already in * print, and therefore needs not be here repeated. He took notice, in it, that the record was altered, before the trial, by lord Mansfield's order: so that he was tried upon altered facts. This he particularly complained of, as being unconstitutional and illegal; and was advised, he said, that it rendered both the verdicts absolutely void.

Mr. Attorney-general (Mr. De Grey) prayed that Mr. Wilkes might stand committed; as he had been convicted of printing and publishing one of these libels, and of publishing the other; and had now avowed himself to be the person so convicted.

Mr. Serjeant Glynn, of counsel for Mr. Wilkes, opposed this. He said, he had several objections to the outlawry; and that, till last night, they had expected a fiat for a writ of error: but that, last night, Mr. Attorney-general declined granting one, because he doubted 'whether it belonged to his office to grant it,' or 'whether it ought not to be granted by the lord chief justice.' He said, Mr. Attorney-general did not refuse his fiat, from any doubt about the propriety of the application for it, or the sufficiency of the objections to the outlawry; but merely from a doubt 'to whom it belonged to allow the writ of error.' He said, he would propose some errors, which he hoped would satisfy the court that a writ of error ought to be granted. They were of two sorts: first, errors in fact; 2dly, errors in law.

1st. An error in fact was, 'that Mr. Wilkes was absent and out of the kingdom, at the time of the award of the writ of exigent.'

2dly. Three errors in law. First, 'that the sheriff has returned no proclamations.' It is only said, 'that he has obeyed the writ;' whereas he ought to have returned particulars; that the court might judge of them. Secondly, it is not stated in the return of the exigent, 'that Mr. Wilkes was exacted in the county of Middlesex;' nor is it said to be 'at a county court.' It is only said to be 'at his county court at the Three Tons in Brook-street near Holborne in the county of Middlesex;' which is no allegation 'that Brook-street is in the county of Middlesex.' And though it is said 'at my county court,' yet he might be sheriff of two counties. He cited 2 Roll's Abr. 802. Title: utlagariæ, error utlagariæ. Thirdly, no judgment of the coroner is here stated; but only a mere fact, 'that he was outlawed by the coroner.' In support of which objection, he cited 1 Brown's Entries 361. as in point. He therefore prayed that his lordship would grant Mr. Wilkes an allowance of his writ of error, in order to his getting this erroneous outlawry reversed. He said, it was improper at this time to enter into any litigation about the validity of the convictions upon which these judgments are founded. Mr. Wilkes's present circumstances under the outlawry are more penal than the convictions themselves. Therefore it is incumbent upon him, first to get rid of the outlawry. And he prayed that Mr. Wilkes might be, in the mean time, admitted to bail.

Mr. Recorder of London (Eyre) on the same side, enforced what the serjeant had urged; and observed, that by 4, 5 W. and M. c. 18. § 4. Mr. Wilkes was not compellable to appear in person; but might have appeared by attorney, and reversed the outlawry without bail (unless otherwise ordered by the court). He therefore proposed, that he should either appear by attorney, to reverse it; or give bail to prosecute a writ of error. And he cited Earbury's case in this court, in Easter and Trinity Terms 1723. 9 G. 1.
